Intercourse in the common face-to-face "missionary" position often misses the G spot completely. It is easier to stimulate this area with your penis if your partner lies on her stomach and you enter her from behind, or if she is on top, where she can position herself for her pleasure. Shallow thrusting is also best for stimulating her G spot. Fingers, however, are usually the most direct and effective way to stimulate her G spot at first.

Some women report that their most sensitive spots are located at the four o'clock and eight o'clock positions, about midway back along the walls of the vagina. There are nerve bundles at these locations, which may explain their sensitivity to pressure. Through stroking her vagina or thrusting in different directions, you may already have discovered that your partner has additional spots all her own.

Remember, though, that not all women have a G spot or any other particular "spot," and if your partner doesn't, the last thing you want to do is pressure her or make her feel inadequate. This whole exploration is for her pleasure and is not an attempt to find buttons or knobs that turn her on. Make G-spot stimulation a part of the smorgasbord of pleasure you offer her.

EJACULATION

Female ejaculation? A number of sexologists have in fact described the G spot's ability to "ejaculate" a clear liquid when highly aroused. This has led some to conclude that the G spot may be analogous to a man's prostate gland. (As we mentioned earlier, men's and women's sex organs develop out of the same tissue in the embryo.) Many women who ejaculate worry that they are urinating and, as we mentioned above, may feel an initial need to urinate when their G spot is touched. However, the liquid is definitely not urine, and the urge to urinate usually subsides quickly with increased arousal.

You may at some point feel a "spray" against your penis when making love. Occasionally this spray is even visible. A small number of women ejaculate a teaspoon or less of liquid out of their urethra when they orgasm. (Women who ejaculate should also try to draw their sexual energy up, since they will lose some energy through ejaculating – though less than a man does.) According to researcher Lonnie Barbach, "recent chemical analysis of the [female] ejaculatory fluid suggests that it is unlike either urine or vaginal lubrication, but rather is like male ejaculatory fluid in its high levels of glucose and acid phosphatase. It is believed that the source of the fluid is a system of glands and ducts called the paraurethral glands. These surround the female urethra and develop from the same embryological tissue that develops into the prostate in the male." Explainable or not, this female ejaculate can be quite startling if you are unfamiliar with it. One man described getting hit in the face the first time he went down on his girlfriend. This propulsive force is probably a rare occurrence, but don't be shocked if you find that with some women you need oral-sex goggles.

ANUS

For some women the anus is an erogenous zone, and for others it is off-limits. You should ask how your partner feels. If you and she are interested in anal intercourse or anal sex play (touching and entering her anus with your finger), it is always best to start slowly and sensitively and to make sure you have plenty of lubricant. If her anus constricts while you are stimulating it, you need to apply less stimulation. If her anus is relaxed, you can apply more stimulation.

BREASTS

Compared with the rest of a woman's sexual anatomy, breasts are relatively simple. The nipples rest on top of the dark circles of the areolae and become erect when aroused. For all their erotic significance, the breasts are really quite similar to sweat glands, and their primary role, as any breast-feeding mother will attest, is as a source of warm milk for babies. One could come up with interesting theories as to why in our bottle-fed, nurture-starved Western culture, large breasts have become such a powerful symbol of desire. Whatever the reason is, this flood of images has led many men (and women) to the mistaken belief that size reflects sexual appetite: the larger the breasts, the more sexually desirous a woman is. In actual fact, a woman's sexual sensitivity, experience, and self-perception determine the responsiveness of her breasts, as they do with her sexuality in general. Size has nothing to do with it.

In the "buttons and knobs" view of arousal, men often zero in on their partner's nipples. Though some women enjoy immediate nipple stimulation, many prefer a lighter, more indirect touch to begin with. Generally, try to circle around your partner's breasts to increase her anticipation and desire before actually touching the nipples themselves. Some women, however, experience very little sensation when their breasts or nipples are touched, so don't be disappointed. Rubbing your fingers together to warm them before touching her nipples will increase the amount of chi, or energy, and can help stimulate her. As you touch her nipples lightly, you may be able to feel a current of electricity flowing between your finger and her nipple. Licking her nipples with your tongue is often very effective since your tongue has a lot of chi. Sometimes, as with many men, the nerve pathways to the nipples need activating, which can occur with gentle, gradual stimulation over time. But your partner needs to be open to this slow awakening.

FERTILITY

The cycles of a woman's fertility and menstruation are especially bewildering for most men and have resulted in much fear and confusion. This is not the place for a biology lesson, but there are a few biological facts that every man should know about his lover's body. For example, did you know that although a woman's egg lives for only twelve to twenty-four hours, she can actually get pregnant as long as five days after intercourse?

How is this possible? Before a woman's ovary releases an egg, her cervical glands release "fertile" mucus. This mucus helps the semen reach the egg, and within ten minutes after ejaculation sperm are already in the fallopian tubes "breathlessly" flapping their tails toward the egg. Other sperm, however, stay in the lining of the cervical canal, where they are nourished and released over a period of three to five days. So if you have intercourse on Saturday night and she has fertile mucus but doesn't ovulate until Tuesday, you could still become a father on Wednesday. (This is a public-service announcement from your local chapter of Planned Parenthood.)

Many women complain that their partners do not take an active role in thinking about, planning, and participating in contraception. With the increased use of condoms, this situation is changing, but not enough. It's good to know the difference between fertile and nonfertile mucus, since condoms do break and no birth control is flawless. Fertile mucus is clear, slick, and stretchy. If you place some between your thumb and forefinger, it will stretch as you separate your fingers, connecting them by a thin, clear thread of mucus. If her mucus is not fertile, it will be white, sticky, and less abundant. Most noticeably, it does not stretch like fertile mucus.

If a woman does not become pregnant, the blood and cells that were prepared to nourish the fertilized egg slough off, beginning her menstruation. The menstrual cycle varies tremendously. Few women have an exact twenty-eight-day cycle. Regular cycles can range from three to seven weeks, and some women menstruate only two or three times a year. Although menstruation is different for every woman, the typical pattern of bleeding starts with a light flow of pink-tinged mucus or drops of blood, increasing to a heavy flow of red blood, and then decreasing to brownish "spotting" before stopping altogether. Some women bleed a lot, others a little, but most stop bleeding within a week.

During menstruation many women experience symptoms such as sore breasts, bloatedness, pimples, headaches, lower-back pain, diarrhea, and constipation. (Women with chronic herpes may break out around this time as well,) As you can imagine, given all of these discomforts, not to mention the stigma that still surrounds menstruation, many women do not feel very sexual during this time. Others, however, find that menstruation is the time of their greatest arousal, and indeed every part of the cycle is experienced by some women as the time of their most intense desire. For a number of women intercourse during menstruation can even relieve cramping. The more you understand about your partner's cycle and the more understanding you can be, the more you can harmonize with her through the rhythmic flow of living as well as the rhythmic flow of lovemaking.

Her Orgasm

The female orgasm has been the source of centuries, if not millennia, of curiosity and controversy, with widespread acceptance by the medical establishment of its existence occurring only in the last hundred years. Even with its existence acknowledged, the female orgasm has endured much ignorance and confusion during this century. The main debate was waged over the differences between, and the relative "maturity" of, clitoral orgasms and vaginal orgasms.' We now know that some women have orgasms more easily when their clitoris is stimulated and others have orgasms more easily when their vagina is stimulated. It is as simple as that. The one is no better than the other.

CLITORAL AND VAGINAL ORGASMS

A current theory suggests that there are actually two distinct nerves that are responsible for the two different orgasms. The pudendal nerve goes to the clitoris, among other places, and the pelvic nerve goes to the vagina and uterus – vaginal orgasms often actually involve contractions of the uterus as well (see figure 30). Of the two nerves, the pudendal has more nerve endings, which may be the reason more women have clitoral orgasms than have vaginal orgasms. The fact that the two nerves overlap in the spinal cord also might explain why some women have "blended" orgasms, which arise from both the clitoris and deep inside the vagina. Two factors seem to influence whether women have vaginal orgasms: the strength of their PC muscles and the sensitivity of their G spots or other internal spots.

Women who have both orgasms often notice a difference. Shere Hite, in her famous report on female sexuality, quotes a woman who explains her experience: “During masturbation I experience a clitoral orgasm that approximates my idea of male orgasm – a buildup of overall sensation in the general area of my clitoris, and a ‘muscle spasm’ feeling. A vaginal orgasm is a more pervasive sensation through the whole body, less concrete to describe – wider waves of feeling.” As we described, men can be said to have two different orgasms as well: a genital (or penis) orgasm and a pelvic (or prostate) orgasm. According to Taoist sexuality, there are actually numerous kinds of orgasms, which can take place in different parts and, believe it or not, different organs of the body, such as your heart and liver. If you are able to circulate your sexual energy to your brain, you may experience a “brain orgasm.” Remember, an orgasm is simply the contraction and expansion, or “pulsation,” and this pulsation can happen throughout your entire body.

TOUCHING HER CLITORIS DURING LOVEMAKING

Shere Hite reports that about 70 percent of the women she surveyed required at least some stimulation of their clitoris in order to have an orgasm. As already mentioned, your partner’s clitoris is equivalent to the head of your penis. For the majority of men, the head is the most sensitive part of their sexual anatomy – as is the clitoris for most women. Asking a woman to have an orgasm without stimulating her clitoris is like asking a man to have an orgasm without stimulating the head of his penis. It can be done, but it takes a lot longer,

It is not surprising then that in the missionary position many women are not able to have an orgasm, since the most sensitive part of their anatomy – the clitoris – is only indirectly being stimulated. Sometimes the man’s pubic bone will rub against the clitoris or the hood of the clitoris will be pulled against it during intercourse, but these are clearly no substitute for direct stimulation by your penis, fingers, or mouth, It s not surprising that Kinsey, Hunt, and Hite have all found that nearly half of American women never or rarely experience orgasm during intercourse.

Many women are much more easily orgasmic during intercourse if they, or their partners, also stimulate their clitoris. Men usually can orgasm much more quickly than women during intercourse (two or three minutes versus twenty), but women seem to be able to orgasm just as quickly as men when they masturbate – presumably because they are directly stimulating their clitoris and because they know what they like. One multi-orgasmic man recounted his experience of stroking his partner's clitoris while making love: “When I’m behind or she’s on top, my hands are free to play with her clitoris. It really drives her wild. She starts moaning so loud that once we had to stop and close the windows.”

Some men and women may complain that using hands to stimulate your partner’s clitoris during intercourse is unnatural or overly mechanical. As one multi-orgasmic man remembered, “For a long time I thought it was a sign of weakness for a man to have to use his fingers. But I’ve found that there are some times when a woman really enjoys or would even rather have your fingers or tongue, because it is a whole different feeling.” Surely this kind of stimulation cannot be considered unnatural or a sign of a man’s weakness if almost three-quarters of all women require it to be sexually satisfied. Men who are not used to using their hands when they have intercourse may find that they need a little time to coordinate their strokes and their thrusts. With practice, this coordination becomes increasingly easy, especially if you slow your thrusting down and allow your partner (and yourself) to savor every thrust and every stroke. You need to be careful not to become overly focused on your partner’s clitoris and lose the connection of lovemaking. Also be careful not to lose track of what your hand is doing, or your partner may start to feel like it is becoming mechanical. If you can walk and chew gum at the same time; you should be able to simultaneously thrust and stroke.

If your partner is willing to touch herself, all the better. One man told his girlfriend that because she was involved in bringing herself to orgasm, he felt like she was using him to “masturbate.” This reaction might be understandable if a man feels that it is his responsibility (and his right) to "give” his partner orgasms. This mind-set no doubt underlies women’s faking orgasm to please their partners or to show their partners they have been pleased. Since, as we explained orgasm takes place primarily in the brain, you cannot “give" your partner an orgasm. She must experience it in her own mind (and body).

As more and more women have discovered their ability to orgasm once or multiple times, men have felt increasing pressure to satisfy this ever higher orgasmic potential. Men’s desire to satisfy women is noble and necessary, but the accompanying pressure is not and can increase already too common feelings of performance anxiety among men. You will have a more realistic approach, and feel much less pressure, if you realize that you are simply helping your partner reach her own orgasmic potential.

ORGASMIC FINGERPRINTING

Clitoral, vaginal, and blended orgasms are just three categories that sexologists use to describe genital orgasms in women. Sexologists also make distinctions between brief, discrete orgasms and longer, continuous orgasms (see figure 19). Some women have discrete orgasms, others have continuous orgasms, and still others have a combination. Hartman, Fithian, and coauthor Berry Campbell suggest that each woman’s pattern of orgasm is so individual that it should be called an “orgasmic fingerprint." As Lonnie Barbach has pointed out, physiology as well as personal and cultural expectations influence how your partner (and you) experience orgasm, which is probably one of the reasons people tend to have a "standard” orgasmic pattern. Some women have one powerful orgasm, some have one gentle orgasm, and some have one continuous orgasm. Women who are multi-orgasmic can have any combination of the above. It is important to remember that your partner’s orgasm (like your own) will be somewhat different each time.

According to Sexual Kung Fu, women can also direct their energy out of their pelvis and up to their brain, and expand their orgasms throughout their entire body. This circulation of chi will energize your partner just as it energizes you. Women in general are less genitally focused than men and, as a result, have an easier time experiencing and expanding their orgasms throughout their bodies. Perhaps as a result of this diffusion, many women are genitally “preorgasmic” (that is, have never had a genital orgasm). In a later chapter we offer techniques for preorgasmic women to become orgasmic as well as techniques for orgasmic women to become multi-orgasmic.

It will be much easier for you to become a multi-orgasmic man if your partner enjoys long periods of lovemaking. More couples suffer from the man's not being able to last long enough than from the woman's growing tired before the man. However, the latter can he the case if you become multi-orgasmic and she does not. Although it is important not to pressure her and to accept her desires for more or less pleasure, you should encourage her to explore her potential through the chapter written for her. We also offer suggestions for couples for whom there is a serious imbalance in sexual appetite. Most women, however, will want to help their partners become multi-orgasmic, and the most important thing your partner can do to help is to explore her own pleasure and cultivate her own sexual satisfaction.

Her Arousal

Most women take longer to become aroused than most men, but once women are aroused, their desire can generally outlast that of their partners. (As a Sexual Kung Fu practitioner, you will be an exception to the second part of this rule.) According to Taoism, men are like fire and women are like water. Fire ignites quickly but can easily be quenched by water. To satisfy your lover, you need to bring her desire to a boil, which requires that you keep your fire burning long enough to do so. The secret to satisfying your partner is to understand the stages of her arousal and to learn how to synchronize your arousal with hers.

HOW DO I KNOW WHEN A WOMAN'S DESIRE IS BOILING? Taoist physicians recorded the stages of arousal they noticed in women. Many of their observations have been confirmed by Western research, especially by Kinsey in a chapter of his Sexual Behavior in the Human Female entitled "Physiology of Sexual Response and Orgasm." We note the stages here not to make women feel self-conscious but to help men understand how to better satisfy their partner's desires. As you are reading about these general stages, it is important to keep in mind Kinseys conclusion about the uniqueness of each person's sexuality: "There is nothing more characteristic of the sexual response than the fact that it is not the same in any two individuals."

With this said, we could not have a better guide to a general description of women's arousal than Su Nü, one of the Yellow Emperor's trusted female advisers. The Yellow Emperor once asked her, "How can I tell if the woman is experiencing pleasure?" Su Nü replied that there are Five Signs, Five Desires, and Ten Movements that demonstrate a woman's growing arousal. The Five Signs and Five Desires describe what happens to a woman's body as she becomes aroused, while the Ten Movements describe how her actions convey what she wants you to do next.

Before describing these secrets of women's arousal, it is worth mentioning that we live in more open and direct times than did Su Nü, and you do not have to limit yourself to reading the tea leaves of your partner's body. You can also ask her what she wants; better still, she may tell you. However, the throes of lovemaking are not always conducive to speech, let alone a clear statement of preferences. Passion overwhelms language, and it is at this time that it will help if you have learned to recognize a woman's mounting pleasure. Before or after lovemaking, you can discuss with your partner whether Su Nü understood her individual desires. It should go without saying that consent is essential in any sexual encounter, and the fact that you notice that the body of the woman you are dating is becoming aroused means nothing unless her mind wants to act on it. "No" means no, regardless of what her body says.

The Taoist texts were at times extremely direct and at other times quite vague. Some of the stages of arousal will seem clear, even obvious, while others may seem too subtle to detect. The Signs, Desires, and Movements overlap somewhat and are difficult to keep straight, so we will try to simplify them below. Remember that these are general signposts and not an exact road map. Don't expect to notice each stage each time you make love, and do not wait to check on each one before proceeding. Above all, lovemaking should be fluid and spontaneous, and these signposts will simply help you stay on the right course.

THE SIGNS OF DESIRE

As ejaculatory control begins with breathing, so too does passion, and the first signal you will have of your lover's desire is a change in her breathing, which will become increasingly rapid and shallow. According to Su Nü, if her nostrils flare and her mouth widens and she embraces you with both arms, she wants your and her genitals to touch. When her body quivers, she wants you to touch her genitals gently, If her face becomes flushed, she wants you to play with the head of your penis around her mons, and when she stretches out her legs, she wants you to rub the head of your penis against her clitoris and the entrance to her vagina.

Su Nü continues: If her nipples harden and she pushes out her belly, slowly and shallowly enter her. If her throat is dry and she swallows saliva, slowly begin to move inside her. If she starts to move her bottom, she is experiencing great pleasure. If her vagina is well lubricated or if she raises her legs to encircle you, enter her more deeply. If she presses her thighs together, her pleasure is becoming overwhelming. If she moves from side to side, she wants you to thrust deeply from side to side. If she is perspiring enough to dampen the sheets or she straightens her body and closes her eyes, she wants to orgasm. If she arches her body against yours, her pleasure has peaked. If she stretches out and relaxes, pleasure fills her entire body. If her vaginal secretions spread down her thighs and over her buttocks, she is fully satisfied and you should slowly withdraw.

Now that we have discussed what signs to recognize in your partner's mounting desire, we must discuss how to satisfy that desire, which we do in the following chapter.

Becoming a Multi-Orgasmic Couple

Controlling your ejaculation while self-pleasuring is one thing, but controlling it during the throes of lovemaking is quite another. The control you have developed over your breathing, your concentration, your PC muscles, and, most important, your sexual energy will help you immeasurably in becoming multi-orgasmic with your partner, but you also need to know the duo practice for lovemaking.

Pleasuring Your Partner

Unlike men's arousal, women's has no precipice. True, many women will have orgasms that they find so fully satisfying (and climactic) that they do not need to continue making love. And as we discussed earlier, some women even ejaculate. But since women do not have to worry about losing an erection or spilling their seed, they can generally surrender themselves to pleasure in a way that men cannot. Nevertheless, women do not fall into bliss without effort. Reaching orgasm, multiple orgasms, and expanded orgasms requires knowledge, skill, and effort of women just as it does of men. Here's how you can help.

In Sexual Kung Fu all aspects of touch are seen as part of the union between man and woman. Touching hands or lips is as much a part of harmonizing with one another as is intercourse. As with self-pleasuring, you probably have your own way of pleasuring your partner, and though most women have the same general erogenous zones, each woman, of course, has different sensitivities at different times. Try out these Taoist techniques, but let your partner's preferences be your guide.

"The essence of foreplay is slowness," states the Discourse on the Highest Tao Under Heaven. "If one proceeds slowly and patiently, the woman will be exceedingly joyful. She will adore you like a brother and love you like a parent. One who has mastered this Tao deserves to be called a heavenly gentleman." Because anticipation and growing intensity are important in bringing your partner's desire to a boil, you should begin with passionate kissing. Begin at her extremities rather than her genitals. Caress, massage, and kiss her hands and wrists as well as her feet and ankles. Move up her arms and legs to her abdomen. Stimulating points along the meridians of her body (energy channels) will help increase her sexual excitement: there are many points along or near her spine (the Back Channel), such as the small of her back, her neck, and her ears. The underside of the arms and the inside of the thighs are also very sensitive on most women. By caress, we mean that your touch should generally be featherweight, although it can be heavier when you are stimulating larger muscles such as her buttocks.

HER BREASTS

As we mentioned earlier, when you approach her breasts, spiral around them in ever narrower circles until you slowly reach her nipples. Most men go for the nipples too soon. (Old breast-feeding instincts, perhaps.) Circling them slowly will draw her sexual energy to her nipples. Also, remember to rub your thumbs and forefingers together to generate more chi. Finally, touch her nipples lightly, and try rolling them between your thumbs and index fingers. (You can touch both breasts or just focus on one at a time.) Some women enjoy harder squeezing and fondling, but let your partner's responses guide you. As we already mentioned, your tongue is highly charged with chi, and using it to lick, spiral around, and suck on her nipple is often an excellent way to arouse her. If her nipples become engorged and erect, you are doing something right.

HER GENITALS

In approaching your partner's genitals, it is best to stimulate her inner thighs, mons, and vaginal lips before approaching the clitoris. Imagine that you are moving through concentric circles of increasing pleasure and intensity. When you finally approach her clitoris, her sexual energy and excitement will be enormous.

Each woman likes to have her clitoris touched differently, and you need to become the expert in her particular pleasure. Even more important than where to touch is how to touch. Using your finger, stroke or spiral evenly – not too fast, not too slow. Avoid big movements: the clitoris's sensitivity is far more concentrated than that of the penis, and you are better off with more focused, subtler movements than with the kind of vigorous stimulation that most men enjoy.

As for where to touch, you are best off starting with the less sensitive parts of this very sensitive sex organ. Try stroking the base and sides of the clitoris. Then try stroking the hood and rolling the clitoris between your thumb and index finger – gently! Remember to touch the hood first, before touching the extremely sensitive glans. Experiment with different strokes and varying degrees of pressure. If your partner likes it, she will push her genitals slightly toward you for more stimulation. Moans, sighs, pants, jerking muscles, curling toes, and sweat, as well as smiles and other facial expressions, are all good signs. If your touch is too heavy or uncomfortable, she will pull her pelvis slightly away. Lighten up or try another stroke.

TONGUE KUNG FU

Although effective, fingers are not ideal, because they are not nearly as sensitive as your partner's clitoris. The hardness of the bones in your fingers and the sharpness of your nails can be painful. (Always make sure your nails are short and smooth.) For this reason, your tongue is much better suited to the task.

There have been many jokes about oral sex and its attendant smells and tastes. There are men who grimace at the thought and men who smile with fond memories. One multi-orgasmic man described his conversion to an oral-sex fan: "In the past, I definitely didn't like to use my tongue because it felt like I wasn't getting anything out of it. I was kind of selfish, really – I was a getter. And now my partner will be having these incredible orgasms because of what I am doing with my tongue, and it feels great to watch. I even start tingling in my body. It's true what the Tao says about when you are in tune. I get by giving. This is something a lot of guys miss. I know I did for a long time." Whatever your personal feelings are about oral sex, you should know that it is probably the fastest way to get a woman's vaginal juices flowing in preparation for lovemaking. As we discussed earlier, it is also the easiest, and for some women the only, way in which they have an orgasm.

If you are not a cunnilingus fan, you do not have to dive in headfirst. If you use your tongue on your partner's clitoris, your nose and face will be nearest her mons and lower abdomen. If it is the odor that you object to, you and she can try bathing together or using scented oils. (We should mention that many men are turned on by, or overtime come to be turned on by, the smell of their partner's vagina.) Best, of course, is not to focus initially or exclusively on her clitoris: use your tongue to touch her inner lips, the sensitive spot at the base of her vagina, and her perineum as well.

It is also important not to get overly fixated on her genitals to the exclusion of the rest of her body. Some women feel disconnected during oral sex, and this feeling can be lessened by using your hands to continue caressing her legs, belly, breasts, hands, and face. Many women find that having their nipples stimulated during oral sex can heighten their pleasure immensely. Other women find that this distracts them from the intensity of clitoral stimulation. As for clitoral techniques, you probably will want to try a combination of brushing with your lips, flicking with your tongue, and sucking with your mouth. Alternating between using your tongue and gently sucking her clitoris into your mouth can be extremely pleasurable. Again, be careful of too much pressure. Light, consistent, and rhythmic pressure is generally best.

Many men mistakenly think that oral sex involves inserting their tongue into their partner's vagina. This is not generally the case, since the tongue is usually too short and too soft to stimulate a woman's vagina successfully, although Taoists do recommend a technique for stimulating the G spot by hooking your tongue and pulling back. It's worth a try – especially if you have a strong tongue!

(You actually can strengthen your tongue by sticking it out and then pulling it in like a snake as fast as you can for a minute or two. Practice as often as you can.)

ENTERING HER

Generally, your fingers are more effective than your tongue for stimulating the inside of your partner's vagina. You can use one finger (or, if she's very aroused, two fingers) to enter her. Circle around the wall of her vagina to find where she is most sensitive. Don't forget to try the G spot about an inch or two behind her clitoris. You may also wish to thrust your fingers in and out (slowly at first), simulating the action of your penis.

At this point, your partner's desire is probably close to boiling and she is eager for you to enter her. But do not enter her quite yet. Hold your penis in your hand as if you were about to guide it into her vagina. But before entering, rub the head of your penis against her clitoris. This will help bring her passion to a rapid boil. Then enter her gradually, first about an inch, then two, and then pull back a little so that your penis is just inside the entrance to her vagina. This slow, lingering approach will help you control your own desire and will allow you to begin a thrusting pattern, which will bring both of you to the peak of pleasure many times.

If she is multi-orgasmic, you may want to help bring her to orgasm before you enter her, or you may want to wait until you have entered her. If she has already orgasmed at least once, she may be more patient with your need to stop momentarily during lovemaking as you approach the point of no return. Also, when you are making love her orgasms actually will help you control your ejaculation. As the Taoists understand it, water (vaginal fluid) cools down fire. As you gain greater mastery over your urge to ejaculate, this will be less of a concern because you will be able to use your breath and your mind more effectively to control this urge and will need to interrupt the rhythm of lovemaking less often.

CHARGING HER EROTIC CIRCUITS

While pleasuring your partner, you should try to avoid sexual Scripts or patterns of lovemaking that can become routine. The sequence for pleasuring your partner described in the previous section is not the only one. It generally follows the pattern of arousal for most women, but not necessarily all women and certainly not at all times. During a "quickie," for example, you might want to jump right to oral sex. Mix and match. See what your partner wants and what the mood of the moment is. Although techniques can help you satisfy your partner, it is worth bearing in mind Herant Katchadourian's advice in his Fundamentals of Human Sexuality: "A simplistic search for bodily levers and push-buttons, leads to mechanical sex since the energy that charges the erotic circuits is emotion." Knowledge of your partner's body is essential, but there is no substitute for sincere affection.

Thrusting Techniques

Most porn movies portray men thrusting in and out, sawing away until they ejaculate. It is no surprise that this is therefore what most men think they should do. In fact, this thrusting rhythm is a recipe for fast ejaculation and little satisfaction for either the man or the woman. The Taoists recognized that proper thrusting was essential for coital pleasure, ejaculatory control, and sexual health. Yet even more important than any particular technique is making sure your partner is already highly aroused. Thrusting in too soon (before she is highly lubricated) should be avoided at all costs. Even if she is eager for you to enter her, a slow hand and pelvis will raise her anticipation and help you control your ejaculation.

FINDING YOUR RHYTHM

The Taoists developed numerous different thrusting patterns, most of which involved varying between shallow thrusts and deep thrusts (see figure 20). All of these patterns encouraged the man to thrust shallowly a number of times before thrusting deeply, the most common involving nine shallow and one deep. (As you learn to control your ejaculation, you can lessen the ratio to six or even three shallow to one deep.)

Alternating between shallow and deep thrusts will not only help you last longer; it will also thrill your partner. The deep thrust pushes all of the air out of her vagina, creating a vacuum, which the shallow thrusts intensify. You want to avoid withdrawing completely, which breaks the seal of the vacuum; instead, pull back so that you are about an inch or so inside her. One multi-orgasmic man described his experience: "When I read about this Taoist thrusting technique I really didn't believe it would work, but women just go crazy: they love the shallow and deep. They orgasm a lot quicker and can have two or three before I get to one. In the past, I couldn't last long enough to get a woman to that point."

More important than any particular number of shallow and deep thrusts is practicing a basic rhythm that you can maintain and that both you and your partner can enjoy for prolonged periods of time. Don't allow your thrusting to become mechanical by getting lost in counting off numbers.

DEEP THRUSTS

When most men thrust deeply, they pull back all the way, which rubs the head of their penis – their most sensitive spot – against the full length of their partner's vagina. If you have difficulty getting or maintaining an erection, this in-out deep thrust is especially valuable (see the Soft Entry exercise). However, as you can imagine, this thrust is also highly arousing and ordinarily leads to quick ejaculation.

For this reason, the Taoist masters developed the up-down deep thrust. This thrust uses the base of your penis, which is your least sensitive spot, to stimulate your partner's clitoris, which is her most sensitive spot (see figure 21). The benefits for postponing ejaculation are obvious. Instead of pulling back, you can stay deep inside your partner and thrust up and down repeatedly. This is especially important when she is in the midst of orgasming and wants you deep inside her but you are close to the edge.

Keep in mind that women's clitorises differ in their proximity to the vagina, which may be one reason that some women are more easily orgasmic during intercourse than others. You will be able to stimulate some women clitorally just by using the up-down deep thrust, while others will need the help of your fingers. Either way, this thrust will help you immeasurably during the most intense throes of lovemaking.

DIFFERENT DIRECTIONS

In addition to depth, you can also vary the direction in which you thrust. According to Chinese medicine, the parts of the vagina, like the parts of the penis, correspond to the organs and glands of the body (see figure 22). To truly satisfy and energize your partner, you will need to stimulate her entire vagina during lovemaking. This may seem like a lot of work, and you will not be able to do it every time you make love, but the more of her vagina you can massage with your penis, the better.

Begin by thrusting shallow – left and right, top and bottom. Then thrust deep and, while staying deep, use the base of your shaft to rub up and down against your partner's clitoris and the head of your penis to rub gently against her cervix. Now pull back at an angle, which stimulates the walls of her vagina. (Once you have learned to differentiate between shallow and deep, you can also explore the middle depth.) Remember, women have different spots of greatest sensitivity, so thrusting in different directions has the greatest chance of satisfying your partner.

In addition to depth and direction, you can also vary the speed at which you thrust. The seventh-century physician Li Tung-hsüan Tzu waxed poetic about nine different kinds of thrusts that offer your partner a range of depths, directions, and speeds:

1. Strike left and right as a brave general breaking through the enemy's ranks. [The battle-of-the-sexes imagery was not completely absent from Taoist sexuality.]

2. Rise and suddenly plunge like a wild horse bucking through a mountain stream.

3. Push in and pull out like a flock of seagulls playing on the waves.

4. Use deep thrusts and shallow teasing strokes, like a sparrow plucking pieces of rice.

5. Make shallow and then deeper thrusts in steady succession [to the left and right], like a large stone sinking into the sea.

6. Push in slowly as a snake entering its hole.

7. Charge quickly like a frightened mouse running into its hole.

8. Hover and then strike like an eagle catching an elusive hare.

9. Rise up and then plunge down low like a great sailboat in a wild wind.

In the end you will put the various thrusts you have learned together in your own special pelvic rhythm depending on the time and place – and the pleasure desired.

The Advanced Art of Screwing

When most men thrust, they stimulate only a small part of their partner's entire vagina. This is why advanced Sexual Kung Fu involves "screwing" rather than "thrusting." Although the word screw has come to have vulgar connotations in our culture, it is actually quite accurate to describe the spiraling action the Tao suggests for truly pleasuring your partner (and yourself). Instead of thrusting forward and pulling back, you should "screw" your hips or ideally your sacrum in half circles, first on one side and then the other. One multi-orgasmic man explained his technique: "I will go in circling and come out circling. Play with one side and then play with the other side. I go shallow and then I go deeper, playing with one side and then the other. And then I do a lot more circles. And I've found that a lot of women really love this, especially when having their later orgasms."

More experienced lovers the world over have discovered the effectiveness of moving their hips during lovemaking, and many men find that rocking their shoulders initially helps them to rotate their sacrum or their hips. Your hips, however, are not nearly as subtle and effective as your sacrum, which sits at the center of the pelvis (see figure 23), According to the Tao, it is the sacrum that controls the penis.

FINDING THE WAY

Rotating Your Sacrum

At first your rotations will probably come from your hips or pelvis, since, unless you do a lot of Latin or African dance, you are probably not used to rotating your sacrum. Give it time, hut eventually you will be able to spiral, to “screw,” with subtle movements of your sacrum. To isolate your sacrum, put one hand on your pubis and one hand on your sacrum and try to spiral left and then right. Next, try tilting your penis up as you push your tailbone (the base of your sacrum) forward (curving your back out slightly), and then try tilting your penis down as you push your tailbone back (arching your spine slightly). Once you have isolated your sacrum, you can really screw.

According to the Tao, a nail (thrusting straight in) comes out easily, but a screw (circling) stays in a long time. Elvis Presley used these pelvic (actually, sacral) gyrations onstage to great effect and great popularity, and you will find that you are met with similar applause in the headroom once you master this technique.

There is even a time and a place for the old bedspring-squeaking hard thrusting, especially if' your partner likes very deep penetration and you have a lot at' control. One multi-orgasmic man explained: “Women usually like the hard thrusting later on after they are relaxed. If it's too soon, it can be a bit painful. So as the night goes on I find myself thrusting harder because their passion is ready for it. If it gets to be too much for me, I really need to breathe and if absolutely necessary sometimes to pull out and use my tongue and fingers.” One of the benefits of using a condom – one that we discuss in the section called "When to Start: A Few Words About Safer Sex” later in this chapter – is that by desensitizing your penis you can make your lovemaking last longer, especially if your partner wants you to thrust hard and deep. But you need to make sure you stay connected to your groin and monitor your rising arousal rate.

The more you practice, the more control you will develop and the less you will need to pull out. One multi-orgasmic man explained what he does when he approaches the point of no return: “When I am making love and start feeling like I am going to come, I really try to listen to my body, and share with my partner where I am and how close I am getting. And if I get real close, I’ll stop and do the deep breathing, which will get my body to relax.”

You are almost always better off starting with slow thrusts or spirals. (The Taoist practice is the opposite of the hurried, short, and selfish sentiment expressed in the popular description of male sexuality "Wham, barn, thank you, "ma’am.”) Like all physical and spiritual practices, lovemaking requires both discipline and innovation. You are interested in both: a general pattern of pleasurable thrusting/screwing and a variety of spontaneous changes in depth, speed, and direction.

The Big Draw for Two

We introduced the Big Draw technique before but will discuss it here for you to practice with your partner. In the Big Draw during lovemaking, you will both be trying to multiply and expand your orgasms within yourselves. In the Soul-Mating exercise described later in this chapter, you will also learn to exchange sexual energy with your partner, but for now simply learn to circulate your sexual energy within your own body.

We have divided this practice into its sequential stages so that you can learn it more easily, but when you use it with your partner, it should blend together into a fluid and graceful experience.

It may seem difficult at first to stop yourself from ejaculating given all the pleasurable sensations and expansive desire you feel with your partner. You should keep in mind that you are training your body in this practice and that each time you succeed it becomes easier the next time.

The time between when you start to experience arousal and when an orgasm is imminent is the time you should draw the energy up. If you wait too long, you may not be able to stop it from pouring out. As you become able to separate orgasm from ejaculation, you can draw the energy up as you are experiencing the contractile-phase genital contractions, expanding the orgasm throughout your body.

If you have trouble drawing the energy up to your head, first draw it up to your tailbone and feel it entering your sacrum and the point on your spine opposite your navel from where you can pour the energy into the navel. Once it has pooled there, try to draw it the rest of the way to your head.

TALKING WITH YOUR PARTNER

At first the Sexual Kung Fu practice may seem a little awkward and an interruption in your lovemaking, but it will quickly become increasingly natural and part of a less frenetic, but much more meaningful and pleasurable, style of lovemaking. However, in the meantime it will require support and patience from your partner, which is why it is important to explain to your partner what you are doing. One multi-orgasmic man remembered: “My girlfriend responded in a very open and positive way. Her reaction was certainly influenced by the fact that our sex quickly became more beautiful. It was also quite important that I practiced often by myself so I rarely had to interrupt our lovemaking to control ejaculation. Of course, it was certainly necessary to explain to my partner what I was doing so she could understand the process.”

You can encourage your partner to read, but if timing and passion do not afford you this opportunity, you will want to tell her in a few breathless words what you are doing. One multi-orgasmic man described how he explains his practice: “I tell the woman I am with that my sexual philosophy now is this Taoist philosophy. And I ask her for help. Usually I wait until after we’ve been in bed for a while, and I’ll say, ‘There’s going to come a time where I may need you to help me to stop. You know, I might need to withdraw, I might need to have a little bit of slowing down.’ So I let them know why I might want to do that, and what my thinking is. I find that women really respect it and they love hearing about it and it is exciting to them.”

THE BIG DRAW DURING LOVEMAKING

EMBRACE When you are both highly aroused, stop and hold each other. Look deeply into each other's eyes. Truly see your partner's inner goodness, and express the depth of your love for her with your eyes. Keeping your eyes open also helps bring the energy up. Send each other energy through your gaze, your lips, the palms of your hands, and the surface of your skin.

THRUST/SCREW When your partner is highly aroused, use the head of your penis to rub her inner vaginal lips and especially her clitoris. When she is ready, you will be able to tell by her swollen lips and clitoris and the abundance of her vaginal juices. Enter your partner slowly. You may want to start with a pattern of nine shallow thrusts and one deep thrust. (Remember, these are general guidelines, not rules.)

CONTRACT While still inside your partner, lightly contract the head and base of your penis and your PC muscle. You will be using your mind as well as your pelvic muscles to squeeze these "round" muscles. If necessary, use your fingers to squeeze the base of your penis.

PAUSE When you feel you are near orgasm, pull back so that only about an inch or two of your penis (the head, mostly) is inside your partner's vagina. Make sure you communicate to your partner that you are close to the edge and that she needs to avoid pushing you over the edge. (Pull out all the way only if absolutely necessary.)

DRAW Squeeze your anus and use your mind to draw the energy up from the tip of your penis, through your perineum and tailbone, and up your spine to your head (see the Cool Draw and the Big Draw). This will help spread the orgasmic energy from your genitals, decreasing the urge to ejaculate while expanding your orgasm from a genital orgasm to a whole-body orgasm.

RELAX Relaxing allows the blood vessels in your penis to dilate and allows you to exchange more of your sexual energy with your partner. Your erection may decrease somewhat, which will let the hormone-filled blood return to fortify the rest of your body and allow new blood to flow into your penis when you get hard again. Continue holding each other, kissing, and circulating energy. When ready, you can continue thrusting/screwing and repeat the Big Draw until both of you are completely satisfied.

It is essential that you tell your partner enough so that she can support your practice. As one multi-orgasmic man explained, “When I am really starting to feel my pumpers wanting to start to pump, I have to slow down more often and sort of just breathe and do the practice. And that’s when I start explaining to them what I am doing and why I am doing it, why it is important to me and I think it is important to both of us. Before I explain what I am doing, a lot of women, when I say I am about to come, will say, 'Well, come, come. I like it when you come.' That's when I say, 'I really appreciate that you want to do that for me, but I don't want to come because I don't want to fall asleep right away. I want to have fun. I want to keep my energy up.' And they just understand why, every once in a while, I will need to pull back and take some deep breaths."

Positions for Pleasure and Health

The Taoists were highly inventive in coming up with new and interesting sexual positions, However, for the Taoists these positions were not just for variety; each had a different energetic and healing function. They believed that love expressed through sexuality was the most potent medicine, and a Taoist physician might prescribe several weeks of dedicated lovemaking in a specific position for a particular ailment. If you want to explore these various positions with your partner and use them for self-healing, they are described in Healing Lowe Through the Tao: Cultivating Female Sexual Energy (see appendix). Here we will give the basic and most important positions;, as well as some general advice for whatever position you choose. These positions can help enormously in accommodating different body sizes and genital sizes, as well as stimulating different sexual sensitivities. As you and your partner refine your understanding of your sexual pleasures, you will be able to select positions that match these preferences.

FINDING THE WAY

Basic Guidelines

Before we discuss specific positions, there are two basic guidelines that will help you select the correct position for the mood and moment.

1. For relaxing and harmonizing with your partner, place similar body parts together: lips to lips, hands to hands, genitals to genitals. For stimulating and exciting one another, place dissimilar body parts together: lips to ear, mouth to genitals, genitals to anus.

2. The person who moves (generally the person on top) gives the most energy to the other partner. The person underneath can move as well to complement the movement of the person on top. This will help expand, circulate, and exchange the chi more quickly. In the West we assume that the person on top is dominant. How different is the Taoist understanding that the person on top is actually serving the other by sending the most healing energy to him or her. Passion and health, not power, are the main concerns of the skilled Taoist. Your lovemaking should observe these guidelines so that you and your partner both harmonize and excite, heal and are healed.

MAN ON TOP

Even before missionaries made their way to China, the Taoists were well acquainted with the position in which the man lies on top of the woman, usually supporting himself on his hands or elbows. One of the primary benefits of this position is that you and your partner can gaze into each other's eyes and kiss passionately. The face-to-face position is deeply satisfying to your emotions and sense organs, all five of which (eyes, tongue, ear, nose, and skin) come into direct contact. These organs, especially your tongue and eyes, are major carriers of life-force energy (see "Sexing the Spirit" later in this chapter).

In this position your partner can run her hand along your spine to help you draw your energy up to your head. Also in this position many parts of your body – legs, belly, chest, and so on – are in contact with hers, and your weight on your partner's pubic bone and breasts can help her become aroused quickly. This position also allows you to use your thrusting and screwing techniques, both to satisfy your partner and to maintain control of your arousal.

The main drawbacks of the position are that your hands are usually involved in holding yourself up and that your partner's G spot is bypassed almost entirely unless you tilt your sacrum and angle your penis up. You can address this problem by having your partner place a pillow under her buttocks so that her pelvis is tilted back. She can also drape her legs over your arms or shoulders, which has the same effect as the pillow and also allows you to penetrate more deeply. The higher her legs, the deeper the penetration. This is especially helpful if your partner has a relatively large vagina and you have a relatively small penis.

Remember that according to Taoism, man is like fire and woman is like water. Since women take longer to boil, it is often good for the man to begin on top. When the woman's desire is boiling and risks quenching the man's fire (causing him to ejaculate), you may wish to switch to the woman-on-top position, which allows the man to concentrate more easily. In this position, however, the woman must be willing to stop as the man draws close to the point of no return.

In this position, the man lies on his back and the woman straddles him. Most men find that this is the easiest position in which to learn to control their ejaculations and to become multi-orgasmic. The reason for this is that you can relax your pelvic muscles in this position and pay close attention to your arousal rate. Gravity also assists in ejaculatory control, and the man can focus on directing the energy up his spine.

Your partner, in this position, can also direct your penis to the most sensitive places in her vagina, including her G spot, which is one reason that for many women this is the easiest position in which to be (multi-)orgasmic. Your partner can also keep the head of your penis in the most sensitive outer two inches of her vagina. It is difficult for a man to remain in only the first two inches when he is on top, since he tends to want to plunge deeper into the tighter area – which, of course, also finishes him off faster. In this position your partner can spiral her sacrum so that your penis rubs against the walls of her vagina at any depth and in any direction.

In this position, you can also use your fingers to stimulate her clitoris and help her to climax. Another benefit of this position is that you can suck or fondle your partner's breasts while making love. According to the ancient Taoists, you can drink in your partner's sexual energy from her lips, her vagina, and her breasts.

This position is also especially good when the man is significantly larger than the woman or tends to ejaculate quickly, or when the woman is in the later months of pregnancy (her growing belly does not get squeezed). Older men and men with heart problems also find this position of great value, since they are not required to exert a lot of energy.

SIDE BY SIDE

This position requires relatively little exertion from either partner and is therefore good for later stages of lovemaking. It does require some skill to achieve and some coordination to maintain, so it is best for lovers who know each other well. It may be easiest to begin with you on top and for you to roll to the right or left into the side-by-side position. In addition to not requiring a great deal of strenuous effort, the position has the benefit of face-to-face and Whole-body contact, both of which allow for greater exchange of energy. However, it can be uncomfortable or awkward unless your partner's body movements and your own are well synchronized. And in this position the penetration of the penis is also quite shallow.

MAN FROM BEHIND

This is the way animals, whose main motivation is impregnation, do it, and with good reason. In this position, as you may have noticed, your partner's vagina feels especially tight, which makes ejaculatory control more difficult. This position is therefore best when you are feeling less aroused or have developed your skill at ejaculatory control. The reason your partner feels especially tight is that in this position you enter her deeply, which is the reason women who like especially deep penetration tend to favor this position. The depth can be controlled by your partner's angle: the more forward she bends, the deeper the penetration. This position is especially good for men with smaller penises or women with larger vaginas. This position also allows direct stimulation of your partner's G spot, although her clitoris receives relatively indirect stimulation – a situation you can remedy with your fingers.

SOUL-MATING (Exchanging Sexual Energy)

EXPANDING The pleasuring and thrusting and screwing techniques described earlier in this chapter will expand your and your partner's sexual energy to a point where it is ready to circulate. The more lubricated a woman is, the more yin energy she has. As we alluded to before, you can even drink her yin directly through oral sex or from the nipples of her breasts. It will help if you (and, ideally, your partner) have drawn the energy up and are circulating it through your own bodies (that is, through your Microcosmic Orbits).

EMBRACING Embrace your partner in a face-to-face position with most of your bodies in contact. If the woman is significantly lighter or weaker, she should be on top. Otherwise, it doesn't matter which person is on top. Remember to look deeply into each other's eyes: eye contact, as mentioned above, is extremely important. Send each other love and energy through your gaze.

BREATHING Coordinating your breathing is essential for exchanging chi. Now that you have stopped thrusting or screwing and are holding your partner close, place your nose next to your partner's ear and your ear next to your partner's nose. This will help you hear one another's breathing. Then synchronize your breathing: you can both inhale and exhale simultaneously, or one of you can inhale while the other exhales. Keep your thoughts focused on one another and be conscious of your chests rising and falling in rhythm with one another.

CIRCULATING To harmonize, both you and your partner must be able to circulate energy through your own Microcosmic Orbit as the first step toward balancing the Back Channel, which runs up your spine and is more yang, and the Front Channel, which runs down the front midline of your body and is more yin. Remember to draw energy up by contracting your anus and/or using your mind, and then to guide energy down the front of your body through your tongue.

EXCHANGING

1. After you have been breathing with one another for a while, you should each draw your energy from your genitals up to the crown of your head.

2. Then, while you are both inhaling, you should envision drawing her cool yin energy in from her vagina to your penis. (She should envision drawing your hot yang energy from your penis into her vagina.)

3. You should both continue drawing this energy back to your perineum and then up to your tailbone and finally up your spine to the crown of your head.

4. Then exhale and let the energy descend from the crown of your head through the midline between your eyebrows down your face and through your tongue – which, if your tongue is touching your partner's, will allow you to exchange energy through your mouths. From your tongue, the energy should be brought down the rest of your Front Channel to your navel. (You can also exchange energy from your heart through your chest to her breasts and from there down her Front Channel. She can do the same for you.)

5. Continue breathing and exchanging energy nine to eighteen times, or as long as you like.

Sexing the Spirit

It is no secret that most people experience transcendence more intensely in their bedrooms than they do in their churches, synagogues, temples, or mosques, Lovemaking allows us to transcend the limits of our physical body, to fuse with another human being, and occasionally even to feel at one with the universe.

According to the Tao, heaven and earth are constantly in sexual union, balancing and harmonizing one another. When we make love we can connect with this universal energy. Healing Tao instructor Stefan Siegrist explained: "With Taoist sexuality one can re-experience the lost harmony (or spiritual oneness) with nature and the universe that is often talked about in philosophy and religion." Unlike some religions, however, Taoism views sexuality and spirituality as inseparable. Spirituality is "embodied," and spirit is seen as permeating the entire physical world, including our own bodies.

According to the Tao, each of us has three overlapping types of energy. In this book, we have been working primarily with the most physical of these three, our ching-chi, or sexual energy. But as we cultivate this sexual energy, it is refined into chi, or bioelectric energy, which then spreads throughout our entire body. And this in turn is refined into shen, or spiritual energy. All three are interrelated and are connected to the body. In this section you will learn to circulate and refine your sexual energy with your partner. This technique will help you expand your orgasm from a purely physical experience to a spiritual one: this is the true nature of soul-mating.

YIN AND YANG

Most people who know anything about Taoism have heard about yin and yang and their complementary and cyclical positions in the symbol of the Tao. Most people know that yin is the feminine energy in the universe and that yang is its masculine counterpart. These two primordial energies are the electron and proton that allow all creation to occur and allow you and your partner to harmonize and refine your sexual energy. In the words of the I Ching, “The interaction of one yin and one yang is called Tao, and the resulting constant generative process is called 'change.'"

According to Su Nü, "Yang can function only with the cooperation of yin, yin can grow only in the presence of yang.” We have both masculine and feminine energies inside each of us, and yin and yang are dynamic forces that actually can change into one another. Many people in the West now argue that male and female are simply socially constructed gender terms. According to the Tao, however, although there is much variability from individual to individual, men generally have more yang (masculine) energy and women generally have more yin (feminine) energy. The Tao has always recognized that men are also partly feminine and women also partly masculine and that any binary opposition is clearly false. This idea is represented in the symbol of the Tao by a small circle representing the masculine within the feminine symbol and a small circle representing the feminine within the masculine symbol. Each contains a part of the other.

Though we should avoid binary opposition, we must be aware of our different needs, especially in the bedroom, or suffer the consequences. For example, yang is more quickly aroused and also more quickly extinguished; yin is more slowly aroused and more slowly extinguished. Because men tend to be more yang and women more yin, they also can help bring each other into better balance through the exchange of their energy during lovemaking. It is ideal if both partners are consciously aware of how this exchange takes place, and in the next chapter we explain what your partner will need to know about channeling her own energy. It is possible to feel the exchange of energy with a loving partner even if she does not know about Taoist sexuality, but it will be difficult to do exercise 13 without her active and informed participation. The more you can share with her, the easier and more powerful the exchange will be.

If you are having difficulty drawing your partner's energy up, you should contract your penis, your perineum, and your anus. Pumping these muscles lightly several times will help you draw the energy up. (You can also rhythmically sip up her energy with short breaths as in the Cool Draw exercise.) Once you have good control over your sexual energy and are not worried about ejaculating, you can send your hot yang energy out your penis and into your partner. She in turn should imagine sending her cool yin energy from her vagina to your penis. You cannot receive her yin energy without giving her your yang energy. Allowing her to absorb your excess yang energy will also help you avoid building up too much energy in your genitals and ejaculating. If you ejaculate, it is difficult to exchange energy, because you lose most of yours. Remember, it is the exchange that is important.

You will probably not be able to open all the points along the spine during your first exchange of sexual energy. It may take many times – it may even take months – but eventually you will feel the warm current between your mouths and between your genitals. "Sometimes," described one multi-orgasmic man, "when we are both orgasming we will be kissing passionately and will feel the energy going right through the both of us. Just driving through our tongues, down my body, through my penis, into her vagina, and up through her body back to our tongues, It is incredible."

At first the energy may seem so explosive that you have a hard time distinguishing between your and your partner's energy. However, eventually you will be able to distinguish between your partner's cool yin energy and your hot yang energy. If your partner does not know how to circulate her own energy, you can help her by a guiding the energy from your penis to her vagina, up her spine to her crown, down to her tongue and yours, and then back down her front to her vagina.

FINDING THE WAY

Spontaneous Energy Movements

Don't be surprised if at first the energy moves spontaneously and unpredictably. You may experience energy rising up the front midline of your bodies between you and your partner. Some couples experience energy shooting to the top of their heads and showering down over them, while others report feeling surrounded by a cocoon of energy. If you experience any of these, don't get worried. Just relax and enjoy the movement of these subtle energies through or around your bodies.

CULTIVATING YOUR ENERGY

After considerable practice, you will be able to open ever higher centers of energy, called tan-tien (or reservoirs; pronounced DON TYEN) by the Chinese. According to Taoism, one of these reservoirs exists at the level of your navel, another at your heart, and a third at your head (see figure 3). Michael Winn explains: "While in actual fact the entire body is one large interconnected tan tien, or field of energy, it is easiest to try to open each center sequentially. You must open the lower centers first to provide a strong platform for the higher ones."

Some yoga-trained Westerners confuse these reservoirs with the Hindu chakras, which have become popular synonyms for energy centers in the body. The seven or twelve chakras are generally more local and separated than the tan-tien, which are part of one large energy circuit, the Microcosmic Orbit, that envelops the entire body. Although Hindu Tantric philosophy is similar in many ways to Taoism, especially in its emphasis on conserving and transforming the power of sperm, the specific methods used in Tantra are different.

BECOMING ONE

This mutual opening of the Microcosmic Orbits of two lovers is the true fusion of sexual and spiritual energy. It can eventually result, after refining your sexual energy through elevated lovemaking and through meditation, in a prolonged orgasm and even an altered state of consciousness. According to Taoism, this orgasmic fusion of lovers occurs when yin and yang are in complete harmony. The more you learn to relax and to surrender yourself completely to your partner, the more likely it is that you will experience this extraordinary connection. According to one multi-orgasmic man, "Sex with my girlfriend is not the mechanical battle of bodies groping for momentary pleasure that it was, but a real exchange and a real union of our two bodies – almost as if our two bodies were merging into one.

This form of harmonizing is very powerful. When you can open and receive the loving energy of your partner, and in turn have your partner open to receive your energy, you will experience a blending and intimacy unlike anything else. Both of your energies, yin and yang, are part of the same universal energy; they are just charged differently. This is how you and your partner can truly become one flesh. When this flow of sexual energy between you reaches the right intensity and balance, your individual bodies will seem to dissolve into the ecstatic vibration of your circulating and pulsating energies. This is a true orgasm of body and soul. Assuming that other channels of communication and sharing are open in your relationship, this exchange of energy will help your love grow, and your mutual love will enrich those around you.

We often call healthy sexual union making love, and this is exactly what you are doing. Sexual energy expands and intensifies our emotions and attitudes. This is why sexual pleasure is popularly considered the highest bliss, and why the feeling of being in love is so intense and all-encompassing. On the negative side, it is also why lovers' quarrels are the most intense. So it is of paramount importance that you and your partner try to resolve emotional conflicts before you attempt to circulate sexual energy. Put another way, sexual energy is like fire: it can cook your food, and it can also burn your house down. It all depends on how it is used. If negative emotions arise while you are making love, stop or try to transform them into positive emotions by smiling and thinking about the positive qualities of your partner.

A genuine smile transmits loving energy, which has the power to warm and to heal. Recall a time when you were upset or physically ill and someone gave you a big smile; suddenly you felt better. Norman Cousins, a former editor of the Saturday Review, writes in Anatomy of an Illness that he cured himself of a rare connective tissue disease by watching old Marx Brothers movies. Smiling and laughter have the ability to transform negative energy into positive energy and to heal our bodies and minds. If you have a lot of negativity in general, you should try practicing the Inner Smile and the Six Healing Sounds.

When to Stop

As we mentioned most couples stop making love when the man ejaculates. There may be some cuddling or, during new hot and steamy relationships, another round of lovemaking after a refractory period (the time it takes to get another erection once you have ejaculated). But most people call it a night (or a morning or an afternoon) once the man ejaculates. As you may have guessed, with non-ejaculatory, multi-orgasmic sex, this ordinary end marker no longer exists. You and your partner can make love as long as you want.

Though, as we mentioned earlier, Taoist sexuality should not be an endurance test, when time allows, you may wish to spend an hour or two or more in a passionate and harmonizing embrace. (Don't forget to let your erection decrease some around every twenty minutes so the blood can recirculate.) The classic Taoist texts suggest that it takes one thousand loving thrusts to fully satisfy a woman. This may seem to involve man awful lot of effort and to demand great physical strength, but as Jolan Chang points out in his Tao of Love and Sex, if half an hour's run requires at least two-thousand steps, why shouldn't prolonged lovemaking involve a thousand or more thrusts? Of course, for most of us, our lives do not afford the time for this kind of intense session every night, and no couple will want such intensity all the time. However, to reach the higher levels of orgasmic and energizing lovemaking, it is important to set aside times when the phone is off the hook so that you and you partner can discover your true potential for pleasure. It's certainly better than going to the movies!

If your partner generally has more desire than you, Sexual Kung Fu may help save your love life. It will increase your sexual energy significantly and allow you to satisfy your partner's desire with ease. Though for most women one thousand loving thrusts will be paradise, for others with less sexual desire it may be purgatory. If your partner generally has less desire than you, she should definitely read the next chapter and try to expand her passion and her pleasure. Of course, if there are deeper psychological reasons that prevent either of you from expressing your sexual selves fully, you should seek help from a professional therapist. The ability of both partners to have multiple orgasms is a powerful aphrodisiac, but real, lasting satisfaction comes from a relationship based on sexual and emotional harmony.

How you end lovemaking is as important as how you start. As we explained in chapter 1, the loss of energy that most men experience after ejaculating makes it difficult for them to remain attentive and affectionate toward their partners. Since female sexuality is less precipitous, most women want to disengage more gradually, with tender words and caresses. As you master Sexual Kung Fu, you will no longer fall off the ejaculatory cliff and will be able to conclude lovemaking more gradually.

One multi-orgasmic man explained his experience: "Before, I didn't understand or want the kind of caressing and love talk after sex that my girlfriend did. Once I had had my ejaculation, I had no desire to caress my partner, to talk to her, or even to kiss her. But now during and even after lovemaking I have a deep desire to caress her body and to be tender to her. Her skin often feels like it is tingling with an electrical charge, which makes it soft like silk."

If your partner is (or becomes) multi-orgasmic, you will find that you can ride the waves of orgasm together for as long as you like, tuning your passion and your pleasure. If your partner is not multi-orgasmic, or even orgasmic, one thousand loving thrusts will give her the best possible chance of becoming so. More important, Taoist sexuality allows you to experience a profound intimacy that is difficult to describe in words and impossible to count in orgasms.

When to Start: A Few Words About Safer Sex

In his stand-up routine about sexually transmitted diseases, comedian Eddie Murphy echoed the general cultural anxiety around sex today: "AIDS, that ain't like the good old days when venereal disease was simple. In the good old days ya got gonorrhea, your dick hurt, you go get a shot – clear it right up. Then they came out with herpes. You keep that shit forever – like luggage. Now they got AIDS, that just kills motherfuckers. I say, What's next? I guess you just put your dick in and it explodes."

It is difficult to focus on the greater pleasure, intimacy, and spiritual growth possible through sexuality when you are worried about the health of your and your partner's physical body. For this reason, it is worth discussing the realities and logistics of safer sex. You may also be relieved to know that according to the Tao, when you practice Sexual Kung Fu and don't ejaculate, you greatly strengthen your immune system. You also obviously reduce the risk of exchanging a sexually transmitted disease through bodily fluids.

AIDS – acquired immune deficiency syndrome – is the disease that results from infection by the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV). Although AIDS is not the only sexually transmitted disease you need to be concerned about, it is certainly the most dangerous. AIDS is currently thought to be universally fatal, although it is not clear whether all people who are living with HIV will eventually develop AIDS. Those who die from AIDS usually do so because their immune system is so compromised that they cannot fight the opportunistic infections that often accompany AIDS. HIV is spread through bodily fluids – specifically, blood and semen. There is no evidence so far to suggest that HIV can be transmitted through saliva. Sexual practices that are safe or very low risk include hugging, massage, dry kissing (without exchanging saliva), and mutual masturbation. Sexual practices that are probably safe include French kissing, fellatio (without ejaculation), cunnilingus, and vaginal and anal intercourse with a condom.

Though the two main groups at risk are homosexual or bisexual men and intravenous drug users, heterosexual men and women are also at risk. This fact has created an atmosphere of panic that, although valuable in mobilizing the medical community and helping raise awareness about the importance of sexual education, has left most people with bedroom jitters.

Asking potential partners whether they have had an AIDS test or inquiring about their sexual history is as much a part of dating these days as asking about their employment or relatives. Many couples are getting tested for AIDS together. Although not yet considered a romantic date, getting tested is one way for couples to express their love and concern for one another's health and well-being.

Safer sex is recommended for any couple in which one partner could have been exposed to HIV. Couples interested in getting sexually involved should first have an HIV test, then use safer-sex techniques for six months, and then get a confirming HIV test. (It may take up to six months after infection for a person to test positive.) If both tests are negative, chances are very, very low that there is any more reason for concern, so long as the couple remains monogamous.

In the six months during which couples are waiting to take a second HIV test, they can engage in safer-sex techniques such as intercourse with a condom and mutual masturbation. In addition, they can each practice solo-cultivation techniques to develop their individual sexual and spiritual potential. Not only can using your hands to satisfy one another, a technique we mentioned earlier, allow you to have safer sex during the six-month waiting period, but it can also allow each of you to learn the subtle nuances of your individual arousal and pleasure that will help you become multi-orgasmic. Interrupting the routine also can allow you to explore new sensual and sexual pleasures while avoiding old coital scripts. Most important, harmonizing with your partner, according to the Tao, occurs at an energetic level that does not require intercourse. Caressing and even mutual meditation when gazing into one another's eyes can be profoundly intimate and satisfying experiences.

SAFER SAFER SEX

By not ejaculating, the man does not transfer as much bodily fluid (and, potentially, as many bacteria and viruses) to the woman. Also, by not ejaculating he does not draw in as much fluid (and, potentially, as many bacteria and viruses) from the woman. If you can excuse the comparison, your penis is a little like a turkey baster. When you ejaculate, you squeeze out your semen, creating a low-pressure vacuum, which then draws in liquid from your partner. By not creating this vacuum, you have less chance of transferring bacteria or viruses to or from your partner.

During nonejaculatory sex, bodily fluids can still be transferred (which is also the reason nonejaculatory sex alone is not a reliable birth-control technique). Still, nonejaculatory sex is safer than ejaculatory sex, especially if the condom breaks. (It also makes whatever birth-control method you use all the more effective.)

FINDING THE WAY

The Art and Science of Using Condoms

The good news about condoms is that the decreased sensitivity that most men experience can help a man control his ejaculation. The bad news about condoms is that they do decrease a man's sensitivity. Some men actually have difficulty keeping an erection while wearing a condom. If this is your situation, you or your partner should keep stroking your genitals while you put on the condom. Putting a small amount of lubricant on your penis before putting on the condom will also increase your sensitivity without causing the condom to slip off. Following are a few other things to keep in mind when using condoms.

1. Always use a condom before vaginal or anal intercourse. Also, try to use a condom with spermicide that contains nonoxyno1-9, which is effective in killing a variety of sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV. (If you develop a bright red inflammation on your penis or vulva as a reaction to nonoxyno1-9, switch to a brand without this germicide, but be extra careful.)

2. Always use a condom before your partner performs oral sex. In this case, your partner will probably want you to use a "dry" condom that is not lubricated and does not have nonoxyno1-9, which has a medicinal taste.

3. Leave half an inch of space at the top of plain-tip condoms. Reservoir-tip condoms are designed to create this space. Make sure that the condom covers your entire penis, and smooth the condom to squeeze out any air bubbles. If you are uncircumcised, pull back your foreskin before putting on the condom. If the condom starts to slip off, you can hold it on with your fingers.

4. Apply plenty of lubricant to the outside of the condom. (Not putting on enough lubricant is one of the major reasons that condoms break.) Use only water-based lubricants such as K-Y jelly or Astroglide. Petroleum-based lubricants such as Vaseline can cause latex condoms, dams, or gloves to disintegrate.

5. After intercourse, withdraw while you are still erect and hold the base of the condom to make sure it does not slip off. Throw away the condom and, especially if you have ejaculated, wash off your penis or put on a new condom before continuing to caress one another.

6. A condom generally slips off or breaks because it wasn't put on correctly, because sex was "too" vigorous, or because the condom was not held during withdrawal. If the condom breaks or comes off and you have not ejaculated or if the tear is near the base of the condom, you probably don't need to worry. Just remove the broken condom and put on a new one. If the condom breaks and you have ejaculated, safer-sex experts recommend that your partner urinate and insert spermicidal foam or jelly into her vagina to help destroy the sperm, viruses, and bacteria. She should leave the spermicide there for at least an hour. If you and your partner are concerned that she will get pregnant, your partner may wish to take the "morning after" pill, which she can obtain from her physician.

THE POWER TO CREATE AND DESTROY

The ease with which AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases spread is the pathological reminder of an essential Taoist insight into the nature of sexual intimacy: lovemaking is a physical and energetic exchange that can profoundly influence the health and well-being of both partners. In our Western emphasis on individuality and independence we have forgotten about this interdependence and interpenetration. The sexual revolution did not fully take into account the significance of this exchange. As sexually transmitted diseases such as herpes and AIDS will not let us forget, we are deeply affected by our sexual histories.

Although Western medicine recognizes that bacteria and viruses can be transmitted during intercourse, it has yet to recognize the rest of the biochemical and energetic exchange that takes place during sex. According to the Taoists, every time you and your partner make love you exchange hormones, enzymes, vitamins, and so on through your sexual secretions. This seems straightforward enough. Through the entwining of your bodies and your engorged genitals, the Taoists also believe, you exchange much more – physically, emotionally, and spiritually. It may be some time before Western science can distill and quantify the various components of this exchange, but if you practice Sexual Kung Fu, you will have the proof of this exchange in your own body.

Caution is an important response to the AIDS epidemic, but the fear that stalks our bedrooms misses the point. Sexuality has always been powerful; intercourse has always had the potential for miraculous creation or tragic destruction. Sex can heal us or hurt us. Respect and even awe, rather than fear, are the appropriate components of a healthy attitude toward sexuality, which the Taoists have always known was the true alchemy, the source of our life and health.

Satisfaction Guaranteed

For Women

This chapter is written for you as the female partner of a man who is practicing Sexual Kung Fu. (Kung fu literally means “practice," so Sexual Kung Fu simply means “sexual practice.”) This chapter will give you a brief explanation of what Taoist sexuality is and how it can help you and your partner have a more pleasurable, healthier, and more intimate love life.

Multiple Orgasms for Men?

The fact that men can have multiple orgasms is still so shocking to most of us, women and men alike, that you may find it hard to believe. As we mentioned in the introduction, it is worth remembering that only in the last forty years have female multiple orgasms been recognized and accepted as normal. Even more incredible is the number of women who have become multi-orgasmic – once they realized it was possible. Since the fifties, when Alfred Kinsey was conducting his famous studies of human sexuality, the percentage of women who experience multiple orgasms has tripled, from 14 percent to over 50 percent.

In the 1980s, sexologists William Hartman and Marilyn Fithian found that about 12 percent of the men they studied were multi-orgasmic. As your partner begins to recognize that he also has this potential and as you help him learn some simple techniques, he too will experience multiple orgasms. One partner of a multi-orgasmic man recalled: “The first time my boyfriend had an orgasm without ejaculating I couldn’t believe it. He was clearly experiencing as much pleasure as usual and I could feel his penis pulsating, but much to my surprise there was no semen and moments later we were able to continue making love. It’s still amazing to me that he can have such intense orgasms without ejaculating. Now I am surprised when he does ejaculate.” Another partner of a multi-orgasmic man described what she experiences when her partner has an orgasm without ejaculating: “My partner stops moving for a moment and moans and trembles. I can feel the strong throbbing of his penis deep inside me. Ordinarily that would be it, but not now.”

Yet multiple orgasms are just the beginning. In the West, we tend to see the "big 0" as the be-all and end-all of sexuality, and many women spend a great deal of time worrying about whether they are orgasmic, when they are orgasmic, and how they are orgasmic. In Taoist sexuality, experiencing an orgasm, one or many, is not the goal. These peaks of pleasure are just part of an ecstatic process of lovemaking. Once you and your partner learn to circulate sexual energy through your bodies, you can experience orgasmic waves of pleasure as often as you like. When you make love, you will experience a depth of intimacy – a physical, emotional, and even spiritual bond – that you may have rarely, if ever, felt before.

Why Me? Why Him? Why This?

Any kind of self-improvement, sexual as much as any other, requires some effort, and this book is written to teach your partner and you in clear, simple terms how to deepen your sexual lives and your relationship to one another.

If your partner has given you this chapter to read, you may be somewhat skeptical about this newfangled sexual practice x and wonder why you (and he) need it. You should know that the Tao (pronounced DOW) of sexuality is anything but new. It is at least a three-thousand-year-old tradition of accumulated wisdom recording how people can make love most pleasurably and most healthfully. Even the most seasoned lover can probably learn something from this treasure trove of experience. Interestingly, in the Taoist tradition most of the sex advisers (including the emperor’s own consultants) were women. How different from the West, where until recently almost all sex advice was given by men – if given at all.

Especially if your sexual relationship is already rich and satisfying, you may be wondering why you need to read a book about "doing what comes naturally.” Though all people have instinctual sexual desire, what we do with this desire and how we maintain and cultivate it over a lifetime are anything but obvious. In the West, we take for granted that couples will lose their passion for one another over the years, but according to the Tao this is not a law of nature and in fact this attraction never needs to wither. (We talk more about this in the final chapter, “Making Love for a Lifetime.”)

If you bought this book for your partner or to learn more about male sexuality, you may be very eager to help your lover become multi-orgasmic. Nonetheless, you may feel that you spend too much time trying to please your partner, and certainly there are many women who do just that. This book, however, is not about your pleasing him. One of the main benefits of Taoist sexuality is that it teaches your partner how he can cultivate his sexual skill and how he can better please you. Though this book is entitled The Multi-Orgasmic Man, it could just as well have been called The Multi-Orgasmic Couple. In the words of one partner of a multi-orgasmic man, "When my husband started practicing Sexual Kung Fu, I began experiencing multiple orgasms much more often. This is a very special gift."

LASTING PLEASURE

In our society, women are told that they need to please their men sexually. In Taoist sexuality, a great many of the techniques were developed to help men please women. In the end, however, one partner's pleasure is inseparable from the other's, according to the Tao. The stereotype of marital relations in our society is of the frigid wife and the ever-desirous husband, but the truth is that there are many women who are more interested in making love than their partners, especially if their partners are being exhausted by sex that focuses on ejaculation.

The image of the unsatisfied woman whose lover ejaculates, grunts, and collapses on top of her is so common it has become a cultural joke. It is no wonder that many women lose interest in sex that is frenetic and lacks real connection, physical and emotional. This, too, is a stereotype, and all surveys show that in recent years men have been trying harder to please their partners and to last longer in bed.

Your lover probably does not grunt or collapse on top of you if he is interested enough in his and your sexuality to read this book, but Taoist masters have long known that it is difficult for men to maintain an interest in satisfying their partners or in being intimate once they have ejaculated. One multi-orgasmic man explained his experience: "After I ejaculated I didn't want to and didn't understand her need to caress and talk after sex. Now that I don't ejaculate, after lovemaking I love for us to lie together and caress each other slowly, almost in sort of a meditation."

BEYOND THE BIG BANG

Fortunately, the Taoists also discovered almost three thousand years ago that orgasm and ejaculation are not the same thing and that men can have orgasms (in fact, multiple orgasms) without ejaculating. This is possible because orgasm and ejaculation are two distinct physical processes, as has more recently been confirmed by Western medical science. The partner of a multi-orgasmic man explained how her husband changed once he learned to orgasm without ejaculating: "My husband used to get tired quickly after he ejaculated. And sometimes he would want to drink alcohol and he would tend to get impatient or annoyed easily. Now he is so energetic and loving.

Male sexuality in the West remains incorrectly focused on the inevitably disappointing goal of ejaculation ("getting off") instead of on the orgasmic process of lovemaking. The Multi-Orgasmic Man teaches your partner how to separate orgasm and ejaculation in his own body, allowing him to move beyond focusing on the momentary release of' ejaculation and to cultivate longer-lasting and more profound levels of sexual pleasure with you. Taoist sexuality will allow your partner to be more sensitive to your body as he becomes more sensitive to his own. By moving beyond the Big Bang theory of sexuality, which has often left women unsatisfied, it also allows men and women to harmonize their sexuality for ever-higher levels of intimacy and ecstasy.

SEXUAL HEALING

Sexual pleasure is, however, just one part of feeling good. Taoist sexuality can also help you and your partner stay healthier and possibly even, believe it or not, live longer. Sexual Kung Fu began as a branch of Chinese medicine, and the ancient Taoists were themselves doctors. As physicians they were concerned as much with the body's physical well-being as they were with its sexual satisfaction. Sexuality was seen as the most potent medicine, both curative and preventive. If you were sick, a Taoist doctor might very well prescribe – in addition to herbs and acupuncture – a two-week regimen of' lovemaking in certain positions. Now that's (to quote Aretha Franklin) Dr. Feel Good in the Morning.

There are other, more obvious benefits. With nonejaculatory lovemaking – in which the man orgasms but does not ejaculate – whatever birth control you use will be even more effective. Equally as important in these days of sexually transmitted diseases and concern over the transfer of bodily fluids, nonejaculatory sex is also safer sex. Whatever other safer-sex precautions you take (using a condom, to take an obvious example) will be all the safer if your partner is not ejaculating. An added benefit is that nonejaculatory sex is less messy – no more wet spots or arguing over who has to sleep on them. Many Women also appreciate not having their partner's semen dripping out of their vagina, As one partner of a multi-orgasmic man put it, "My vagina felt like it was sparkling with my own secretions. I liked not having his sperm dripping out of me all night."

The kind of profound sexual intimacy that Taoist sexuality allows is not a relationship cure-all, or a replacement for other forms of communication, but it can deepen your love. Open and honest communication is an essential part of this practice, and it won't work if you just grin and bear it. There will be moments, as your partner is learning to control his ejaculation, when he asks you to stop moving or to help in some other way, but in general this momentary sacrifice will be rewarded with many, many more moments, minutes, hours of pleasure. However, sex should never be a sacrifice one partner makes for the other, and if necessary, he can always practice the techniques in this book on his own. This solo cultivation" is an important part of the practice and is not regarded with the same stigma that is associated with masturbation in the West. The most important factor in your partner's ability to become multi-orgasmic and in your and his ability to become a multi-orgasmic couple is your support and your sincere desire.

Helping Your Partner Become Multi-Orgasmic

The first thing you need to do before you can help your partner is overcome any resistance you may have to wanting him to become multi-orgasmic or to his doing the Sexual Kung Fu practice.

WILL OUR LOVEMAKING BECOME MECHANICAL? At first many women worry that lovemaking with their partner will become mechanical. As Dr. Barbara Keesling points out in her recent book, How to Make Love All Night (And Drive a Woman Wild), many women fear that the techniques for becoming multi-orgasmic that their partners learn will "turn their stud into a mechanical bull." She testifies that the experience takes a man "into his body, not away from it." As a sex therapist and former sex surrogate who has trained over one hundred men to become multi-orgasmic, she speaks from personal as well as professional experience.

Like learning to play a musical instrument, learning Sexual Kung Fu will take some time and effort and may be a little awkward at first. The best approach is to relax and have fun with it. One multi-orgasmic man described how Taoist sexuality can relax the tension that often exists around sexuality: "It is fun to talk about it; it is fun to laugh about it. It can relax the whole bedroom tension. Because I am talking frankly about my body, women will talk about theirs. I was with one woman who I was telling about my practice and all of a sudden she pulled out her vibrator, and she said, 'I was never going to show this to anyone because I've been so uptight about my sexuality. But I feel I can share anything with you because you were able to share this with me.'And that was really cool."

Most men learn about sex through masturbation and pornography. For whatever reasons – guilt, inexperience, fear of getting caught – most men learn to masturbate quickly. Pornography also generally takes men away from their bodies. It is no surprise then that most men are not very connected to their bodies or aware of their arousal rates. Taoist sexuality teaches men to learn their body's true potential to experience pleasure and to pleasure their partners. Although at first your partner will need to concentrate on learning to control his arousal rate and his urge to ejaculate, once he has this control he will be much better able to concentrate on you and on the profound process of lovemaking you are both engaged in.

DOESN'T A MAN NEED TO EJACULATE TO BE TRULY SATISFIED? Some women feel that pleasing their man means helping him ejaculate. This feeling is not surprising since most men do ejaculate at the end of lovemaking and many women hear from their first partners during the fever of adolescent petting that they will have pain in their genitals (often called blue balls or lover's nuts) if they don't ejaculate. This may be true for the bumping and grinding that often occurs during adolescence, but when your partner practices Sexual Kung Fu, he will no longer have the same need to ejaculate. One multi-orgasmic man explained: "Sometimes during lovemaking, especially if it was long and beautiful, my girlfriend wanted me to ejaculate. Still, I usually didn't ejaculate, and later she would see that there was no need for me to ejaculate and that I could much more deeply satisfy her and myself if I didn't."

After years of' having lovemaking concluded by your partner's ejaculating, however, you may have feelings about his no longer ejaculating every time. At first some women feel that they are less sexy or less capable lovers. Although this feeling is understandable, it is certainly not the case that they are any less sexy or capable, and it won't take long for you to see that your real success as a lover is dependent not on your partner's ejaculation but on his – and your – pleasure.

GETTING HIM HOT

Before you begin learning specific techniques to help your partner, there are a few basics you should know about male sexuality, if you don't already. This section is meant as a brief overview. A longer discussion of the subject appears in a previous chapter. (Also, you will find figure 2 useful in figuring out where everything is.) We tend to think of male sexuality as the penis – and what could be complex or hidden about this most obvious of organs? But the penis is really just the beginning.

Although most men can learn to experience sensation throughout their entire bodies through the whole-body orgasms described in this book, most of a man's sexual sensitivity remains, at least initially, in his groin. As Dr. Alex Comfort writes in his The New Joy of Sex, "Genital approach is how men get into the mood." Lampoon it, rail against it, or excuse it, but the truth is, that's the way it is for most men. The genitals are of central importance to most male sexuality, but the genitals are not simply the penis.

Besides the penis itself, and especially the head of the penis, which has the most nerve endings, the testicles are often very sensitive for a man (although they must be treated more gently than the penis). It is important to keep in mind that your partner may not get an erection or may even lose his erection when his testicles are being stimulated. This does not mean he is not experiencing intense pleasure, but the lack or loss of an erection can often cause him or you to worry. Your conveying to him that you know this is a normal part of his arousal will help him lay these fears to rest.

It is worth keeping in mind that when a man lies on his back, a gravity draws blood away from his erection. If your partner is having trouble getting or maintaining an erection, it is best for him not to be on his back. You can also help him get an erection by encircling the base of his penis with your thumb and forefinger. By squeezing these together in a snug ring, you can help prevent the blood from leaving his erection as you stimulate him with your other hand or mouth.

The perineum, the area between the testicles and anus, is also highly sensitive. The anus, too, is very sensitive, but for many men – as for many women – it is taboo, so approach slowly or ask first. The inner thighs can also be very responsive. Many men also enjoy nipple stimulation and experience nipple erections just like women. Some require persistent, regular stimulation to awaken these nerves, while others never warm to this touch no matter how much they (or you) try.

It is also worth remembering that a man's erection is directly connected to his self-esteem. The famous fragile male ego is all the more fragile in bed. Most men know very little about the bedroom arts and not only worry about what they don't know but feel they are supposed to know everything. As a result, it is best to try not to criticize. If your partner is doing something you don't like, tell him what you would like him to do rather than criticize what he is doing wrong. (Later, away from the heat of passion, you can for future reference tell him what you don't like. Developing an open channel of communication about sex away from the bedroom is very important for a healthy sex life.) Finally, the sound of a woman's genuine pleasure is the greatest aphrodisiac. The more you can share your enjoyment with him, the more he'll know what you like and the more excited he will become. Your sexual pleasure will expand his, as his will yours.

COOLING HIM OFF

Now that we've discussed how to get your partner all hot and bothered, it's time to learn how to cool him off. This is the real challenge for most men, and anything you can do to help will be much appreciated. You can tell when he is approaching the point of no return ("ejaculatory inevitability") by reading his bodily signs. Before your partner can ejaculate, his scrotum will have to draw in close to his body. (This happens less as men get older.) The muscles in his thighs and stomach may also become tense and his body rigid, and his voice or breathing may change.

STOPPING The most important thing you can do to help him keep from going beyond the point of no return is to stop moving when he signals with his voice or body that he is getting too close. Male orgasm takes place just before the precipice of ejaculation. For your partner to become multi-orgasmic, he must learn to experience an orgasm without falling over the edge of ejaculation.

Imagine that your partner is in a hang glider. He is running toward a cliff, and he must learn to take off and soar into nonejaculatory orgasms just before he falls down the steep slope of ejaculation. If you move when he is close to the edge, you may push him over and down into the ravine of postejaculatory stupor. If you are able to stop for a moment while he regains control of his arousal, you will be able to soar together. If he goes over the cliff, he will be lying on the rocks below just as you are ready to take off.

ASKING Helping your partner to be aware of his arousal and his proximity to the point of no return will also help him at first. This does not mean you have to be detached or act as an observer, but simply that you let him know if you notice he is getting too close to the edge. One multi-orgasmic man described how his partner helps: "My girlfriend will ask whether I am close if she sees that I am. And that really helps remind me to be aware of my arousal. You might think that talking about how close I am would interrupt lovemaking, but it never does. It makes it fuller because there is more sharing, there is better communication, which is the key to any relationship whether you are in the bedroom or not."

ENCOURAGING It is better to focus on the process of lovemaking than on not ejaculating. As one multi-orgasmic man explained, "My wife would say, 'Don't come yet.' Well, that would (make me ejaculate more quickly because I would be focusing on ejaculating. What we found is that when she says, 'I feel good' or 'This is great!' this stroking, if you will, of the male ego helps me regain my control and not ejaculate." Any successful coach tells her team what they should do, not what they shouldn't, since the body is more likely to do what the mind is thinking about.

BREATHING Your partner will also be using his breathing to help him control his arousal. When he gets close to ejaculating, he may breathe deeply and slowly or shallowly and quickly. The first helps him control his sexual energy and the second helps him disperse it. Whichever he finds works for him, it is very helpful if you remind him to breathe or breathe with him. Harmonizing your and his breathing is also part of the couples practice which can help the two of you connect with one another more deeply.

CIRCULATING The most important technique your partner will be using to delay ejaculation is the pumping of his sexual energy away from his genitals and up through his spine to the rest of his body. If the sexual energy continues to build up in his groin, it will eventually he too great to control and will shoot out in the most direct way it can – through his penis. However, if he draws this energy away, it will be much easier for him to stop his urge to ejaculate.

Learning to circulate energy through the body is the secret to whole-body orgasms for both of you. You can help your partner circulate his sexual energy by running your hands up his spine from his tailbone to his head, helping him to draw the energy up. In general, as Senior Healing Tao instructor Michael Winn explains, "The more a woman can touch and stroke a man's whole body and help him be less penis oriented, the easier it will be for him to move the energy out of his penis and to other parts of his body." Circulating energy yourself can help intensify your own orgasms and energize you. It will also help you to experience greater intimacy and ecstasy together.

The techniques we have described are essential for helping your partner keep his cool when you are in the throes of passionate lovemaking. You or your partner can also use a number of more mechanical techniques to help him avoid ejaculating as well.

SQUEEZING The squeeze technique was originally developed for men who ejaculate "prematurely." (If your partner ejaculates quickly, be sure you and he read the section called "It's Not Over Till It's Over: Ending Premature Ejaculation".) The squeeze technique is quite simple: when your partner is getting close to ejaculating, you can place your thumb on the underside of his penis and squeeze. Another method is for one of you to grip his penis as you would the handlebar of a bicycle and to press your thumb down on the tip (see figure 8b). You or he can also squeeze the base of his penis between your thumb and first two fingers. Any of these methods will help your partner stop the urge to ejaculate and draw his sexual energy out of his penis and away from his genitals.

The obvious problem with the squeeze technique is that you need to stop intercourse and your partner will need to pull out. In the past, women who practiced the Tao were able to use their vaginal (what we now call the PC) muscle to squeeze the head of their partner's penis, which would also help prevent him from ejaculating. You may want to experiment with this technique as well after reading the section later in this chapter called "Strengthening Your Sex Muscle."

PRESSING The Taoist sages discovered a spot on the perineum, called the Million-Dollar Point, that they found was extremely helpful in stopping men from ejaculating. It was originally called the Million-Gold-Piece Point because that is what it cost a man to have a Taoist master show him where it was. (The Taoist sages were not too holy to get paid.) Your partner's Million-Dollar Point is located just in front of his anus (see figure 2). There should he an indentation at the correct spot. If your partner presses his finger into this spot and contracts his PC muscle, he can help delay ejaculation by focusing his attention and interrupting his ejaculatory reflex. It is important for you to know what he is doing if he starts pushing on his perineum during lovemaking. If you and your partner know each other's bodies well and have a lot of experience in bed together, you can help him delay ejaculation by pressing on this spot during intercourse. You will need to push your finger in up to about your first joint. It is necessary to apply firm (although not too hard), consistent pressure for a moment or two.

Once he has passed the point of no return, your partner can also press on this spot while squeezing his PC muscle to stop the semen from leaving his body and thus avoid losing all of the hormones and nutrients in his semen. This more complex manipulation, which we call the Finger Lock and described is probably best left up to him, but you should know what he is up to. If he uses the Finger Lock to conserve his semen, he will still lose his erection, but many men report that it returns more quickly. Keep in mind that the Finger Lock should not be used as a form of birth control or safer sex, since some semen may leak out.

You can also press your finger rhythmically at the Million-Dollar Point, an action that mimics the prostate contractions he experiences during orgasm and that can be very pleasurable for your partner. However, this rhythmic pressure should not be used when he is close to the edge, for it will very likely push him over into ejaculation.

PULLING Because your partner's testicles have to pull up close to his body in order for the semen to be propelled out of the testes, pulling them away from the body can delay his ejaculating. You can help him by gently pulling down on his testicles. Circle your thumb and forefinger just as you did earlier to help him maintain his erection. Instead of circling the base of his penis, however, this time you will circle the top of his testicles (see figure 9 on page 51). Then you will pull down firmly. (Remember, a man's testicles are extremely sensitive and should be handled with care.)

The more you support your partner's practice, the easier it will be for him and the better your lovemaking will become. As a woman, your sexual ability is naturally stronger than your partner's. The Taoists compare a man's sexual arousal to fire and a woman's to water. Fire is easily ignited but easily extinguished. Water is slow to boil but able to maintain its heat for a long time. Water is always stronger than fire and can easily quench it. The Taoists strive to v teach men how they can last long enough to bring their partner's desire to the boiling point. This ability, they know, is the basis for sexual satisfaction for both partners. In addition to helping your partner control his fire, you can also learn to help bring yourself to the boiling point. Whether you are currently preorgasmic, orgasmic, or multi-orgasmic, the most important thing you can do to help your partner and yourself is to cultivate your own sexuality and to realize your own potential for pleasure.

Helping Yourself Become Multi-Orgasmic

Unlike the male orgasm, which has received very little scrutiny, the female orgasm has been the subject of countless volumes over the last century – most written by men, of course. (We discuss this research and its most important findings in the section called "Her Orgasm".) In the West, much controversy has surrounded the exact nature of the female orgasm – vaginal, clitoral, or a blend of the two. Unfortunately, much of this investigation has really been an attempt to create an "ideal" female orgasm. We believe, along with sexologists Hartman, Fithian, and Campbell, that each woman has an orgasmic pattern that is so individual it can be called her orgasmic fingerprint. We also recognize that, even for the same woman, each orgasm has its own specific characteristics, sensations, and levels of satisfaction. (As men move beyond the Big Bang ejaculatory orgasm, they discover that they can have a variety of orgasms, too.)

As far as women's genital orgasms go, the most recent research suggests that there are actually two different nerves involved: the pudendal nerve, which goes to the clitoris; and the pelvic nerve, which goes to the vagina and uterus (see figure 30). The fact that there are two nerves might explain why many women experience clitoral and vaginal orgasms differently. The fact that the two nerves overlap in the spine may also explain why some women experience "blended" orgasms. According to the Tao, genital orgasms – clitoral, vaginal, or blended – are just the beginning. The Taoists have known all along that you can feel orgasmic pulsations and pleasure in any part of your body – your clitoris, your vagina, your brain, even your internal organs.

YOUR CLITORIS

About 70 percent of all women require some clitoral stimulation to have an orgasm, perhaps because the pudendal nerve, which goes to the clitoris, has more nerve endings than the pelvic nerve to the vagina. In most lovemaking positions, the man directly stimulates the most sensitive part of his penis, the head, while the woman only indirectly stimulates the most sensitive part of her sexual anatomy, the clitoris.

Encouraging your partner, as we do in this book, to stimulate your clitoris during lovemaking is a clear way to help yourself become more orgasmic. Though it may seem a little awkward at first as he is learning to coordinate the rhythm of his fingers with the rhythm of his hips, it will soon become a smooth and satisfying part of your lovemaking. You can also help him by guiding his hand to where you would like it to be and even using your fingers to press his fingers into your clitoris, which will show him the place and the amount of pressure you like. If you are vaginally orgasmic you may not need or want clitoral stimulation all the time when you are making love. Your hand can guide your partner's, depending on what your pleasure calls for.

Some women are bashful about asking for what they want, but many studies have shown that women who are able to ask for or show their partners what they want will much more often get it. Female sexual passivity and reticence are an outdated holdover from Victorian attitudes. There are few things as arousing to a man as an active and excited partner. Passive and active, according to the Tao, are complementary parts of all sexuality, both male and female.

Sometimes it may be easiest for you to help yourself have an orgasm by squeezing your thighs or directly touching your clitoris during lovemaking. You may be interested to know that although we often think of men as able to reach orgasm much faster than women during intercourse, women have actually been shown to be able to orgasm just as quickly as men when they pleasure themselves. According to a study of multi-orgasmic women conducted by sex researchers at the University of Wisconsin, multi-orgasmic women were more likely to "enhance clitoral stimulation during intercourse by thigh pressure or masturbation."' The multi-orgasmic women were also more likely to enjoy having their breasts fondled and their nipples kissed, to give and receive oral sex, to use erotic fantasies, literature, and films, and to have a sensitive partner to whom they could communicate their needs. The study concluded that women don't become multi-orgasmic by accident. They choose the techniques that maximize their pleasure and tell their partners about them.

Many women are ashamed to self-pleasure with their partner or even by themselves. With the amount of stigma surrounding masturbation, this anxiety is quite understandable. If this is an issue for you, please read the section called "Self-Pleasuring and Self-Cultivation". Here let us just say that self-pleasuring is a healthy and important way of cultivating your sexuality that complements lovemaking and does not replace it. Human Sexuality, a book published by the American Medical Association states that women tend to self-pleasure more as they grow older. The more you take an active role in your pleasure, the more likely you are to reach your full sexual potential. In the wise words of one businesswoman in her late fifties, "In life, everyone is responsible for their own orgasm."

There are two factors that generally influence whether a woman is able to have vaginal or blended orgasms as well as clitoral orgasms: the sensitivity of her G spot or other internal spots, and the strength of her PC muscle.

YOUR G SPOT AND OTHER SENSITIVE SPOTS

You may have heard about a place in your vagina that when touched is supposed to drive you wild. This place is often called the G spot, named for physician Ernest Gräfenberg, who first described it in 1950. More recently, it has also been called the inner trigger point and the urethral sponge. Although the idea of the G spot is not new, it is still controversial, some women finding the G spot and others not. The current theory is that the G spot is a collection of glands, ducts, blood vessels, and nerve endings that surround a woman's urethra.

So where exactly is it? Most women who report finding their G spot describe it as located one and a half to two inches from the opening of their vagina. You can feel it through the upper front wall, just behind your pubic bone (see figure 18). If you imagine a clock with your clitoris as twelve o'clock, the G spot is usually somewhere between eleven and one.

When you are not aroused, your G spot is difficult to find. When stimulated, it can swell to the size of a dime or larger, standing out from the wall of the vagina. Alan and Donna Brauer suggest that the best time to find it is just after you have orgasmed: "It is already somewhat enlarged and sensitive. It often feels like little ridges or tiny bumps." They recommend stroking it (or having your partner stroke it) at the rate of about once a second and experimenting with both lighter and heavier pressure. Another good time to stimulate the G spot is when you are just approaching orgasm, since you are more likely to enjoy G-spot stimulation once you are already highly aroused.

You should be aware that some women feel initial discomfort or the urge to urinate when their G spot is stimulated. This is normal. If it happens to you, the Brauers suggest lightening your touch or telling your partner to lighten his. It may take as much as a minute for the discomfort or seeming need to urinate to be replaced with pleasurable sensations. If you are concerned about urinating, you might urinate before lovemaking or try finding the G spot while sitting on the toilet, which will allow you to feel confident that your bladder is empty.

In the common face-to-face or missionary position, your partner's penis often misses your G spot completely. It is easier for your partner to stimulate it if you lie on your stomach and your partner enters you from behind, or if you are on top, where you can position yourself for maximum pleasure. Shallow thrusting is also best for stimulating the G spot. However, fingers (yours or his) are usually the most direct and effective way to get to the G spot at first.

Some women report that their most sensitive spots are located at the four o'clock and eight o'clock positions about midway back along the walls of the vagina. There are nerve bundles at these locations, which may explain their sensitivity to pressure. Other women find that they are most sensitive at the back of their vagina. As your partner learns shallow and deep thrusting in different directions (what we call screwing), he will be able to stimulate these spots and others that are all your own.

Most women are able to rotate their pelvis when they are on top to direct their partner's penis to their most sensitive spots. As we discussed, there are many benefits to this woman-on-top position, and not only for the woman, since many men have an easier time learning to be multi-orgasmic when they are on the bottom. However, this position also has its disadvantages: the angle of penetration in this position can make your partner's penis seem as much as an inch shorter than in other positions, and it is more difficult for your partner to maintain an erection for an extended period of time, since gravity tends to draw blood out of his penis. When women are on the bottom, they often do not realize that they can actively rotate their pelvis, and especially their sacrum, to guide their partner's penis to their most sensitive spots. Once you and your partner learn to rock 'n' roll your pelvises, you will really be "dirty" dancing. (For a longer discussion about various lovemaking positions, see the section called "Positions for Pleasure and Health".)

YOUR SEX MUSCLE

Your sex muscle, or pubococcygeus muscle (often simply called the PC muscle), is the muscular sling that stretches from your pubic bone in front to your tailbone in back (see figure 31), encircling your urethra, vagina, and anus. It forms a sling that supports not only your uterus, fallopian tubes, and ovaries, but all of your internal organs. If your PC muscle isn't strong, you have no foundation for your organs and they can begin to sag.

Most women will recognize the PC as the muscle they use to stop themselves from urinating when they can't find a toilet. It is also the perineal muscle that must be strong and flexible to avoid tearing during childbirth. Still, the strain of childbirth can weaken your PC muscle. As Senior Healing Tao instructor and acupuncturist Dr. Angela Shen explains, "Especially after a woman has a baby, she has a tendency to get tired more easily and not to enjoy sex as much. Not all women, but many." For these women, Sexual Kung Fu can help them regain their energy and sexual strength.

The importance of the PC muscle was discovered in the West during the 1940s by Arnold Kegel, a gynecologist. He developed the famous Kegel (pronounced KAY-gul) exercises, which helped many women control their bladders and ease childbirth. Later, women began to use these exercises to increase their sexual desire, intensify their orgasms, and become multi-orgasmic. Dr. Shen points out: "All women can experience more orgasms and expand the ones they have by doing these practices."

FINDING YOUR PC MUSCLE

The easiest way to find your PC muscle is to stop the flow of urine by clamping down the muscles in your pelvis the next time you are urinating. Make sure you keep your stomach and legs relaxed. You want to try to isolate your PC muscle. If you have a strong PC muscle, you should be able to stop the flow of urine midstream and then start it again. If this is difficult for you and some urine dribbles out during your contraction, your PC muscle is weak, Not to worry: it will quickly strengthen with practice. If you find it easy to stop and start your urine flow, your PC muscle is strong. Nonetheless, you will still expand your sexual pleasure and your overall health by practicing PC exercises.

Strengthening this muscle will not only improve your sex life, but will also help you avoid bladder problems in the future (or improve bladder problems that you may already have). Stopping the flow of urine may sting at first. This is a perfectly normal reaction and should stop within a few weeks, unless for some reason you have an infection, in which case you should wait until you have seen a doctor and cleared it up before continuing with the practice. If your muscles become sore, you just need practice.

PARTNER EXERCISE 1

STOPPING THE STREAM

1. Exhale slowly and forcefully, pushing out the urine.
2. Inhale and contract your PC muscle to stop the flow of urine midstream. (Make sure your stomach and legs are relaxed.)
3. Exhale and start urinating again.
4. Repeat steps 2 and 3 four or five times or until you have finished urinating.

PARTNER EXERCISE 2

PC PULL-UPS

1. Inhale and concentrate on your vagina.
2. As you exhale, contract your PC muscle and the muscles around your eyes and mouth.
3. Inhale and relax, releasing your PC, eye, and mouth muscles.
4. Repeat, contracting your muscles as you exhale and releasing them as you inhale, nine to thirty-six times.

STRENGTHENING YOUR SEX MUSCLE

There are many different exercises for strengthening your PC muscle that have been taught in the West, most of them adaptations of Kegel's original technique. All of these teach you to contract and relax the PC muscle, although the number of repetitions and the amount of time they suggest you hold the contractions vary widely. The PC Pull-Ups exercise is based on a traditional Taoist technique. It also uses the Taoist awareness that the circular muscles of the body (those in your eyes, mouth, perineum, and anus) are connected. By squeezing the muscles around your eyes and mouth, you can increase the force of your PC Pull-Ups.

Although contracting your eyes and lips will help you squeeze your PC muscle around your vagina, the most important part of the practice is simply contracting and releasing your PC muscle as often as you can, which you can do practically anywhere – while driving, while watching TV, while sending a fax, while in a boring meeting. You can see how many contractions you can do during a red light, or you can hold a single contraction until the light turns green.

Eventually you will be able to do the contractions with less effort and without contracting your eyes and lips. Try to do the exercise at least two or three times a day, although you can do it is as many times as you like. Your muscles may get sore, just as they do after you do any exercise. Don't push yourself too far; just increase the repetitions gradually. Consistency is more important than quantity. One way to develop a daily routine is to connect your practice to daily events, like getting up in the morning, taking a shower, or lying in bed at night.

Another, even more effective way to strengthen your PC muscle is to squeeze the muscle against something – your finger, your partner's finger, a vibrator, a dildo, or your partner's penis. The resistance will help you better squeeze the muscle. Try squeezing your fist. You can tighten it only so much, but if you try squeezing your fist around a finger or two of your other hand, you will be able to tighten it even more. The same concept applies to your PC muscle. If you are practicing with a partner, you can squeeze on your partner's finger or penis and he can tell you how strong your PC muscle is. If you are having intercourse, each of you can alternate squeezing your PC muscles. When you contract yours, you will tighten around his penis and increase sensations for both of you. When he squeezes his, he will raise his erection toward his belly and possibly stimulate your G spot. Another highly enjoyable practice is for you to relax your PC muscle when you thrust together and then tighten your PC muscle when you separate. This will increase the feeling of suction during intercourse and can be very arousing for both of you.

STRENGTHENING YOUR ENTIRE VAGINA

In China, women used a special egg-shaped stone to strengthen their PC and other vaginal muscles. We have found jade stone, shaped like an egg, to be best. Doing PC Pull-Ups will certainly strengthen your PC muscle considerably, but you can accelerate the process dramatically by using a stone egg for resistance. In the West, physicians are now prescribing exercises with stainless-steel weights, called weighted tampons, to strengthen women's pelvic muscles, especially for women who have trouble controlling their bladder, often after childbirth.' But childbirth and pelvic health are not the only reasons to do the egg practice. Women who are knowledgeable in the Tao have used this practice for millennia to increase their vaginal-muscle control for increasing their and their partner's sexual pleasure.

PARTNER EXERCISE 3

STRENGTHENING YOUR ENTIRE VAGINA

1. Insert a stone egg while standing or sitting. (If you do not feel sufficiently lubricated, you can moisten the egg with water, saliva, or a water-soluble lubricant (for example, K-Y jelly).
2. Contract your PC muscle to pull the egg into your vagina and then bear down slightly and push the egg out toward the opening of your vagina.
3. Repeat this in-and-out movement nine, eighteen, or thirty-six times.
4. When you are done, bear down more forcefully and expel your egg.

The egg practice is quite simple. You insert a lubricated egg into your vagina (as you would a tampon) and then use your vaginal muscles to move it up and down. Once the egg is deeper inside, you may not feel it at all, but you can continue moving the egg up and down by squeezing your perineum and vagina to move the egg up and then bearing down slightly (as you would to have a bowel movement) to move the egg back down (see figure 32). Then you can squeeze your perineum and vagina to push it up once again and then push it back down. You can do this exercise for two minutes and then, bearing down more forcefully, expel the egg.

Senior Healing Tao instructor Marcia Kerwit explains how to prepare and take care of your stone egg: “When you get your egg home, you first want to sterilize it, which you can do by boiling it for ten minutes or soaking it in a solution of one part household bleach to ten parts of water for ten minutes. Rinse it well. You need to sterilize your egg only the first time you use it. After that, you can rinse it off with soap and water after each use, or just soak it in a vinegar solution.”

You can order a drilled jade egg from the Healing Tao Center, which will allow you to loop dental floss through your egg and leave the floss hanging outside your vagina, so that after practicing you can pull it out easily, just like a tampon. One advantage of using the drilled egg with the dental-floss tail is that as you move your egg up and down in your vagina, you can feel the string moving as well, so you will feel that it is actually moving and how far. (You will find more details about the egg exercise and other Sexual Kung Fu exercises for women in Healing Love Through the Tao: (cultivating Female Sexual Energy)

FINDING THE WAY

What If...

MY EGG IS STUCK

If you use an egg without a string, it may occasionally feel like it’s stuck. If this happens, the most important thing is not to panic. Remember, the egg can’t go very far. Calmly, see if your vagina feels dry inside. If so, you can use your finger to put some more (water-based) lubricant in your vagina and around the opening. Try squatting down or sitting on the toilet and bearing down to push the egg out. If the egg still does not come out, you can try jumping up and down and laughing. Then try squatting and bearing down again. If the egg still has not come out, go do something else.

During this time, your muscles will relax and the egg will most likely move on its own and be easier to expel. Finally, you can insert your finger (or, more easily, a friend or partner can insert one) and direct the egg out. This should allow you to get the egg out, but if you are still having a problem, call a Healing Tao instructor. If you use a drilled egg that has string looped through it, you will never have this problem.

MY EGG SMELLS FUNNY WHEN I TAKE IT OUT

An unusual smell to your secretions could indicate a vaginal infection. This has nothing to do with using the egg, but you should not do the egg exercises (or the Big Draw) until the infection is gone. There are many simple home remedies for vaginal infections. Speak to someone at a women’s clinic or to a health practitioner.

You may find that doing these exercises and strengthening your PC muscle in general can cause you to become sexually aroused. The reason to develop your PC muscle in the first place is to reach your orgasmic potential, and if your partner is a multi-orgasmic man, you should have no problem satisfying your increased desire. If you do not have a partner or your partner is not around, you can either pleasure yourself or use the Big Draw exercise described later in this chapter to move your sexual energy away from your genitals and to the rest of your body, where it will energize and rejuvenate you.

DEEP VAGINAL AND UTERINE ORGASMS

As we mentioned earlier, women have two different genital nerves: the pudendal, which connects to the clitoris and surrounding skin; and the pelvic, which connects to the vagina and the uterus. With some awareness and a little practice women can experience deep vaginal and uterine contractions. One multi-orgasmic woman described her experience: “First, I practiced by myself. I would tighten and release my vaginal muscles and then move these contractions up toward my uterus. Soon, the contractions would begin involuntarily during lovemaking. They were truly incredible."

These extremely pleasurable and powerful orgasms were well known in China to women who practiced the Tao and who were able to control their vaginal and uterine muscles through the egg practice. In the 1980s the Brauers studied these deep pelvic “push-out” contractions, which they called “extended sexual response." They even noticed from electrical brain recordings (EEGs) that a woman’s brain waves during these uterine orgasms seemed to resemble those observed in people who are in deep meditation. The Taoists have always taught women that they can help themselves experience these profound orgasms by developing their awareness of and connection to their deep vaginal and uterine muscles.

DEEPENING YOUR ORGASMS

1. Picture what your uterus looks like (see figure 33). When you are able to envision a part of your body, you are able to make a stronger connection to it, linking your mind and your body.

2. Next find out where your uterus is located. Stand and place your thumbs together at your navel and make a triangle with your index fingers (see figure 34). Where your index fingers touch is approximately the level of your uterus. Your uterus is the size of a small plum. (Where your little fingers naturally fall is approximately where your ovaries are.)

3. Inhale, and as you exhale contract your eyes and your mouth lightly and feel the back of your vagina deep inside you contracting (where your cervix is). When you do this correctly, you will have a light orgasmic feeling deep inside you.

CIRCULATING SEXUAL ENERGY

If you learn to circulate energy yourself, you will be able to expand your orgasms throughout your body. Dr. Angela Shen explains: "If you draw energy up before and during your orgasm it will be more intense and last longer. You will also be less tired afterward." Circulating sexual energy brings healing energy to your entire body and allows you and your partner to have truly ecstatic lovemaking. This ability to circulate sexual energy is the basis for both transcendent sexuality and vibrant health. (If you ejaculate it is even more important that you practice conserving and circulating this energy, because otherwise you will become drained.)

The Big Draw for Women exercise will help you circulate your sexual energy through your body. Many women are able to start drawing the energy up without much practice. As one multi-orgasmic man recalls, "Without having had any meditation practice or experience, my girlfriend was able to draw up the energy in her body instinctively, as apparently many women are."

Overcoming Difficulty

As we discuss in the section called “Brain Waves and Reflexes”, Western science has recently confirmed that orgasm is as much a state of mind as a state of body. And the state of your mind has much to do with what you learn. Back in 1939, anthropologist Margaret Mead demonstrated how much orgasm is dependent on cultural expectations. She compared two neighboring peoples living on the Pacific island of New Guinea. The Mundugumor believed that women have orgasms, whereas their neighbors the Arapash did not. Not surprisingly, most Mundugumor women were orgasmic, whereas most Arapash women were not. Given the importance of cultural permission for pleasure, many women around the globe and throughout history have had their orgasmic potential limited by societal expectations.

Women generally have one of two kinds of orgasmic problems. If you have never had an orgasm, you are preorgasmic. If you orgasm on some occasions but not others, by yourself but not with a partner, or with some partners but not others, you are situationally orgasmic. Almost all women who are preorgasmic can learn to have orgasms fairly easily. The most important factor is a willingness to learn to pleasure yourself and to take charge of your pleasure during lovemaking. First, of course, you must be willing to stimulate yourself'. (If this is difficult for you, see the discussion earlier in this chapter and in the section called “Self-Pleasuring and Self-Cultivation".)

First, you need to begin by getting acquainted with your body and your sexuality. Negative feelings about your body or how you look during lovemaking can distract you and short-circuit your ability to experience pleasure and have an orgasm. Start by taking a non-critical look at yourself in the mirror. Appreciate your body for its beauty and its ability to give you pleasure. Then start to explore your body. Be sure to stroke your entire body before focusing on your genitals. You may want to use oil, which can magnify the stimulation. Sex therapists are fond of pointing out that your brain is your most important sex organ, so be sure to put yourself into an erotic frame of mind. You may wish to remember a particularly satisfying experience of lovemaking, to read erotica, or to create a fantasy out of your own imagination’s rich storehouse of fantasies and desires.

THE BIG DRAW FOR WOMEN

1. Picture your vagina and clitoris. If you don't know what they look like, use a mirror and have a look.
2. Lightly touch the lips of your vagina and your clitoris until you are starting to get aroused.
3. Inhale, and as you exhale, lightly contract your vagina, squeezing around your clitoris.
4. Inhale and release, imagining your vagina expanding like a flower blossoming.
5. Repeat exhaling and contracting, then inhaling and releasing, nine to thirty-six times.
6. Imagine your uterus and ovaries also opening and closing like flowers blossoming.
7. When you feel your sexual energy expanding, relax and bring the energy to your tailbone and sacrum and then up your spine to your brain (see figure 35). Or if you are having difficulty bringing the energy up, try contracting your vagina and your anus as you direct the orgasmic feeling back to your tailbone and sacrum and then up the spine to your brain. (If you still do not feel your energy moving up, you may want to try activating your sacral and cranial pumps.)
8. Let the orgasmic energy flow down through the rest of your body or direct it to any part of your body that needs healing or strengthening.

According to both Kinsey and Hite, four out of five women who self-pleasure rely on clitoral stimulation to experience an orgasm. The type of clitoral stroke depends on you: hard or soft, stimulation of the shaft or head, up and down, side to side, or circular touch. Experiment and see what you find pleasurable. You may also find that a vibrator can help you reach orgasm. Find one that you like. Almost all women can learn to orgasm through self-pleasuring. Remember that all orgasms are not the same. Many orgasmic women think they are not so because they expect their orgasm to match someone else's pattern or to involve the earth moving and the stars tumbling down. According to Lonnie Barbach, "Most women's initial experience of orgasm is mild, while their expectations reflect the proverbial fireworks." She adds that vaginal orgasms can be very diffuse and tame while clitoral orgasms tend to be more discrete and recognizable.

When you are ready to "go public," let your partner stimulate you in the ways you have found you enjoy. Make sure to tell him what you like or to show him. When you are ready, try intercourse. Remember that you can take responsibility for your own pleasure. Position yourself where you find the best stimulation and continue to touch yourself or guide your partner's hand to your clitoris. During intercourse, guide your partner's penis with your pelvis to where you feel the greatest stimulation.

If you have had orgasms at some point in your life but no longer do, you need to determine what has changed. Is your health different? Are you suffering from an infection or taking medication that might decrease your arousal? Many women experience reduced arousal during pregnancy or while breast-feeding, although others do not. If you think the problem is physical, consult a physician. Certain drugs and certain conditions, such as diabetes, can inhibit orgasm. Has your partner changed? Or has your relationship changed in some way? Do you have feelings of anger or resentment that you are not expressing? Are you distracted by children or work? It is important to address any or all of these situations before you work on expanding your pleasure.

If you are orgasmic when self-pleasuring but not when making love, you may need to determine what you are not getting with your partner. Are you too focused on his pleasure Are you too self-conscious? Are you not getting fully aroused? Try extending foreplay and making sure that you are totally aroused before intercourse, or forget about intercourse for the time being and focus on pleasuring each other with your hands and mouths. Orgasming before you have intercourse also will make it easier for you to orgasm when you are having intercourse.

If you are able to experience orgasm through manual or oral loving but not through intercourse, are you experiencing pain during intercourse? If so, are you lubricated enough? Are you able to choose the angle and amount of thrusting? If not, try another position. If pain is not the problem but you are still not orgasmic during intercourse, have your partner use his hands or mouth to bring you to orgasm before you engage in a coital embrace. Also explore or let your partner explore your G spot or other sensitive spots. Try the positions – you on top, rear entry, sitting in his lap – that tend to stimulate the G spot most. And remember to use your trusty fingers, with or without his, to reach orgasm.

If you are still unable to have an orgasm, do not despair. There are lots of resources for preorgasmic women, including books, groups, and counseling. In addition, you should know that with Taoist sexuality you can experience extremely high levels of pleasure throughout your entire body whether you have orgasms or not. Learning to circulate sexual energy and pleasure throughout your body will allow you to experience a fusion of energy with yourself and your partner that makes the "Did you or didn't you?" question largely irrelevant. More important than reaching orgasm or becoming multi-orgasmic is learning to experience the heights of pleasure and intimacy that come from the true union of body, heart, mind, and spirit.

Yang and Yang For Gay Men

China, like all civilizations, has long acknowledged the practice of homosexuality. Historically it was called lung-yang, after the name of a fourth-century B.c. prince's male lover, or tuan-hsiu, "the cut sleeve," recalling an emperor who was said to have cut off his sleeve to avoid waking his sleeping lover. Although sexual relationships between men were at times condoned and at other times discouraged by the imperial court – no doubt depending on who was sleeping in the royal bed – Taoism has never condemned homosexuality. Taoism avoids condemning any part of human sexual experience, since it is all considered a part of the Tao. Rather, Taoism tries to teach people how to stay healthy, whatever their sexual preferences. Gay men simply need to know the practices that will help them have satisfying and healthy sexual relationships.

Can't Stop Till I Get Enough

A gay writer and activist was doing a radio interview about his book on life in the pre-AIDS bathhouses, where gay men often would have numerous sexual encounters per night. When asked about whether the desire for multiple sexual experiences is characteristic of gay men in general, the author shot back that it is characteristic of all male sexuality, but that straight men are usually constrained by female sexuality. If, he continued, we really want to see what male sexuality is like, uninfluenced by female sexuality, we just need to look at gay men.

The Taoist understands this characteristic of male sexuality in terms of the properties of masculine energy, or yang (see chapter 5 for an explanation of yin and yang). Yang is active, volatile, and expansive. During heterosexual sex, the woman's yin receives and balances the man's yang. (As we mentioned in chapter 5, yin and yang are variable qualities that exist in both men and women. There are some men who are more yin and some women who are more yang. According to the Taoists the universe always seeks balance in relationships as in nature.)

In general, when two gay men make love, each man's yang charges the other's, increasing rather than diminishing their sexual desire. Gay Healing Tao instructor B. J. Santerre explains the value of multiple orgasms for gay men: "Gay men really need multiple orgasms. Most straight men are going to do it once or twice in an evening. For gay men it's really common that they need more than that in a night. With this practice you are going to be able to fully satisfy this desire whether you have a partner or not."
The expansiveness of yang energy is hard to contain and often will want to escape through the most direct route – the penis. It is no surprise that the object of much gay male sexuality, according to gay sex educator and healer Joseph Kramer, is "to get it up and off." This emphasis on ejaculation is understandable because it allows you to satisfy your sexual desire; once a man ejaculates he becomes more yin – in other words, stable, internal, and contractive.

To avoid this endless cycle of ejaculation, which is extremely depleting to your body and your immune system, you need to cultivate your own yin energy and to spread your expanding yang energy throughout your body. Channeling this energy and containing it is also, as we explained earlier, the way to become multi-orgasmic and to experience whole-body orgasms that will be more satisfying than the genital "getting off" that most men are accustomed to. As B. J. Santerre explains, "If you conserve your semen, you are going to be able to go back to the heydays when people would go to the bathhouses and have orgasms all night long. When you learn this practice, you are able to do the same thing, but you won't exhaust yourself and you won't even need to leave home!"

Cultivating Your Sexual Energy

Gay men, like all men, need to learn to circulate their sexual energy though their body both to expand their orgasms and to benefit from the power and healing potential of their sexual energy. During nonejaculatory sex, it is even more important for men to draw this energy up in order to satisfy their desire and transform the volatile sexual energy (ching-chi) into the more refined and stable chi. We discussed the techniques for circulating your sexual energy and for separating orgasm from ejaculation. Here we just want to describe the importance of these practices for gay men and gay male couples.

One multi-orgasmic gay man described his experience: "I had a lover in New York, and I was so much into the Tao, I said, 'You have to get into it.' I didn't give him a choice. When we felt like fooling around, we'd start playing with one another. When each of us would feel ready we would do the Big Draw at our own speed. When we did it together, even if we didn't circulate the energy at the same time, we would be satisfied at the same point. We would fall asleep in two minutes. That sharing of energy keeps going on as you sleep in one another's arms, because you are both charged with sexual energy."

As we said these practices can be done on your own or even if your partner is not "into the Tao." As one multi-orgasmic gay man explained, "After pleasing myself or making love and doing the Big Draw four or five times, I am done. After that if the most gorgeous guy is right in front of me and he says, 'Let me suck you off,' I'll say, 'Please, leave me alone.' I'm satisfied even though I haven't ejaculated."

If you find you are having difficulty controlling your yang sexual energy, you may be in need of some balancing and calming yin energy. Fortunately, there are many sources of yin energy, since both yin and yang exist in all of nature, from the cosmic (earth and heaven) to the microcosmic (your body). Since each of us has both yin and yang, you can cultivate within yourself the qualities of yin such as gentleness, kindness, and self-respect. (For a fuller discussion of learning how to cultivate these qualities and how to deal with emotional imbalances, see Mantak Chia's Taoist Ways to Transform Stress into Vitality.) From the environment, you can balance your energy by eating yin foods such as vegetables and fish or by absorbing yin energy directly from the earth. According to Taoism (as well as many other traditions), the earth is feminine (that is, yin). Men can absorb yin energy from the earth simply through spending time in nature and gardening or can absorb it in a more concentrated form by drawing energy up from the earth when practicing the Cool Draw.

Being Versatile

Most gay men are aware of the pleasure potential of their prostate and their anus (if you are not, see "Prostate" in chapter 2). Yet some gay men still disparage men who are "bottoms." This attitude is not surprising given the negative stigma associated with "getting fucked" and the links in Western society between power and being on top. As we mentioned in chapter 5 in regard to heterosexual couples, Taoism sees the person on top not as dominating but as healing his or her partner. The person on top (or the more active partner) gives more sexual energy (and healing) to the person on the bottom (or the more passive partner).
According to the Tao, everything that is active must also be passive, and therefore it is recommended that gay men be versatile – both "tops" and "bottoms." As one multi-orgasmic man explained, the sexual benefits are obvious: "A guy who has been both a top and a bottom is a great lover because he knows what it is like to satisfy his partner and to be satisfied. If you are only a top, you know only one version. The same if you are a bottom."

When you are the bottom, you also have the benefit of having your prostate massaged during anal intercourse. According to Stephen T. Chang in his book The Tao of Sexology, gay men who generally are bottoms have far fewer prostate problems than tops and heterosexual men.' Nevertheless, most men have their preference and may not want to experiment.

If you are a top who is not willing to be a bottom, you can still benefit from having your anus stimulated and from exercising your anal-sphincter muscle. B. J. Santerre explains: "When people think about penetration, everybody just thinks about a big ten-inch dick or a dildo, but it can be a small finger. Being penetrated needs some practice, like everything else. You need the proper partner to take it easy, and you need to relax those muscles. It's not on the first day that you are going to get fucked. And if you don't like to be penetrated, you can still play with your anus. Even stimulating the outside of the anus is very important because you can strengthen your butt muscles, which are essential for circulating the sexual energy.

It is also worth mentioning that bottoms can be active as well as passive. The more you exercise your PC muscle and your anal sphincter, the more you can massage your partner's penis and pleasure both of you. B. J. Santerre continues: "If your anus is really strong, you are going to be a great fuck for your partner. You are going to massage his penis as he is penetrating you. You are not totally passive and just waiting for it to happen. You take part in it by contracting and releasing the lower part or the higher part. You can contract it really fast two or three times in a row or just let your partner get a little bit deeper and surprise him by squeezing it."

Gay and straight men who are just beginning to experiment with anal stimulation sometimes worry that they may tear the skin of the anus or the colon. The solution here is simply to use enough lubrication and to have a gentle partner. Other gay men worry whether repeated anal sex will weaken their anal sphincter. There is no evidence to suggest that this is the case, and anal sex may in fact strengthen the muscles of your anus. Nonetheless, if you are concerned or feel that your anal muscles are weak, you can try the sphincter exercise to strengthen them.

Monogamy and Multiple Partners

The age of AIDS has fostered a new ethic of monogamy for gay men ca (as well as heterosexuals). Assuming you are using safer-sex techniques, however, there is nothing inherently wrong with multiple partners. The Taoist texts actually instructed heterosexual men about the benefits of a number of partners. But there is a challenge with multiple partners: the practices given in this book require a profound connection of body, heart, mind, and spirit, which is difficult to achieve with even one partner, let alone many. According to the Tao, one profound sexual union, gay or straight, is better than countless superficial ones.

The anonymous sex that has characterized much Western sexuality is diametrically opposed to the kind of physical, emotional, and spiritual connection that Sexual Kung Fu facilitates and requires. Whether you are exchanging bodily fluids or not, you are always exchanging energy. So choose a partner (or partners) wisely.

Safer Sex

Most gay men are highly aware of the need for safer sex and are well informed about the specifics of safer-sex techniques, so we will not discuss the subject at length here. (Should you want more detail about the art and science of condom use and other tricks of the safer-sex trade, see the section called "When to Start: A Few Words About Safer Sex".) Suffice it to say that we strongly recommend safer sex and that in fact the kind of nonejaculatory sex advocated by the Tao has obvious benefits for reducing the exchange of bodily fluids.

With nonejaculation, not only do you decrease the outflow, you also decrease the inflow. As we mentioned when you pump out your semen, you create a low-pressure vacuum that draws in liquid or anything else in the environment, such as bacteria or viruses (just as a turkey baster draws up gravy when you squeeze out the air). So when you don't ejaculate, you run less of a risk of drawing in bacteria or viruses. (As you can imagine, this is especially important for anal sex, since the colon naturally has a great many bacteria.)

Bear in mind that even when you practice Sexual Kung Fu, a small amount of ejaculate is often emitted, so you should not forgo other safer-sex precautions.

Sexual Healing

Most people do not understand the healing potential of sexuality. The Taoists have always recognized that sex can both hurt and heal us. Genital sexuality that culminates in ejaculation is draining to the body. As Joseph Kramer has pointed out, we build up life-giving sexual energy in our groin, but instead of bringing this energy up to our brain and heart, where it can begin to help heal us, we clamp down by tightening our chest muscles and holding our breath. With nowhere to go, this energy is stuck in our groin and eventually becomes too great to be contained and forces its way out of our penis as we ejaculate.

In Sexual kung Fu, you stay very close to the point of no return and even feel the orgasmic contractions, but you do not ejaculate. You do this by learning about your arousal rate, using the techniques described in chapter 3, and, most important, drawing the energy away from your genitals up through your spine and the rest of your body.

Once you have built up this energy, you can also exchange it with your partner. This energy exchange profoundly affects the health and well-being of both partners and takes place even through the walls of latex that we now must necessarily put between us. It is only our Western isolation and individualism that wrongly lead us to believe we can engage in sex without this intimacy and interpenetration. But if we look at the very definition of the word intercourse, we find its meaning to be very close to the Taoist understanding: "connection," "exchange," "communion."

Unfortunately, instead of using the appropriate yardstick for sex, which is health, we in the West have used a moral measure. This approach has led us to size up sex according to criteria such as pleasure/pain and purity/perversity, depending on the censors' own predilections. Over the centuries, gay sex, along with much other sexuality, including self-pleasuring, has been defined as perverse, sinful, sick, and unnatural. Saint Augustine and Thomas Aquinas went so far as to call all sexuality that does not lead to conception unnatural.

Because the Taoists were able to see in sex a powerful source of the body's life-sustaining energy, chi, they were able to recognize its importance to the overall health of our body, our emotions, our mind, and our spirit. Since the 1980s, we have been tragically reminded of sex's ability to bring illness, but in our frenzy of fear we z have forgotten sex's ability to make us well.

Cultivating your sexual energy is therefore especially important if you are living with HIV or AIDS, Many people who are confronting life-threatening illnesses lose their appetite for sex. But this is the very time when they need their sexual energy the most. B. J. Santerre, who has been living with HIV for eleven years, explains: "Sexual energy is so important for the flow of energy in the body that you cannot afford to not use it. Waking up with an erection is an important sign of vitality that many men who are sick no longer experience. When you wake up with a hard-on, you will know your health is improving."

For men (and women) who are sick with AIDS or other sexually transmitted diseases, there are often two additional resistances to utilizing the healing power of sexuality: guilt ("I got it through sex") and fear ("I don't want to get others sick"). These feelings are understandable but misguided. Similarly, having gotten sick through sex doesn't mean you don't need the healing power of your sexuality. People who get sick through the air or from food do not stop breathing or eating. If you are afraid of getting others sick, you can take comfort in the fact that nonejaculatory sex, as we mentioned earlier, makes safer sex even safer. If you remain concerned, you can still do the solo Sexual Kung Fu.

It goes without saying that according to the Tao, it is all the more important to conserve your semen when you are confronting a life-threatening disease or any serious sexual illness. As B. J. Santerre explained, "We don't have a cure for AIDS yet, but we do know that some people die right away and others live a long time. When your body is having to make new sperm, it is not going to be making white blood cells."

When you are using Sexual Kung Fu to help heal serious illness, it is essential that you give your body time to “digest” this growing energy. As one multi-orgasmic man, who had overcome a serious health problem, explained, “The sexual energy is very healing, but this healing process is a lot of work for your body. It can even be uncomfortable in the beginning. Old symptoms may come back.” Develop your practice slowly as you learn to work with this powerful healing force within your body. In addition to Sexual Kung Fu, you can gain great benefit from the other Taoist healing arts. (See the appendix for a listing of additional Healing Tao books and resources.)

Before You Call the Plumber

At some point in our lives, most of us experience some kind of sexual problem. You may find yourself ejaculating quickly with a new partner or having difficulty getting an erection with an old one. It is most important to recognize that these are temporary frustrations that reflect the different seasons of our lives and relationships.

In the West, we have a tendency to get fixated on often unhelpful labels like premature ejaculation and impotence, which cripple a man's self-esteem and his ability to deal with the changes in his sexuality in an easy, relaxed, and even lighthearted way. A sense of humor is often the best antidote to the overly serious way in which we deal with "sexual problems." The biggest danger, as Masters and Johnson and other sex therapists have pointed out, is getting caught in the cycle of "fear-failure-shame-fear" that often causes these difficulties to take up residence in our bedroom. So, even if you are not currently troubled by one of the following concerns, it is a good idea to read this section so that you will know what to expect and how to deal with these unwelcome guests should they someday crash the party.

It's Not Over Till It's Over: Ending Premature Ejaculation

According to Taoist sexuality, there is really no such thing as "premature ejaculation." We don't say this to put sex therapists and sex surrogates out of business, or to deny that many men ejaculate too soon to satisfy their partners, or for that matter themselves. The point is simply that from the Taoist standpoint, the vast majority of men ejaculate "prematurely." According to Sexual Kung Fu, you should be able to choose when you want to ejaculate, so any unwanted ejaculation is premature. Moreover, if ejaculation is no longer the goal, and you can have orgasms without ejaculation, then most ejaculations are by definition premature, or at least superfluous.

So the question is not whether you can last for a certain number of minutes on the stopwatch but whether you and your partner are satisfied with the duration of your lovemaking. If you practice the exercises you will learn to postpone your ejaculation for as long as you and your partner wish.

If the problem persists or is especially troublesome, you might want to seek professional help. A sex therapist or sex surrogate will help you figure out if there are deeper psychological reasons you are ejaculating quickly (for example, fear of getting caught," fear of losing your erection, and so on). A professional may give you a series of exercises with which you can build up your sexual confidence. Following is an example of a sequence of exercises that will help you build your staying power. They are based on the understanding that you must learn to detect, and eventually control, your arousal rate.

LEARNING CONTROL

First, you should have your partner stimulate you manually while you focus on the sensations in your genitals and on stopping as you get close to ejaculating. Once you feel confident of your ability to detect and postpone your ejaculation, you can try intercourse with the woman on top, so that you can continue to focus on your sensations. Next you can try intercourse in different positions, and finally you can try slowing don n instead of stopping. You also may want to avoid being on top, since the blood that gravity drains into your penis makes it more difficult for you to maintain control.

It is also best to be with a partner whom you know well and with whom there is no performance pressure. It is also good if your partner can encourage you and help you stay aware of your arousal rate ("That's great," "Nice and slow," "Relax"). Your partner also can learn how to move her hips and sacrum to rub your penis in different directions while you stay still. If your partner can learn this practice, you will both experience very high orgasmic levels without ejaculating.

Bear in mind that almost all young men are relatively quick ejaculators, and as men get older they generally have an easier time lasting longer. Also, as you may have noticed in your experience, the longer it's been since you had sex, the more difficult it is to control the ejaculatory urge. Therefore, the more you have sex, the easier it is to control your ejaculation. As we mentioned in the last section on safer sex, condoms can also help men diminish some of the sensitivity in their penis.

LEARNING SEXUAL SENSITIVITY

Many men think that a few drinks might distract them from their pleasure and help delay ejaculation. As one multi-orgasmic man recalls, "One of the things I used to do, and I think a lot of guys have learned to do, is to have a few drinks before you go to bed and suddenly you are not very connected with your groin and you can make love longer because it is harder to have an orgasm because you're buzzed and you are not really there. But it was very frustrating because I would usually ejaculate anyway." It may seem like ejaculating too quickly is the result of too much genital sensitivity, but in fact it is the result of too little. Alcohol is an anesthetic and therefore numbs sensation. Though alcohol may dampen your arousal, it also diminishes your ability to control it. The key to developing real, lasting control is more sensitivity, not less. For this reason baseball statistics also don't work. In addition, it is much more difficult to be airfare of your partner's needs when you are drunk or trying to remember Pete Rose's batting average.

Alcohol can also cause the other major male sexual complaint – impotence, or the inability to get an erection, sometimes called whiskey dick. Marijuana also has its sexual drawbacks if used regularly. Daily marijuana use has been found to lower androgens, which are directly responsible for your sex drive. This effect can cause decreased interest in sex and difficulty in getting erections. Other studies have shown that repeated use of marijuana can lower your sperm count. Prolonged lovemaking and multiple orgasms have been shown to increase the levels of your body's natural pleasure drug, endorphin. You are much better off skipping the social lubricants in favor of sexual lubricants. Not to mention, endorphins don't give you a hangover.

Snake Charming: Overcoming Impotence

The Yellow Emperor said, "I want to have intercourse but my penis will not rise. I feel so embarrassed that my perspiration comes out like pearls. In my heart I crave to make love and I wish I could help with my hands. How can I help? I wish to hear the Tao." Su Nü replied, "Your Majesty's problem is a problem of all men."

At some point in their sexual lives, all men have the experience of not being able to get an erection or of losing the one they have. The machinery is too complex to be foolproof, but most of the time there is little to worry about. Physical stress (exhaustion, a cold, intoxication) or emotional stress (adjusting to a new partner, performance anxiety, tension in the relationship) can cause your penis to remain limp or to shrink at an inopportune moment. The most important thing to remember at these troubling times is that it is best to take the situation in stride, with a sense of humor and without blaming yourself or your partner. It does not mean that you are any less of a man or that your partner is any less of a woman. Su Nü's first suggestion to the Yellow Emperor was to relax and try to harmonize with his partner.

SOFT ENTRY

1. Your partner must be fully lubricated, and you should pleasure her until her fluids are flowing. If necessary, you can use a lubricant on her vagina or your penis or both.

2. It is generally easiest for you to be on top so that gravity helps draw the blood into your penis and so that you have as much freedom to move as possible.

3. Circle your thumb and forefinger around the base of your penis to form a finger ring and squeeze gently to push the blood into the shaft and head.

4. Carefully insert your penis into your partner and begin thrusting, keeping your finger ring around the base of your penis.

5. Focus on the blood and sexual energy that are filling your penis and concentrate on the sensations in your penis. Squeeze your perineum and buttocks to push blood into your genitals.

6. Your partner can help stimulate you by playing with your testicles, perineum, and anus.

7. Adjust the tightness of your finger ring to keep your penis engorged enough for thrusting and then remove your fingers when your penis is sufficiently erect for continued thrusting.

8. Reapply the finger ring if your erection wanes (although you generally won't need to do so).

ENTER SOFT, EXIT HARD

Recognizing that all men experience situational impotence at some time or another, the Taoists developed a fail-safe technique they called Soft Entry. The Taoists realized that a man could help with his hands, just as the Yellow Emperor had wished. With this technique and with the cooperation of your partner, you can enter your partner even when you are completely flaccid. Once you are inside your partner, the warmth and sensation of lovemaking will allow you to get an erection in short order. The Soft Entry technique dispels the old belief that a man must have a steel-hard erection before having intercourse, and it is a useful part of any man's sexual repertoire. Knowing that you have mastered this technique and can use it when necessary will give you greater confidence when faced with the awkward, but common, situation of a penis that is slain to rise.

CAUSE FOR CONCERN

If you tend to have erection problems every time you make love, you may be one of the 22 million men in America who have a more serious erection problem. First, you should make sure a physiological cause can be ruled out. Diabetes, prostate surgery, hardening of the arteries, alcoholism, spinal-cord injuries, and back problems, among other things, can cause impotence. Medications such as tranquilizers, antidepressants, and antihypertensives (for high blood pressure) can also cause impotence. In the 1950s, few cases of impotence (about 10 percent) were believed to have an organic source, but most urologists now believe that as many as half of all cases, and more in older patients, have some biological basis.' (Bear in mind that urologists have a vested interest in cases having a biological basis, since that's what they know how to treat and what they get paid to do.) To see if this is your problem, you can do a little self-diagnosis.

While sleeping at night, most men have at least one or two erections, each lasting about a half hour. First, try to recall whether you have awakened in the last week or two with a medium to hard erection. If so, you probably do not have a physiological condition. If you can't remember, there is a simple test you can do at home. Before going to sleep, lick a strip of postage stamps and attach them in a ring around the base of your limp penis. If, upon awakening, the ring is broken, you are physically capable of getting erections. If the ring is unbroken and you are unable to get an erection through solo cultivation, you should see your doctor.

Even if you do have an organic condition, you should remember that this need not stop you from practicing Sexual Kung Fu. Just as orgasm and ejaculation are separate, so too are erection and orgasm. Hartman and Fithian tell the story of an older couple who had a very happy sex life throughout their marriage, although the man was completely impotent as a result of diabetes. Though he and his wife relied on oral and manual lovemaking, both of them were multi-orgasmic. As you learn to expand your orgasms throughout your inhale body, your genital erections and genital orgasms will no longer be the alpha and omega of your sexual life.

GETTING AN ERECTION

Perhaps because our model of male sexuality is based on the experiences of eighteen-year-old men, who tend to get hard quickly and frequently, we think in terms of having a hard-on or not, of being fully erect or not. In reality, there are a number of stages of erection and a number of changes that our penises undergo in becoming erect. As we mentioned, the Taoists noticed that there are actually four stages of erection, or four attainments, as they called them: firmness (also referred to as lengthening), swelling, hardness, and heat.

A common reason for erection trouble is mechanical – not getting enough stimulation of your genitals. Most men need their penises directly touched, rubbed, or massaged to get hard, and this need increases as men get older. Since women often prefer to have their genitals approached slowly and in ever-smaller circles of touch, they think that men do too. Most men, however, prefer quick and direct stimulation. (Don't forget, this is how most men learn to masturbate.)

Your partner should take a very active role in directly stimulating your genitals with her hands and mouth. Tell your partner what you need and how it feels. You should also be willing to use your hands to help yourself get or keep an erection.

Some men, however, find that too much focus on them and their genitals results in pressure to get an erection. It may help for you and your partner to recognize that soft penises have as many nerve endings as hard penises and can be extremely pleasurable. Certain kinds of touch, especially of the testicles, can be highly pleasurable without leading to an erection. Let your partner know that she can pleasure you even if you don't get hard right away. If you find that focusing on your genitals only makes you more anxious, switch the focus to your partner, which was Su Nü's second suggestion. Taking a detour from the man's erection and simultaneously focusing on the woman's pleasure can often be very arousing to the man.

THE WISDOM OF THE PENIS

The process of erection is dependent on both physical and psychological factors. Assuming you have found that your plumbing is working and that you are getting the right amount of direct stimulation, you need to consider the possibility that the problem may be related to performance anxiety, guilt, fear, stress, or other psychological reasons. Occasional impotence, once again, may result from what Bernie Zilbergeld aptly calls "the wisdom of the penis," reminding your brain that you don't really want to be sexual at that moment. We assume that erections should be as automatic as salivation and that "real" men should be able to have sex at any moment, but neither is true. So the first thing you want to do is have a heart-to-crotch conversation and decide if you are really doing what you want to be doing. If the answer is no, tell your partner why and/or suggest a better time.

If the answer is yes, and you still have erection trouble, you may want to seek out psychological or sexual therapy. It is no wonder, given all the misinformation and hype about men's penises and male sexuality in general, that most men see sex as in some way a performance. The more you can shift your focus from how you did, how long you lasted, and how much you satisfied your partner to the pleasure that you and your partner are experiencing, the better off you and your erection will be. As Bernie Zilbergeld wisely points out, "It can help men to realize that most women are less concerned about a man's performance than they are about his reaction to it and to her. Women are more likely to get upset about the man's negative reaction to a performance problem (anger, guilt, constant apologies, withdrawal) than to the problem itself."

PHYSICAL EXHAUSTION

According to the Taoist physicians, erection trouble is caused not only by physiological or psychological problems. It can also be caused by an energetic problem – specifically, weak sexual energy. Difficulty in getting or maintaining an erection is understood as resulting from a man's physical and sexual exhaustion. Many older men who have not conserved their seed suffer from this problem. The cure for impotence is to cultivate the sexual energy while avoiding ejaculation at all costs. As we mentioned, a man is generally more yang than yin. As he becomes more and more aroused, he becomes more and more yang, but after ejaculating he becomes yin. Men who have erection trouble need to become more yang and therefore must avoid ejaculation even more vigilantly than other men.

EXERCISE 15

TESTICLE MASSAGE

1. Rub your hands together to warm them up.
2. Hold one testicle between the thumb and fingers of each hand (see figure 36). (Your testicles should feel like small apricots between your fingers.)
3. Firmly but gently massage your testicles with your thumbs and fingers for a minute or two. If your testicles ache or are sensitive, rub lighter but longer, until the pain goes away. The pain is caused by a blockage, and the massage will help bring blood and sexual energy to the area, which will disperse any blockage.
4. Hold your penis up to expose your testicles and tap them with your longest finger for a minute or two (see figure 37). This helps invigorate your testes and increase sperm production.
5. Finally, hold your penis and scrotum with your thumb and forefinger (see figure 38). Now lightly pull your penis and scrotum forward with your hand as you pull back with your pelvic muscles. Then repeat, pulling to the right with your hand and to the left with your pelvic muscles. Then pull to the left with your hand and to the right with your pelvic muscles. Finish by pulling your hand down and your pelvic muscles up. Do this exercise nine, eighteen, or thirty-six times. It will keep the ducts that carry your sperm healthy.

TESTICLE MASSAGE

The Taoists also developed exercises to help you generate more sexual energy. Lovemaking (using the Soft Entry technique, if necessary) and the Big Draw were a commonly prescribed duo-cultivation method. In addition, there were a number of solo-cultivation exercises that would help a man restore his sexual energy. According to the Taoists, your sexual energy is dependent on three things: the abundance of your sexual hormones, the strength of your kidneys, and the circulation of your bioelectric energy, or chi. Western medicine has confirmed that the sex hormone testosterone is produced in your testicles, and Taoists believe that you can increase the production of sex hormones by using the Testicle Massage exercise. This exercise is an excellent way to strengthen your sexual energy in general and also to relieve any pressure that you may feel after lovemaking. By massaging your testicles, you also help circulate the blood through them and keep them healthy.

A WHOLE-BODY APPROACH

The Taoists saw illness, including impotence, as an expression of the health of your whole body. They recognized that your penis was just part of the problem. Poor circulation, superficial breathing, and an unhealthy diet could all make it worse. Smoking is especially bad for your circulation, since it causes the blood vessels and arteries to constrict and interferes with your breathing. Alcohol and caffeine also drain the body and should be avoided while you are trying to strengthen your sexual energy. An erection problem is a condition that must be treated throughout your body by strengthening your sexual energy and by maintaining proper health.

Please, Sir, May I Have Some More: Enlarging Your Penis

Any man who has been in a locker room knows that there are differences in the size and shape of men's penises. But these differences have little to do with the pleasure a woman experiences during lovemaking – especially if a man practices Sexual Kung Fu. In the words of Su Nü, "There are indeed distinctions in physical endowment. Large and small, long and short, and physical differences are matters of external appearance. Deriving pleasure from sexual intercourse is a matter of inner emotion. If you first bind them with love and respect and press them with true sentiments; then of what relevance are large and small, long and short?"

Even with this and other assurances, many men still worry about the size of their penis, and quite a few men have even undergone “penile enhancement” surgery. This new surgical procedure typically involves lengthening the penis by cutting the suspensory ligament that connects the base of the penis to the pubic bone (see figure 39). In addition to the lengthening procedure, men can also have their penis “thickened” by having fat that has been liposuctioned from their thighs, pubic area, or hips injected into the shaft of the penis."

IF IT AIN'T BROKE, DON'T FIX IT

What man wouldn’t like a few extra inches? But before you run out and have surgery, you should know that there are serious risks. According to an article in the San Francisco Chronicle, the lengthening procedure can result in nerve damage and decreased sensation, impotence, lower angle of erection, skin protrusions, scarring, infection, and gangrene. The thickening procedure can cause an embolism in the heart or brain from the fat released during liposuction, tissue death from reduced blood supply in the penis caused by too much fat in the penis, or a lumpy or lopsided penis.

Figure 39 - THE SUSPENSORY LIGAMENT THAT CONNECTS THE BASE OF THE PENIS TO THE PUBIC BONE

The article in the Chronicle also describes the experience of a thirty-five-year-old auto mechanic who had a number of complications from the surgery, including a “grotesque lump” at the base of his penis. His penis was also black and blue for several weeks. “I thought it was going to fall off. I thought I was left deformed for life.” He finally took his “new” penis to a urologist, who did repair surgery. Dr. C. Eugene Carlton, president of the American Urological Association, also states that he has heard reports of a dozen serious infections and several cases of impotence. He had to treat one man with an infection so severe he required skin grafting to replace half the skin on his penis.

Even putting aside these medical risks and horror stories, penile-enhancement surgery is misguided according to the Tao. The strength of an erection is much more important than its size. After their suspensory ligaments have been cut, men often have a lower angle of erection and the increased fat adds girth but not strength. To have an erection your penis needs blood and sexual energy. If the penis is made too large, without enough blood and sexual energy you will have difficulty getting hard. According to Su Nü, "Long and large, but weak and soft, does not compare to short and small, but firm and hard.”

IN THE LOCKER ROOM

The truth is, it is in the locker room that most men are concerned about the size of their penis – not in the bedroom. For this reason, it is worth keeping in mind that there is more variation in flaccid penises than in erect ones. Penises that look small in the locker room expand more in the bedroom than ones that look bigger in the locker room. Also, given the particular angle from which you look at your penis, it seems smaller to you than to anyone else – a cruel divine joke that is guaranteed to cause inferiority complexes. Try looking down at yourself and then look in the mirror. Surprise! You just gained an inch or two. Most men have an exaggerated sense of how big other men are, partly because of the angle of observation and partly because they don’t know the facts. According to urologist Claudio Teloken, who injected 150 men with a medicine that causes erections and then measured their penises from the pubic bone to the tip of the glans, the "average" man's erect penis is 5.7 inches long. Contrary to popular belief, neither race nor body type makes any significant difference, and the size of the penis has nothing to do with sexual sensitivity.

If you are still concerned about the size of your penis, there is an ancient Taoist exercise for extending your penis that is certainly worth trying before you go to the expense and danger of surgery. It is based on exercising and stretching your penis. There is little scientific confirmation for the success of penis-enlargement exercises, but Alan and Donna Brauer report that 110 men who undertook their extensive sexual-enhancement program reported permanent increases in the size of their penis, from a quarter of an inch to an inch.' It is clear that lack of use can cause the penis to shrink – literally to retract into the body – so it should also stand to reason that frequent use should cause it to extend slightly.

You have no doubt noticed some shrinkage after a swim in cold water. The reason this occurs, and that some expansion may be possible, is that your penis actually extends back into your body two to four inches. These additional inches are held in place by your suspensory ligament, which is what the penile-enhancement surgeons cut. It is probable that frequent erection and sexual activity can cause this ligament to stretch, allowing the hidden part of the penis to move out of the body somewhat.

The time-tested Enlarging Your Penis exercise has been known to extend the penis by as much as an inch within a month or two, but this will depend on your body structure, your health, and your age. The exercise is more likely to work for younger men, whose bodies are still elastic. Weak circulation will make it more difficult. You can determine any gains by measuring your erect penis before you begin and over the duration of your practice. (Make sure you measure from your pubic bone to the tip of your penis and that your erection is at a ninety-degree angle from your body.) No matter what success you have in stretching your penis, this exercise also massages and energizes the entire urogenital system, including the prostate gland.

ENLARGING YOUR PENIS

1. Inhale through you nose into your throat and then swallow this bubble of air, pressing it down into your stomach. (It should not stay in your chest.)

2. Imagine this breath as a ball of energy, chi, which you want to push down from your stomach through your pelvis and out into your penis. This will help you bring more energy to your penis.

3. Once you have pushed this ball of energy into your penis, use the three middle fingers of your left hand to press the Million-Dollar Point between the anus and scrotum. This will lock the energy into the penis.

4. Breathe normally while keeping your fingers on the Million-Dollar Point. At the same time, begin the following stretches.

5. With the right hand, grip your penis and begin rhythmically pulling it forward and away from your body. Pull six to nine times. Them pull to the right six to nine times. Then pull to the left six to nine times. Finally, pull down six to nine times.

6. Use your thumb to rub the head of your penis. Rub the penis until it becomes erect. If your are not getting erect, pull some more while you rub, until you have an erection.

7. Holding the shaft of the penis, circle the penis at its base with your thumb and forefinger and pull forward about an inch. This forces the energy to the head of your penis. Do this nine times.

8. Pull the penis to the right with your right hand and rotate the penis in small circles. Do this six to nine times in one direction and then the other, maintaining the outward pressure. Repeat, pulling it to the left and making six to nine small circles in one direction and then the other.

9. In the final stretch, gently slap your erect penis against your inner right thigh, remembering also to keep pulling outward. Do this six to nine times and then repeat the motion against your inner left thigh.

10. After completing these stretches, soak your penis in warm water for a minute. This will help your penis absorb the warm (yang) energy and expand.

IN THE BEDROOM

If you are concerned more about the bedroom than the locker room, there is something you can do for your partner that is much better than undergoing penile surgery or even doing penis-extension exercises; Arouse her fully before entering her. If her vagina is engorged, your penis will seem larger to her. As we mentioned earlier, women generally experience the most sensation in their clitoris and the first couple of inches of their vagina, which means that even a man with a small penis can reach these most sensitive spots. The position adjustments we described will also help any couple accommodate differences in genital size.

Some couples actually have the opposite problem: the man's penis is too large for his partner. Though a woman's vagina can expand considerably, this imbalance can be painful if the partners are truly mismatched. One solution is to tie a handkerchief or a shoelace around the base of the man's penis at the point of desired depth. This also has the added benefit of expanding the head of the man's penis, which can give greater pleasure to both partners. Just as you must allow your penis size to decrease about every twenty minutes to allow the blood to circulate, you must make sure to remove the handkerchief or any other tie on your penis so that the blood does not stagnate. The woman-on-top position also helps the woman control the depth and make sure intercourse does not become painful.

It is worth repeating that if you practice Sexual Kung Fu, you and your partner's sexual desires will be so satisfied that concern about your penis size will fade into a distant memory. You will wonder how something as insignificant as having large ears or small ears could have taken up so much mental energy. In the words of the wise and experienced Su Nü, "When two hearts are in harmony and the energy flows freely throughout the body, then the short and the small naturally become longer and larger, the soft and the weak naturally firm and hard."

How Many Sperm Does One Man Need? Raising Your Sperm Count

According to the research of Danish endocrinologist Niels Skakkebaek, sperm counts of men in the United States and twenty other countries have fallen dramatically over the last half century – by as much as 50 percent. The cause of this precipitous decline is still being debated, and possible culprits range from tight underwear to chemical pollutants. In reporting on the environmental dangers that seem at least partly to blame, University of Florida researcher Louis Guillette told a panel of U.S. Congressmen, "Every man in this room is half the man his grandfather divas."

Low sperm counts are a major reason that couples have difficulty conceiving a child. Given the declining sperm counts, it may not come as a surprise that infertility is an increasing problem worldwide. The World Health Organization has reported that one in ten couples are involuntarily infertile. In the United States, a staggering one in six couples is infertile – twice as many as ten years ago. It is worth mentioning that infertility is a vague and imprecise diagnosis that, like impotence, has a tendency to become stigmatized. More to the point, this diagnosis of infertility is simply made after a certain amount of time has passed (usually a year of unprotected intercourse) without conception. According to one medical textbook, "Pregnancy is the only irrefutable proof of the sperm's capability to fertilize." You are diagnosed as infertile until you conceive. Guilty until proven innocent! So even if you have a low sperm count, you may still be able to conceive a child.

Problems in ovulation are also a significant cause of infertility, and if there is no egg to fertilize, it doesn't matter how many sperm you have. Nevertheless, if there is an egg, the more sperm you have, the better the chances of your partner getting pregnant. Though only one sperm finally joins with the egg, all the sperm actually work together to get through the uterus and fallopian tubes and fertilize the egg.

If you have a low sperm count, you will be relieved to know that there are Sexual Kung Fu exercises you can use to help raise it. Engaging in nonejaculatory sex is the most important thing you can do to increase the volume, concentration, and count of your sperm. According to Western medical research, each day you do not ejaculate, you raise your sperm count by 50 to 90 million sperm.

In addition to storing up your sperm, you can help your testicles produce more by shaking, massaging, and tapping them. When our testicles were able to swing freely (before tight underwear and pants), they rubbed together and against our thighs naturally, but now that we sit most of the day and spend very little time running through the jungle naked, we must help them. You can stand with pants that are loose in the crotch and shake your testicles up and down. Then rock your lumbar region and sacrum left and right and forward and back (this will help bring blood to your genital area). The Testicle Massage exercise described earlier in this chapter is also quite effective – especially step 4, which involves tapping your testicles.

My What? Preventing and Helping Prostate Problems

Many men only hear about their prostate gland when they are diagnosed with a prostate problem, such as infection, enlargement, or cancer. Almost one in ten men is eventually diagnosed with prostate cancer, which is now so common an ailment that the medical profession generally assumes that if a man lives long enough, he will develop it. According to the Taoists this disease is not inevitable, and Sexual Kung Fu can help keep your prostate healthy.

Two exercises described – Stopping the Stream and PC Pull-Ups – will help you to strengthen your PC muscle, which surrounds your prostate. By squeezing this muscle you can keep your prostate healthy. As we mentioned, the pubococcygeus is actually a group of muscles that stretch between your pubic bone ("pubo") and your coccyx ("coccygeus"). Make sure you squeeze lightly. If you squeeze too hard, you may find that you are too tense to breathe correctly. You can do the prostate exercise every day, as often as you like. Remember, as with any exercise, you may have initial soreness if you practice a lot. According to Taoism your prostate is closely related to your brain's hypothalamus, so if you squeeze correctly, you will eventually feel a sensation in your brain.

In addition to exercising your prostate, you can also massage your prostate directly, which is what the doctor does when you have a prostate infection. The doctor massages your prostate through your anus, which you can also do. You can also massage your prostate by pressing in at your Million-Dollar Point and making small circles in one direction and then the other (see the Pelvic Massage exercise). Using the Big Draw when you self-pleasure or make love will also help keep your prostate healthy. If you have prostate problems, make sure you use the Finger Lock when you ejaculate.

One multi-orgasmic man explained his experience with prostate pain before and after he started practicing Sexual Kung Fu: "I used to have serious pain in my prostate gland that began during adolescence. Several times a month, I would experience terribly sharp pain in that area that would last several minutes. One time the pain was so bad that a friend of mine claimed that my face actually turned green. Doctors suggested ejaculating regularly to relieve the pressure in the prostate gland. This helped somewhat, but I always knew that letting all that semen out was a tremendous waste of energy. When I was in my late twenties, I discovered Sexual Kung Fu. Within several weeks of practicing the PC muscle contractions, the prostate and testicle massage, and the Big Draw and Finger Lock, the problems with my prostate virtually disappeared. I have not had prostate pain for several years now, and though there was some prostate swelling initially after I stopped ejaculating, this condition gradually declined. Given the number of men who suffer from prostate trouble, these techniques are nothing short of miraculous if they work for others like they did for me."

HELPING YOUR PROSTATE

1. Exhale completely, at the same time lightly contracting your perineum and anus.
2. Inhale, and then as you exhale, picture your prostate, which is just above your perineum, and contract your ac muscle around your prostate.
3. Inhale and relax.
4. Repeat this exercise nine or eighteen times.

Sex Is Not Like Pizza: Healing Sexual Trauma

There is a joke attributed to Yankees coach Yogi Berra that goes: "Sex is like pizza. When it's good, it's really good. And when it's bad, it's still pretty good." Unfortunately, sex is not really like pizza, as many men who have had negative sexual experiences can testify.

Bad sexual experiences can linger in our libidos, returning at moments of intimacy years later.

Consensual sex sometimes ends up being hurtful, but coercive sex almost always does. Over the last few years there has been an enormous increase in the reporting of sexual abuse, sexual harassment, and sexual assault. Our willingness to address these formerly taboo subjects is an extremely important societal advance. Understandably, the shocking (and not uncontested) statistics about the prevalence of these social ills have resulted in an ever-greater desire to define exactly what consensual sex is. Although most of the media attention has focused on the sexual abuse of women, men can also be victims of exploitative sex. And both women and men can experience consensual sex that goes bad.

Consent (or the lack of it) is sometimes clear and sometimes not, since sexual partners are almost never totally equal in age, strength, experience, power, and so on. In communicating sexual interest, it is best to be as explicit as possible, rather than relying on silent signals. Fortunately, as women have discovered that they are sexual beings as much as men are, we are abandoning the confusing and dangerous mixed messages of earlier generations. "No" can finally mean No! and "Yes" can finally mean Yes!

If you have experienced coercive sex or consensual sex that went bad, you may be left with sexual scars that can cause sexual or emotional problems. If this is the case, you will probably want to seek professional therapy or sex counseling. However, there are also some things you can do on your own to help you stay focused on the pleasure of the present rather than the pain of the past.

Staying present and in your body is a challenge for anyone who has experienced sexual trauma. Paying close attention to the sensations in your body, both positive and negative, is far better than allowing your thoughts to wander or to "rise above" your body, causing you to become an observer instead of a participant. The Belly Breathing and the Century Count exercises described in chapter 3 will help you improve your concentration and your ability to stay focused. Sound, whether in the form of mantras or moans, can also clear your mind of distracting thoughts. Positive reinforcement will also help you stay present. Remind yourself as often as necessary of where you are, whom you are with, and how good it feels. When old feelings arise, it is generally best to stop what you are doing and share with your partner the feelings that are coming up.

TOUCH MEDITATION

1. Sit facing one another with your legs crossed or on your heels. The lighting should be low, preferably candlelight.
2. Using both hands, start touching your body, generally from head to toe. (Avoid any parts of your body that you do not want your partner to touch and generally avoid your genitals or leave them until last.)
3. Your partner should use her hands to follow yours, touching each place that you have just touched.
4. Switch and have your partner use her hands followed by your hands to introduce you to her body.
5. Hug and feel each other breathing.

If you do not feel comfortable discussing your sexual trauma with your partner, especially if she is a new partner, you should try to tell her what you do want now. If she is doing something that is uncomfortable or does not feel good, tell her, but do so by saying what you'd prefer her to do rather than criticizing what she is doing. If you are not feeling particularly sexual, suggest that you hold each other, massage each other, or meditate with each other by looking into one another's eyes. You can also suggest that you do the Touch Meditation exercise. It is especially good at reestablishing intimacy that has been damaged in some way.

With Touch Meditation you reconnect with your body and share with your partner the parts of your body that you feel good about sharing. You will probably find that your partner is responsive to taking it slow and developing greater intimacy before being sexual. If your mind and body are not present, you will have very little sexual energy to share with your partner. Neither you nor she will benefit much from your lovemaking, and your pleasure will be minimal. By taking it slow and stroking your entire body, you will be able to gather your sexual energy and have an experience that is both passionate and meaningful. As already mentioned, the Taoists recognized long ago that sex has great power for healing or for harm, so use this power wisely and lovingly.

Making Love for a Lifetime

In Taoism, our bodies are considered to be microcosms of the natural world, so we must think of ourselves and our sexuality as changing like the seasons: spring, summer, fall, winter. Yet the Taoist masters were able to turn the seasons one more time, experiencing a second springtime in old age. Consumed with the search for immortality, they found in Sexual Kung Fu a true fountain of youth. Indeed, all modern studies show that an active sex life is essential for counteracting the effects of aging and for maintaining one's health. We will now explore how sex can actually help you live longer and what specifically you need to know as your sexuality changes.

Sex and Aging

You are never too young to read about sex and aging. In the West, we tend to think of aging as something that happens late in life, but the aging process begins at birth, and our sexuality changes every few years. As Kinsey put it, "The sexagenarian – or octogenarian – who suddenly becomes interested in the problems of aging is nearly a lifetime beyond the point at which he became involved in that process."' The sooner you read this section, the better off you'll be.

You are also never too old to read this chapter, for according to the Tao, sex is a lifelong activity that is possible and desirable until the day you die. In the West, older men who are still interested in sex are considered lecherous – "dirty old men." The Tao never had this prejudice; on the contrary, sex was seen to be even more important for the health and longevity of men and women in old age, or what we now call late adulthood. The Chinese are not alone in this belief. A cross-cultural survey has shown that sex is vitally important for older men in 70 percent of cultures and for older women in 80 percent.

Closer to home, a Consumer Reports survey demonstrated how different the realities of sexuality among the elderly are from the cultural stereotypes: among those surveyed, over 80 percent of the married men and 75 percent of the unmarried men over seventy years old remained sexually active. Fifty-eight percent had sex at least once a week, 75 percent reported "high enjoyment of sex," and 43 percent still masturbated.' You also shouldn't assume that your partner's sexual appetite diminishes after menopause. Many women find that their interest in sex actually increases after menopause, perhaps because of their changing hormonal levels.

In the West, we glorify adolescent male sexuality and see a man's sexual power as peaking at age eighteen and declining steadily thereafter. In the words of one sexologist, "The adolescent penis is the penis at its ultimate power. From here on until the end of life, there is a gradual tapering off." The problem comes from a general misunderstanding of sexual power in the West. In terms of potency, it is true that a man's ability to produce sperm peaks during early adulthood, but this is important only if we are concerned with reproduction. A woman's fertility and ability to bear a child also peak in early adulthood.

However, in terms of pleasure rather than potency, a man's ability to satisfy his partner and himself only increases as he gains more experience and control. Although a man may no longer get hard instantly or be able to shoot his ejaculate as far as he could as an adolescent, these changes hardly compromise his ability as a lover. The Taoists knew that as a man leaves the fever of adolescent sexuality with its quick ejaculation. his Sexual Kung Fu practice and his partner's pleasure only increase.

AS YOUR BODY CHANGES

Inevitably, there are a number of physiological changes that take place as you age. For example, if you are over fifty, you probably need more direct stimulation of your genitals to get an erection than you did when you were younger: this is not because your sexual appetite or your attraction to your partner has disappeared, but simply because your physiology changes as you get older. Also, your erection is probably less firm and angles down more than it did when you were younger. In addition, if you ejaculate, the force of the ejaculate is less and your recovery time is longer.

These changes of decreased physical strength and stamina are no different from changes in any other physical ability as you get older. You don't expect to be able to run as fast or as far at sixty as you could at twenty. But there is one difference between sex and sports with regard to aging: your ability in bed may actually improve. Older men can actually maintain an erection longer than before (although if you lose your erection for whatever reason, it will be more difficult to regain). This will make it easier for you to satisfy your partner and to become multi-orgasmic without ejaculating. In Dunn and Trost's recent study, half the men had become multi-orgasmic after the age of thirty-five. A number had become multi-orgasmic between the ages of forty-five and fifty-five. And the older men who had learned to become multi-orgasmic, all now over fifty, were still multi-orgasmic and going strong.

Most of the western sexual literature also suggests that the intensity of the sexual experience diminishes as a man ages. This is not the case according to the Tao. The Taoists do not measure intensity according to the number of genital contractions, which do decrease as you get older. Since they recognize that sexual energy is a inhale-body affair, they judge the intensity of sex on a man's ability to cultivate and circulate his sexual energy, Which only increases as he gets more experience. Your sexuality will no doubt change over time, and you may miss some of the feeding frenzy of youth, but the more refined pleasures of older age are just as delectable, if not more so.

YOUR BODY AND SEX

We hope you now understand that sexuality for the older man is not a slippery slope to sexual inadequacy. Still, you will find that you are able to climb much more easily to the peaks of pleasure if you observe the basic needs of your older body. First, a healthy body and regular exercise are essential. One reason so many people's sex lives shrivel as they age is that their bodies become weak or ill. The wisdom of the East and all physiological studies in the West have concluded that exercise not only improves sexual ability but increases sexual desire and orgasms. Your abdomen, hips, buttocks, and thighs are especially important large muscles, as is the smaller PC muscle we discussed earlier. Keeping these muscles strong is essential for maintaining sexual vitality. Although swimming, jogging, and other Western sports are excellent ways of maintaining physical health (as long as they are not overdone), regular sex is as important, if not more so. Use it or lose it quite accurately describes the aging male body.

According to the Tao, a great deal of sexual energy leaks out of our anus and buttocks. Try squeezing your buttocks together and you will see how powerful this muscle is for containing energy and sending it up your spine. The Taoist doctors considered the strength of a person's anal sphincter an important sign of health. A loose, weak sphincter is a sign of poor health; a tight, strong sphincter, a sign of good health. You can strengthen your anus and buttocks by using the following exercise. In addition, this exercise will help you relieve stress while energizing your body and developing your sexual control. It also will help energize your prostate and Cowper's glands and circulate your blood and strengthen your erections. It has even been known to help cure hemorrhoids.

STRENGTHENING YOUR ANUS

1. Exhale completely through your nose and then pump and pull up the muscles in your anus and buttocks for several seconds (You will be repeatedly squeezing and releasing these muscles.)

2. Inhale slowly and relax.

3. Repeat steps 1 and 2 nine, eighteen, or thirty-six times, or until your groin and anus start to feel warm. This energy may gradually spread to your head and down to your navel, or you can draw it up consciously to the tailbone and the sacrum, and up the spine to the head along the Microcosmic Orbit. Rest and spiral the energy in the head eighteen to thirty-six times. If you feel too much energy, remember to touch your tongue to the roof of your mouth to let the energy come down to your navel.

EJACULATION AND AGING

By now it should be obvious that the place you lose the most energy is out your penis through ejaculating. For aging men, nonejaculatory lovemaking is even more important as each ejaculation becomes more exhausting to the body. As we mentioned once before, the long-lived Chinese physician Sun Ssu-miao recommended that men at forty ejaculate no more than once in ten days, that men of fifty ejaculate no more than once in twenty days, and that men at sixty no longer ejaculate. These are maximum amounts, and if you are able to transform your sexual energy by drawing it up, the less frequently you ejaculate, the better off you will be. This may be difficult at first if you are just starting to practice Sexual Kung Fu, but once you experience the pleasure of nonejaculatory orgasms and understand their health benefits, you will be extremely motivated to learn quickly. Even better, if you start when you are younger, your appetite for ejaculation will quickly decrease and as you get older you will have little or no interest in it.

Sun Ssu-miao's recommended frequencies are just guidelines, and every few years you can simply decrease the number of times you ejaculate. This will naturally allow you to keep your frequency of ejaculation in line with your increasing needs for conservation. It is interesting to point out that even Masters and Johnson recognized that men do not need to ejaculate every time they make love, especially once they reach the age of fifty. If a man recognizes this important point, they concluded, "he is potentially a most effective sexual partner."' Once again, it is important that you not become obsessed with nonejaculation and that you not berate yourself if you do ejaculate. If you ejaculate, let go and enjoy it.

Keeping Love Alive

In the West, we tend to think that love and passion peak on the wedding night and die shortly thereafter. The reasons for this decline are never fully explained to us, but it seems that after the thrill of courtship is over, boredom (supposedly) sets in. For Taoists, the wedding night is just the beginning of a lifetime of expanding love and intimacy. With Sexual Kung Fu, love and sex are better at fifty or even sixty than they are at twenty. Here's why.

MAINTAINING THE SEXUAL CHARGE

According to Taoism, our attraction to our partner is dependent on the strength of the yin-yang charge that exists between us. The greater the charge, the greater the passion. The lesser the charge, the lesser the passion. The loss of this charge is the reason many relationships become flat or boring. (It is also the reason many of these couples experience a flicker of passion after one of the partners has been away on a business trip, since-temporary separation tends to recharge the polarity of the partners.)

One of the main reasons for the loss of this charge over time is ejaculatory sex. When the man ejaculates, he depletes his yang charge. Whether consciously or not, the man also starts to realize he is being exhausted by lovemaking. This can often lead to resentment and a desire to withhold sex. Although as mentioned the more common stereotype is of the ever-desirous husband and the frigid wife, the truth is that men as often as women determine the frequency of lovemaking. Over time, the depletion of a man's energy and specifically his yang charge can lead to disinterest and boredom for both partners.

Some couples are able to temporarily recharge their relationship by sleeping in separate beds or spending time apart. Duo cultivation allows couples to maintain this polarity and keep their relationship fully charged. There is no reason that love must go flat or that boredom must set in. Though there are numerous reasons that people have extramarital affairs, boredom and sexual dissatisfaction are certainly two of the main ones. Maintaining the power of attraction in your relationship decreases the desire to seek out the charge of a new lover. Inexhaustible pleasure exists in every couple if they are able to conserve and exchange sexual energy. One multi-orgasmic man describes his and his partner's experience: "The practice has deepened our relationship, our love is growing, and the magnetic attraction for each other seems not to decrease, but rather to intensify."

Contrary to the stereotypical idea that sex in marriage is unsatisfying, most studies show that married couples have better sex with one another than they have in affairs. Bernie Zilbergeld points out that men and women tend to have less variety and to experiment less in affairs than in marriage and that women tend to be far more orgasmic with their husbands than with lovers. Women are not the only ones who are more orgasmic with their spouses. Kinsey also found that men often fail to reach orgasm in extramarital affairs but almost never experience this failure with their wives.

Good sex is not the only benefit of long-term relationships. A study conducted at the University of California at Berkeley concluded that couples in long-term marriages become happier and more affectionate as they age. In our society, we endlessly praise new love in songs, literature, and films. We dismiss love between older couples as passionless and boring. "What we actually thought we would see is a kind of fatigue quality in these relationships," said Robert Levenson, one of the researchers. "But that's not what we see. They're vibrant, they're alive, they're emotional, they're fun, they're sexy, they're not burned out." Recent biological studies suggest that the presence of a long-term lover increases the body's production of endorphins, natural painkillers that give partners a sense of serenity and security in their lives.'

Couples who do choose to love one another without getting married can have lovemaking that is just as holy and intimate as the lovemaking of those who have the state's official stamp of approval – as long as they practice the union of yin and yang. Yet it is important to keep in mind that it takes years to reach the heights of physical, emotional, and spiritual intimacy and to master the union of yin and yang. It is said in Taoism that it takes seven years to know a seaman's body, seven years to know her mind, and seven years to know her spirit. The saving does not mean that after this you stop learning or start growing bored; rather, it simply means that it takes twenty-one years to really get acquainted.

The Seasons of Our Sex Lives

Relationships, the Taoists knew, are not linear. They do not peak on the wedding night or on any other night. Rather, they wax and wane with the cycles of family, work, health, and even nature. It is important to be aware of these cycles and to know how to live harmoniously with them, in and out of the bedroom.

First and foremost is the need to communicate with your partner about these cycles, to be aware of your own waxing and waning desire, and to be able to talk about it in such a way that neither of you feels judged or blamed. Many women (and an increasing number of men) see a direct correlation between their partner's desire and their own attractiveness. It is important for you and your partner to escape this trap by recognizing that sex has as much to do with your hearts, minds, and spirits as it does with your bodies.

Western materialism encourages us to look at one another's bodies as commodities. We are taught to "get off" on a woman's full breasts or a man's washboard stomach. Our fetishes and media-generated fantasies are endless. So when our bodies age, we think we should stop having sex or should look for partners who are "new and improved." Taoists view the body as dynamic, realizing that the real charge comes from the interplay of subtle energies and not from the pounding together of two hard, static bodies.

Joseph Kramer explains the difference in Taoist sexuality: "In the Eastern tradition, there is eye contact almost all the time during sex. 'I am having sex with you. I am breathing with you. I am relaxed with you. I am connected in the heart with you. I am connected in the genitals with you. Sex in a Taoist relationship is better at sixty than at twenty." Legs, stomachs, and genitals get old, but eyes just gross adviser.

SEX BEGINS LONG BEFORE YOU TOUCH

Since sex is a dynamic force, you need to be very conscious of the energy you bring to it. Sex really begins as much as forty-eight hours before you actually make love; the energy and emotions that you have accumulated during this time follow you into the bedroom. So, a day or two before making love, try to work through any negative emotions, especially anger that will block the exchange of energy between you. The more calm and connected you are when you begin, the easier it will be to reach higher levels of intimacy and ecstasy. Clearly, few couples plan sex two days in advance, so you need to be conscious of your emotions in general and try to work them through as soon as possible.

Foreplay, too, begins before you touch one another. The setting you create – candles, soothing music, and romantic, loving words – will help harmonize your energies. During and after lovemaking be sure to stay present with your partner: remember the eyes. You are trying to experience a more profound state of being together, not just a momentary climax.

If lovemaking becomes routine or mechanical, stop for a while. This will allow the polar passion between you to recharge. Yet don't forget the importance of touch and intimacy. The fact that you are not making love does not mean you should not hold each other or be emotionally intimate. In fact, observing a "sex fast" can allow you to focus on these other parts of your relationship, which are as important. Focus on the quality of your love, and the quality of your sex will naturally improve.

THE CYCLES OF YOUR DESIRE

You will also find that the cycles of your sexual desire do not always coincide. At times you will feel more desire than your partner, and at times you will feel less. No one who is truly in touch with his or her body and emotions wants sex all the time. However, what should you do if one of you is interested in sex but the other one is not. There are several options that correspond to different ways of making love.

Let's assume that tonight you are feeling aroused and your partner is not. Of course, if your partner is interested, she can pleasure you orally or manually. If she is not in the mood, she may be milling to touch or hold you as you pleasure yourself. If she is not in the mood for this, either, she may be willing to exchange nonsexual touch. You can exchange a great deal of powerful, healing energy through holding each other or touching each other. (The Touch Meditation exercise is one option.)

If sex is specifically what you need and sex is specifically not what your partner is interested in, you can of course make love to yourself (that is, self-pleasure). Remember, all of us have yin and yang, feminine and masculine aspects, within ourselves. Self-intercourse, or the union of these two aspects, is a very powerful part of the Taoist practice. Michael Winn explains: "It is possible to harness the sexual energy of the genitals and kidneys and the emotional energy of the heart through meditation. This meditation practice, known as the water-and-fire method (called the Lesser Kan and Li), allows you to literally make love inside yourself and have an even higher level of orgasm, one that dissolves the boundaries between your body and spirit. This practice also has a great many health benefits and was traditionally referred to as a method of repairing the body and the soul."

Because of the societal stigma regarding masturbation, many people are too embarrassed to self-pleasure when anyone else, including their partner, is around. However, if this natural part of human sexuality can be discussed in an open sexual dialogue, you will find that you can harmonize your individual sexual cycles with ease and a great deal of pleasure.

INTEGRATING YOUR SEXUAL ENERGY INTO YOUR LIFE

Often people turn to sex when all they really need is loving touch. As one multi-orgasmic man explains, "The biggest discovery for me was that I could have sex with my clothes on, just by being with somebody and sharing the energy. It feels very sexual, just touching and holding hands and feeling the sexual energy flow through your bodies. This is really sexual freedom, because sex is not just something you engage in periodically. Your sexuality is integrated into our whole life, adding color and intensity, interest and passion to everything."

If you are a parent dealing with the demands of work and family or a person who has an extremely demanding career, the increased energy that comes from practicing Sexual Kung Fu can help you avoid burning out. The ever-increasing demands of work and family in our overcommitted, overworked, overstressed lives are enough to exhaust anyone. Once you are able to cultivate your energy both in and out of the bedroom, you will find that you have more energy than you ever thought possible.

FANTASIES

Many Western sex experts recommend having an active fantasy life, and indeed fantasies can help you to generate sexual energy when you are self-pleasuring. When you are with your partner, however, there is a danger in relying on sexual fantasies. The exchange of yin and yang energy with your partner is real, not imaginary. If you focus your sexual attention on some idealized lover or some pornographic image, you will not be able to feel the real and profound flow of energy between you and your partner. Fantasies prevent you from being present and from appreciating what is truly fantastic about your partner and about your potential to experience the heights of ecstasy together.

NATURAL RHYTHMS

Finally, remember to observe the general rhythms of your body and of nature. Avoid making love right after a big meal. After you have eaten, your body needs to focus its blood and energy on digestion. When you finish a meal, you should be satisfied, not stuffed, with a little hunger remaining. (As the food settles, you will become full.) When you finish lovemaking, you also should be satisfied but not sated, with a little desire left over. (As your energy settles, you will become content.)

If you are ill, remember to make love with your partner on top so that you can absorb her healing energy. And remember the seasons of nature. Plants and animals all reproduce in the spring. Though humans are unique in their ability to make love all year long, don't expect yourself or your partner to be as sexually active in the fall and printer as you are in the spring and summer.

Sexual Kung Fu offers you the potential for multi-orgasmic lovemaking far beyond what most people settle for in their sex lives, but this does not mean that you need to reach the heights of ecstasy every time you are intimate with your partner. Listen to the rhythms of your body and your desire.

AVOID INCREASING THE STAKES

Every time a sexual possibility is introduced to Western readers, the sexual stakes tend to get raised. Once women's orgasms were "discovered," couples were expected to start having simultaneous orgasms. When some women were found to be multi-orgasmic and to have G spots, all women were expected to have multiple orgasms and G spots. Every man has the potential to become multi-orgasmic and to experience whole-body orgasms, but not every man will want to experience them every time. Try to avoid creating performance expectations and anxiety. The Taoist sexual techniques we are teaching are also called the healing love. If you focus on love and healing, for yourself and for your partner, the rest will naturally follow.

No Free Love

Monogamy is back, even if as nothing more than a health precaution. But monogamy is much more than an onerous requirement of the times. With the right partner, it can be a crucible for a most powerful alchemical process of physical pleasure, emotional intimacy, and spiritual growth.

If the indiscriminate accumulation of sexual energy where the goal of Sexual Kung Fu, it might be best to sleep with as many people as possible and to exchange energy with all of them. And indeed, there were ancient texts that recommended this practice. But it is not just the amount of sexual energy you have that is important, it is also the quality of that energy. The goal of Sexual Kung Fu is to eventually transform sexual energy, into more refined and subtle energies of the heart, mind, and spirit.

SEXUAL ENERGY AND EMOTIONS

If you are sleeping with people who have a great many negative emotions (such as anger or sadness), you will internalize their emotions. No matter how much latex you put between you and your partner, you are always exchanging emotional and spiritual (as well as sexual) energy. So avoid violating your bodily, emotional, and spiritual integrity by having sex with someone you do not respect and love. In choosing a partner, you are quite literally choosing your spiritual destiny.

In reality, men (and women) who have not found a loving partner have sexual urges that need satisfaction – an itch that needs to be scratched. If this is your situation, you would be better off practicing solo cultivation and learning to circulate and transform your sexual energy. This training period will allow you to raise the level of your internal energy; eventually you will attract an equally aware and mature partner. If you sleep with someone you do not love, your energy will be in disharmony and either drain you or cause imbalances. For the same reason, you should make love with your partner only when you feel true affection for her. If you feel you must sleep with women you do not love, try to be as kind and loving to them as you can be. Otherwise, it will be impossible for you to truly practice Sexual Kung Fu.

Quite a few men find they are attracted to or interested in being in a relationship with more than one woman. Few men, however, can love more than one woman at a time and feel true serenity. If you think you can, be prepared to spend a great deal of effort trying to transform and balance their energies.

Remember, sexual energy simply magnifies whatever emotions you are feeling. Sex is the most powerful tool for cultivating a relationship and joining our lives together, but it can also be a sharp weapon that can sever those ties and leave lasting scars. As many who experienced the sexual revolution of the 1960s learned, there is no "free love": sexual knowledge comes at a high price and should be cherished accordingly.

Teaching Our Sons

Chances are you were not told about Sexual Kung Fu when you were growing up and learning about your sexuality. Few people are so fortunate. Most boys learn very little about sexuality and practically nothing that is of use. They are left to grope in the dark for sexual intimacy and pleasure. As one multi-orgasmic man explained, “For me, discovering Taoist sexuality was like coming across information and guidance that I felt should have been explained to me from the beginning. It felt like the right way to make love, and the old way seemed so ridiculous, embarrassing, even selfish.” You have a chance to help your son avoid this situation and save him from a great deal of the fear and frustration we mistakenly assume is an inevitable part of growing up.

NO BIRDS AND NO BEES

Both parents have an important role to play in the sexual education of their sons and daughters, but since this is primarily a book for men, we will focus specifically on fathers and sons, although much of what we have to say is applicable to mothers and daughters as well. When most people think about discussions of sex between fathers and sons, they generally think of the famous man-to-man talks about the birds and the bees when a boy comes of age. Kids grow up much too fast today to make quaint discussions about birds and bees of any use – if they ever were. Adolescence is in reality much too late a time in your son’s development for you to begin establishing a dialogue with him about sexuality.

If you succeed in maintaining an open relationship with your son, such a talk will never be necessary. Children’s curiosity about sex begins early, and their sexuality begins even earlier. Anyone who has witnessed an infant boy touching and pulling on his penis and scrotum (often quite hard!) knows that this is not just random exploration. The boy is receiving pleasure – more than he receives when, for example, he pulls on his toes.

Babies are sexual beings, or perhaps we should say sensual beings, since we generally associate sexuality with later stages of development. However, their physical and genital pleasure is undeniable – as much as we try to deny it. Freud called infant sensuality "polymorphous perversity," but there is nothing perverse about it except our own attempts to repress it. How you respond to your son’s explorations of and questions about his and your bodies will teach him a great deal about his sexuality. Developing a healthy, lowing relationship to your sexuality and encouraging him to develop the same with his sexuality is the first thing you can do for your son.

YOUR RELATIONSHIP TO YOUR PARTNER

Children also learn a great deal about intimacy from watching their parents. How you treat your wife or partner will be a model for how your son should treat girls and, later, women. Learning about sex is really learning about sex roles, about communication, about love. What you model will have a much greater impact on your son than what you say, so remember that you are always teaching – when you are hollering at one another as well as when you are holding hands.

In this culture, we worry about children seeing their parents being physically affectionate with one another, but there is nothing wrong with children witnessing these expressions of love. In fact, there may be a problem with them not witnessing it. Its absence not only leaves children often wondering whether their parents love each other but also leaves them without models of how to express affection to their own partners. Modeling a healthy, loving relationship with your partner is the second thing you can do for your son – not to mention for your partner and yourself.

YOUR RELATIONSHIP TO YOUR SON

Many men are becoming more involved in child care than their fathers were, and this naturally leads to more affectionate and loving father-son relationships. However, a lot of fathers still feel uncomfortable expressing affection, especially physical affection, toward their sons – holding them, hugging them, or kissing them.

Or, if they are able to do this with their young sons, they quickly stop as the boys grow older. Many of these men never experienced this love from their fathers and have no model for how to express it.

Some men worry that if they are too affectionate, their boys will become soft, or sissies, or gay. There is no evidence in support of any of these ideas, but it is clear that homophobia in our culture prevents men from expressing their affection for one another and, most tragically, for their sons. Over the last ten years, another issue has begun to prevent fathers from being physically affectionate toward their sons or daughters. The legitimate concern over protecting children from sexual abuse and incest has led to a suspicion of all male physical affection – since most of the perpetrators, although certainly not all, are men.

Touch is the most basic of human needs, and several studies report that babies who did not receive enough of it died. But babies are not the only ones who need touch. Your son will need your loving touch throughout his life. Don't be surprised, however, if your son goes through stages in which he refuses your affection – especially around adolescence, when he may be concerned about his peers' opinions or may be trying to become more independent. However, if you have maintained an open and loving relationship with him, this separation will be only temporary. Martial artist and actor Chuck Norris recounted one of his greatest joys in raising his two sons: "One of my biggest gratifications today is that my grownup sons aren't embarrassed to kiss me hello or good-bye in front of anyone and that they come willingly to me for advice or help if they have problems."

Physical affection is just part of a loving relationship. Emotional intimacy and respect for your son are essential for keeping an open dialogue. Norris, whose father was alcoholic, explains how he tried to present a different role model: "I wanted my sons to know that I was there, that I cared, and that I was always in their corner. I am very close to my sons. I have played with them, listened to their problems, held them in my arms when they were hurt, and shared most of the major events, crises, and successes of their lives." Listening to your son and acknowledging his feelings and his fears will allow him to know he can come to you. If you are willing to hear his pain, he will also be able to share with you his questions about pleasure. Building a healthy, loving relationship with your son is no doubt the most important thing you can do for him.

SHARING TAOIST SEXUALITY WITH OUR SONS

Though people are never too old to benefit from the Tao, the earlier they begin to practice, the more they will gain. This is also true for our sons. If you are able to share with your son some of the Taoist insights in this book, you will help him avoid a great deal of suffering and wasted energy.

Since sexual practices are done in privacy, your son cannot learn from your actions. Sexual Kung Fu is something you must tell him about through words – your own or others.

Long before boys are interested in sex, they experience sexual energy. Boys (and men) get erections and aroused for all sorts of reasons – boredom, among others. (Remember those "woodies" during math class?) One multi-orgasmic man described his experience: "My son called to me from the bathroom one morning and said, 'Dad, I can't pee.' I went into the bathroom and noticed that he had woken up with an erection, which was preventing him from being able to pee. I taught him the Cool Draw, which he has been able to use ever since to manage his sexual energy." Boys are often tortured by their inability to understand and control their sexual energy. If you can help your son understand how to channel this vital energy, you will save him from an enormous amount of sexual frustration.

Young people, however, are often not able to understand the Tao. In the words of Dr. Sun Ssu-miao in his Priceless Prescriptions, "When a man is in his youth, he usually does not understand the Tao. Or even if he does hear or read about it, he is not likely to believe it fully and practice it. When he reaches his vulnerable old age, he will, however, realize the significance of the Tao. But by then it is often too late, for he is usually too sick to benefit fully from it."

You can wait for an opportunity when your son has approached you for advice, or you can give him this book or other materials to read, explaining that you wish you had read about these practices when you were his age. If you leave this book on your bookshelf or out in a conspicuous place, you may find that he reads it on his own, but it is important for him to realize that he does not have to lock himself in his bedroom or the bathroom to read it. You may worry that he should not read books (such as this one) that are explicit about sexuality until he reaches an appropriate age, but the appropriate age is really when he is curious enough to want to read them. Rest assured that he will not read them before he is ready, and that when he is ready, he will learn about sex one way or another.

Sexuality, Secrecy, and the Tao

It should be quite clear by now that Taoism, unlike many other spiritual traditions, encourages us to acknowledge the fact that we are embodied and that sexuality is a vital part of our humanity. For most Westerners who have been taught to be ashamed of their bodies in one way or another, this is a revolutionary idea. Ironically (some would say hypocritically), Western culture titillates at the same time that it condemns. So, for most people who are used to seeing sex being used to sell everything from beer to automobiles, the idea that sexuality is also a spiritual practice is equally revolutionary.

In this book, we have tried to explain the ancient Taoist insights about love and lovemaking and how they can be used by people today. If you do nothing more than practice the techniques in this book, your life will certainly be enriched. However, we would be negligent if we did not explain that sexuality is just part of the Taoist practice and that there are equally powerful insights and exercises for cultivating your body, your emotions, your mind, and your spirit outside the bedroom as well.

The medical traditions of Taoism, known in the West as Chinese medicine and acupuncture, have helped countless people regain their health; chi-kung and Tai-chi exercises have been the foundation of the internal martial arts now popular around the world; and the core philosophical text of Taoism, the Tao Te Ching (pronounced DOW DE JING), is one of the most translated and read works of world literature. In addition, over the last twenty years, the arts of the bedchamber have begun to transform the sexual lives of people all over the globe. Taoism has a great deal of practical wisdom to offer – wisdom that can help people of any religion live healthy and meaningful lives today.

The philosophy and practices that we have taught in this book were for millennia closely guarded secrets handed down from mater to disciple after years of training. We have presented them here because we believe that human culture as a whole can benefit from their dissemination. Carnal confusion is just one of the many dilemmas we face today, but as we heal ourselves and our relationships, we will begin to heal the planet itself – for, according to the Tao, we are as much a part of nature as nature is a part of us. We believe that this healing must begin in the bedroom, for it is here that the next generation is conceived. It is through love and sex that humanity continues, and it is in loving and in making love that the power of transformation is perhaps the greatest.

However, these teachings are not to be taken any less seriously or valued any less because you did not have to pay a million gold pieces or study for a decade with a master to learn them. Cherish them and they will reward you in manifold ways. Read, reread, practice, and share them with others. The more pleasure you give, the more pleasure you receive. The more you heal, the more you are healed. This is the true secret of Taoist sexuality.

Acknowledgments

The Universal Tao Publications staff involved in the preparation and production of The Alchemy of Sexual Energy extend our gratitude to the many generations of Taoist masters who have passed on their special lineage, in the form of an unbroken oral transmission, over thousands of years. We thank Taoist Master Yi Eng for his openness in transmitting the formulas of Taoist Inner Alchemy. We also wish to thank the thousands of unknown men and women of the Chinese healing arts who developed many of the methods and ideas presented in this book.

We offer our eternal gratitude to our parents and teachers for their many gifts to us. Remembering them brings joy and satisfaction to our continued efforts in presenting the Universal Tao System. As always, their contribution has been crucial in presenting the concepts and techniques of the Universal Tao.

We thank the many contributors essential to this book's final form: Juan Li for the use of his beautiful and visionary paintings and drawings, illustrating Taoist esoteric practices, the editorial and production staff at Inner Traditions/Destiny Books for their efforts to clarify the text and produce a handsome new edition of the book, and Nancy Yeilding for her line edit of the new edition.

We wish to thank the following people for their assistance in producing the original and revised editions of this book: Fiona Jan for her writing and editorial contributions, Dr. Andrew Jan and Wilbert Wils for insightful contributions, Matt Gluck and Saida Desilets for technical editing and clear writing, and Daniel Dubie for his continuing support of Master Chia's publications and Tao Garden.

A special thanks goes to our Thai production team: Raruen Keawapadung, computer graphics; Saysunee Yongyod, photographer; Udon Jandee, illustrator; and Saniem Chaisarn, production designer.

Putting the Alchemy of Sexual Energy into Practice

The practices described in this book have been used successfully for thousands of years by Taoists trained by personal instruction. Readers should not undertake the practice without receiving personal transmission and training from a certified instructor of the Universal Tao, since certain of these practices, if done improperly, may cause injury or result in health problems. This book is intended to supplement individual training by the Universal Tao and to serve as a reference guide for these practices. Anyone who undertakes these practices on the basis of this book alone, does so entirely at his or her own risk.

The meditations, practices, and techniques described herein are not intended to be used as an alternative or substitute for professional medical treatment and care. If any readers are suffering from illnesses based on mental or emotional disorders, an appropriate professional health care practitioner or therapist should be consulted. Such problems should be corrected before you start training.

This book does not attempt to give any medical diagnosis, treatment, prescription, or remedial recommendation in relation to any human disease, ailment, suffering, or physical condition whatsoever.

The Universal Tao cannot be responsible for the consequences of any practice or misuse of the information in this book. If the reader undertakes any exercise without strictly following the instructions, notes, and warnings, the responsibility must lie solely with the reader.

Taoist Inner Alchemy

Introduction

We are dynamically connected to the infinite. “As above, so below” is an echo of wisdom heard from sages and mystics throughout the ages. When we can connect to and absorb the energy that surrounds us, we are able to tap into the many splendors of the universe.

We exist because of the unique combination of the forces that are around and within us. The two main forces are electricity and magnetism. “Bio-electro magnetism” is the Western term for life force, which the Tao refers to as chi. For the past 5,000 years, Taoists have utilized this bio-electromagnetic energy to enhance their way of life and establish a relationship with the universe. Bio signifies life, electro refers to the universal energies (yang) of the stars and planets, and the magnetic force refers to the earth force (yin) or gravitational force present on all planets and stars. As we align ourselves with these forces, we become a conduit through which we can absorb and digest these energies through the body, mind, and spirit, establishing a direct connection with the universe.

Humans normally access bio-electromagnetic energy through food and air. Plants absorb the universal energies of the sun and the magnetic energies of the earth; they digest and transform them, thereby making these energies available to all living beings. Rather than waiting until the energy in the universe is processed through plants, the Taoist goes directly to the source of this primordial energy.

Through the Chinese methods of cultivating energy known as Chi Kung and meditation, the Taoists directly tap into the source of energy all around us and focus it precisely.

The Tao views human beings as lamps filled with fuel. Many people burn this fuel at very high intensity, without ever taking the time to replenish the oil in the lamp. Alcohol, drugs, tobacco, and promiscuity all quicken the depletion of this fuel. The Taoist exercises strive to continually refuel the energy within. The Taoist recognizes that we are limited in our nature as human beings unless we connect to the sources of energy within the universe, thereby becoming infinite. So, within the limitations of our human nature, we constantly fill ourselves with the unlimited abundance of energy around us.

Human beings have amazing potential and capabilities. We are unique creatures in the way we use our minds and hands. Look at the world around you: the skyscrapers, the architecture, computers, technology, and the myriad creations of humanity. All have come about through the combination of the mind with the hands. In the Tao practice, we use the mind and the hands, in both Chi Kung and meditation, to connect to the boundless energy of the universe.

We use the mind to project a pattern of energy into the universe, to connect to the force, and to bring this energy back into the body. The mind can travel millions of light years in a few moments. It can take you anywhere you imagine. If you picture something in your mind—an ocean, a sunset, or a mountain—you automatically connect with that image. With the proper training you can connect to the energy of nature and the universe and project your chi to combine with it, drawing these forces into the body. The hands are called the "touching force," and like antennae they can transmit the frequencies and vibrations from space.

WHITE MAGIC PRACTICES OR INNER ALCHEMY

丹鼎

Through their internal quest, the Taoists discovered a doorway to the universe. The more we open our internal energy, the more we are capable of connecting to the forces of energy around us. The Taoist practices are also called "White Magic" practices or "Inner Alchemy." Alchemical changes, both positive and negative, happen every day of our life. The Taoist practices offer us a way to positively influence those changes.

Transforming Negative Energy into Positive Energy

Negative emotions are normal. Feelings such as impatience, anger, and worry happen every day. We call such feelings “negative” because when they stay in us too long they become stagnant and detrimental to our health. Western doctors now realize that a lot of sickness is caused by negative emotions. Anger increases blood pressure and puts stress on the heart. This is contrary to what happens with positive emotions such as love, joy, generosity, happiness, and trust, which nurture us. We need to learn how to change the negative into positive energy to improve our health and spiritual energy.

What the Taoists discovered is that negative energy can be used to cultivate positive energy. Changing the negative into positive, such as changing anger into happiness, is also known in Taoism and alchemy as “changing lead into gold.” This is not only beneficial to the practitioner but also to everyone around: when our loved ones are sad, angry, or depressed, we can send love and gentleness to them and make them feel better.

Recycling Sexual Energy

In Taoist thought sexual energy or ching is the source of all life and creativity. It is the basic resource, which can be transformed first into chi (life-force energy) and then into shen (spiritual energy). When we feel sexual arousal and desire, the sexual hormones are activated. This is the beginning of the inner alchemy of sexual energy. In the Taoist Healing Love practices this energy is recycled and used to regenerate the body’s internal energy.

THE TAO TEACHES HOW TO CULTIVATE INNER ENERGY AND CONNECT THIS ENERGY WITH THE UNIVERSE

In my childhood I began learning Chi Kung. In fact, I liked to practice Chi Kung so much I had to save my lunch money to learn. I gradually came to realize that there are hundreds of different Chi Kung forms in China, involving different hand movements and gestures—so many that a person could spend lifetimes just learning the hand movements.

After many years of practice, I started to forget the first form, so I learned a new form. Later on, I tried to practice and review all the forms that I had learned. I realized that I could hardly remember the majority of them. I sat down and thought, “I only have two hands, two legs, and one head. Why are there so many forms? And why are there so many religions and beliefs?” I thought that they must all have one main thing in common and I started to search for it.

I found out that the most important thing is feeling the chi within us (God within us). Just as religions speak of God, Taoism speaks of Wu Chi: the supreme power controlling the universe. With a good heart and virtuous energy we can connect with this natural force. We can learn how to increase, transform, take in, and stay in touch with all the forces of the universe (of earth, nature, cosmos), letting them all combine within us. This oneness with the universe (oneness with God) is what is important to all.

In response to this discovery I have developed the Universal Tao system with practices that offer five stages of mastering chi.

1. Conserving chi. In the Universal Tao System, our first goal is to learn to conserve our chi; when a battery is totally drained, it is harder to charge. Conservation of chi will help gain more chi. To have more chi we first need to maintain control of the gates through which energy normally leaks out and constantly drains our life force.

   We leak energy:

   • through our reproductive system
   • through negative emotion
   • through constantly turning our senses outward
   • through poor diet and eating habits
   • through improper or shallow breathing

   Without knowing how to conserve the chi that we already have, what is the point of acquiring more?
2. Balancing chi. Learning to balance chi is the second step to keeping a smooth and harmonious flow of energy moving throughout the whole body. If our energy is imbalanced, we may have too much energy in some places and not enough in others; we may also be too yang or too yin. We may have an excess or deficiency of heat, cold, damp, or dryness. This imbalanced energy tends to make us go to extremes.
3. Transforming chi. Transforming chi is the third phase and allows practitioners access to more beneficial energies. For example, through the Sexual Chi Kung practices taught in the Universal Tao (the course known as Healing Love through the Tao), we can transform sexual energy back into basic life-force chi. Through other practices (such as the Inner Smile, the Six Healing Sounds, and Fusion of the Five Elements) we learn to transform negative emotional chi into positive virtuous chi. Thus chi is not only the foundation of our health; it is also the basis of spiritual development in the Tao.

4. Increase chi. Once we have accomplished the three previous phases of mastering chi, we then learn to increase it. Chi pervades all of heaven and earth. In Cosmic Healing Chi Kung we learn time-tested ways to tap into these unlimited and transpersonal reservoirs of chi and greatly expand the amount of energy available to us. It is very important to first master the stages of conservation, balance, and transformation before we emphasize increasing our chi. Otherwise we may waste the energy we bring in, or we may inadvertently amplify the imbalanced or negative energies that we have not yet learned to bring under control.
5. Expanding chi. Finally, we learn to extend our mind to tap in to the vast chi of the universe to heal our body, mind, and spirit and to heal other people. The Cosmic Healing Chi Kung practice sensitizes your hands to the feeling and movement of chi; it uses the mind/eye/heart power (Yi) to absorb cosmic chi into the palms and crown and to send it out through the hands and beyond, so that you can help restore balance in others without touching them or draining yourself.

RELAXATION, LETTING GO, SURRENDER, AND EGO

In some religions and spiritual paths, there is a great emphasis on surrender and letting go. This is actually a form of relaxation. Taoist practices emphasize relaxation, letting go, and emptiness. When a person is relaxed, the muscles are open, the breathing is soft, and the energy can flow through the channels of the body. There is no resistance and no fighting. This allows the creative and higher forces to flow into us.

Most religions have a similar process. To contact the higher self and the higher forces, letting go and surrendering are imperative. Through the surrender of control, the forces of nature are more accessible. However, if you continue to surrender and let go, vital energy will be lost. In the long term, this will gradually drain you. To avoid this, at the moment that you are in touch with the higher forces, you need to become aware of yourself and your own energy. Then, projecting thoughts, intentions, and energy patterns into the creative force will fill rather than deplete your life-force energy. This way, energy is grounded and contained within.

Remaining open and empty, using intention, mind, and chi to draw the energy in, rather than being focused externally is a vital principle of Taoist practice. What might initially appear to be a paradox is reformulated as you do the practice: you will learn how to be empty and open and to simultaneously retain enough consciousness to draw the force into yourself.

MIND, ORGANS, AND SEXUAL ORGANS

When people are disconnected from themselves and from their sexual organs, the mind and the energy of the organs are separate. Taoism believes that the mind, body, and spirit must work together. The results depend on a person's practice.

Brain

The brain can access and generate the higher forces, but storing this energy in the brain itself is not easy. We need to train the brain to increase its ability and capacity to store energy. The brain energy, when increased to a certain level with training and practice, can grow more brain and nerve cells, as well as increase the number of synapses in the central nervous system.

Organs of the Body

The organs can also generate energy, but much less than the sexual organs and the brain. They also have a much greater capacity to store and transform energy.

Sexual Organs

The Tao discovered that the sexual organs are the only organs that can generate a significant amount of vital energy (life force). However, the sexual organs cannot store the energy efficiently. When too much energy is generated, considerable amounts have to be dumped out. This is the most refined energy, the creative energy that should be cultivated for self-healing.

The Three Minds or Three Tan Tiens

In the Tao practice it is important to understand the principle of the three minds. The upper mind, also known as the upper tan tien, resides in the brain. The upper mind is good for detailed planning but is easily drained by thinking too much. The middle mind, or the middle tan tien, is centered in the heart. The heart is the seat of our consciousness. The lower mind, or the lower tan tien is in the lower abdomen and this is where our awareness resides. It is also the place to generate chi. The three tan tiens are also able to store energy, transform it, and supply it to the brain, spinal cord, sexual organs, and other organs.

MEDITATION IN THE UNIVERSAL TAO SYSTEM

Understanding the three minds has guided the Universal Tao's unique approach to meditation. The aim of Taoist basic training is to integrate the brain, sexual organs, and other organs into one system. If the brain generates too much energy, it can store the energy in the organs. Excess sexual energy can also be stored in the organs and the three tan tiens. If the brain generates too much of the higher forces and we are unable to store this energy, we have to throw it away. It is like preparing food for one hundred people, when only one person is eating. The rest gets thrown away. In the same way, when too much sexual energy is produced and there is no place for it to be stored, it is wasted. We do not have enough of this energy to be able to waste it. We have a limited amount of energy and time.

Some practices just deal with the spirit and ignore the body and the sexual energy. These practices can generate a lot of energy, but when there is no connection to the organs, it cannot be stored. This is how energy is depleted. Some people practice sitting quietly, emptying the mind, with the whole body relaxed and calm, but very little energy is actually generated (fig. I.1). When one gets deep into the practice, some people find it hard to come back to society, because they have no energy and their mind power does not work well. These people have to depend on others to support them.

Fig. I.1. Some practices attempt to reach enlightenment at the expense of the body. When we lose all energy we lose control of our own mind and spirit.

Universal Tao Practice Conserves Energy by Connecting to the Lower Tan Tien

The Universal Tao approach teaches how to charge the lower tan tien with more energy so that it will in turn charge the upper brain. Cultivating chi in the lower tan tien is the key to the whole Taoist practice (fig. I.2).

Fig. I.2. Universal Tao practice conserves energy by connecting to the lower tan tien.

In the Universal Tao, we are learning to create a sacred and holy temple within ourselves. With the simple practice of smiling to all the organs, we can integrate our bodies, minds, and spirits. The sexual practice connects the mind with the sexual organs and the brain. The separation between these parts of ourselves is bridged and a synergy is created.

THE COSMIC ORBIT MEDITATION, FOUNDATION OF THE UNIVERSAL TAO SYSTEM

The core practice of all the Universal Tao Chi Kung forms is the Cosmic Orbit meditation, an expanded form of the Microcosmic Orbit.

The picture below is a representation of a 2,000-year-old carving in a Taoist temple (fig. I.3). This carving is a symbolic representation of the Microcosmic Orbit, also referred to as “Turning the Water Wheel” or “Spinning the Wheel.” In the carving, water is pumped upward by a boy and girl. The water travels through the spine to the top of the head. In the Tao classics, this is referred to as "Kidney water reverses its course." The water passes through the fire at the lower tan tien and the kidneys/adrenals, which transform it into vapor or chi, the bio-electromagnetic power of the life force. The pumping of the watery sexual energy up the spine past the fire from the Sexual Palace and the kidneys to the top of the head symbolizes the energy circulation called "transforming water into steam."

Fig. I.3. A 2,000-year-old Taoist temple carving representing the Microcosmic Orbit, also called Turning the Water Wheel

When the vapor reaches the crown it condenses and drips down like misty water to the heart. This cools the heart fire, so the heart will not dry out; the vapor also nurtures all the other organs, just as rain and rivers irrigate the land.

In the Cosmic Orbit each point along the circuit of the Microcosmic Orbit is opened to the creative energy of the universe. It begins with making a connection to the violet light of the North Star and the universal violet light that is gathered in the cup of the Big Dipper (fig. I.4). This refined practice—explained in this book—will help you to feel chi more easily inside, outside, and around your body and will enable you to use the mind/eye/heart power to guide the flow of chi through the primary energy routes in your body. When the practice is extended to include routes in the arms and legs it is the full Cosmic Orbit flow.

Fig. I.4. The Cosmic Orbit meditation

This is the third book involved with the teachings of the Cosmic Orbit. The first two books in this series are Taoist Cosmic Healing (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2003) and Taoist Astral Healing (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2004). This book contains more details with the most up-to-date instructions. It is designed to expand upon the other two and allow practitioners to cultivate their own internal energy and to create harmony between themselves and the universe.

The Taoist practice provides us with the resources to extend beyond the realm of our senses. By tapping into our internal resources and channeling the energy around us, we can perceive much more than the senses normally report to the mind. We can extend our perception from the limited perspective of the sociologically conditioned senses to the unlimited awareness of the universe. For example, our senses tell us that the earth is flat, that we are stationary, and that heaven is above us. In reality, the earth is a sphere hurtling through space at thousands of miles per hour and the heavens are above, below, and beyond the earth in every direction. The goal of the Cosmic Orbit is to connect with the forces from the six directions—above, below, left, right, front, and back—and draw all these forces into the body.

We are directly involved with our solar system and the universe beyond it: the energies of our body, mind, and spirit are constantly affected by the moon, planets, sun, galaxy, and the entire universe. Eventually, with practice, we are able to draw upon many different energies and use them as needed, thereby giving form to the formless energy that is abundant in nature (fig. I.5).

THE TAOIST UNIVERSE, ELEMENTS, AND AWARENESS

The five elements play a major role in the way Taoists see the universe and in Taoist practices (see fig. 1.1). From the Wu Chi, the Original Source or the Ultimate Stillness (referred to in other traditions as the Void or God), creation brings forth yin and yang. These are transformed into each other in an eternal cyclic movement, Tai Chi, which generates the five elements: the stages in the transformation of yin into yang and yang into yin. They are also symbolized as water, wood, fire, earth, and metal or air. Of course, planet Earth, humans, and all living things are composed of these elements.

By calming our minds, we can become aware of the many elements in the universe and the major forces that are active around us. When we make contact with these forces and learn to integrate them within our own energy field, we become connected to the entire universe (see fig. 1.2). The diversity of the universe is enormous. For example, it has been estimated that there are more than 200 billion galaxies, each containing more than 200 billion stars. Taoists say that the limited energy of the human body can become part of the unlimited energy of the universe (fig. 1.3).

Fig. 1.1. Levels of the Taoist universe

Fig. 1.2. Levels of the cosmic universe

Fig. 1.3. A schematic depiction of the various spheres into which we can expand our awareness

OUR SPINNING UNIVERSE

Spinning is an important concept in Taoist practice. We live in a spinning universe. Everything around us spins and often emits strong electromagnetic fields. All energy spins. In Taoist practice we must establish ourselves in the spinning universe, have our own spin to create our own identity, and be able to make contact with it.

For example, every point at the equator moves at about 1,000 miles per hour as the earth turns on its axis in twenty-four hours. Moreover, the earth moves around the sun in a huge annual orbit. As the earth hurtles around the sun it has a speed of 67,000 miles per hour (fig. 1.4). This creates a spinning force, which can draw more power from the cosmos.

In addition the sun moves around our galaxy in space, taking the whole solar system with it (fig. 1.5).

Within the solar system there are many planets all circling around at great speed and influencing one another. Isn't it amazing that the planets do not bang into one another? This is the infinite organizing power of the Tao at work in the universe.

There are similarities between the solar system and our atoms (fig. 1.6). Just as our solar system spins around a central point in an elliptical orbit, so too do the particles in the atoms in our bodies. We have 6.5 trillion cells and all of the atoms that make up those cells are spinning. The combined force of the spinning can generate tremendous power.

Fig. 1.4. The earth and planets are moving around the sun at 67,000 miles per hour.

Fig. 1.5. The whole solar system rotates through the galaxy.

When we put these two together they look very similar (fig. 1.7). This shows how our atoms are continually moving and spinning and are influenced by the solar system.

Because the cosmic forces and our cells are all spinning, we are able to communicate with the rest of the universe and exchange energy with it (fig. 1.8).

Fig. 1.6. Atomic structure and solar system structure look similar.

Fig. 1.7. Human atom and planets

Fig. 1.8. The flow of cosmic forces

The earth, the planets, the stars, and many objects in the stars all emit electromagnetic fields. We are exposed to many such fields, through which we contact and receive cosmic energy (fig. 1.9).

Fig. 1.9. Contacting and receiving cosmic energy through radiation fields all around us

The Microcosmic Orbit

Moving the Microcosmic Orbit is another spin of energy. It provides the basis for the Cosmic Orbit, in which we synchronize our body with the movement of the universe (fig. 1.10).

Fig. 1.10. The Microcosmic Orbit turns in our body.

RETURNING TO THE PRIMORDIAL FORCE

Many Taoist practices are like returning to the baby stage when our connection to the universe was through the umbilical cord (fig. 1.11).

Fig. 1.11. Returning to the primordial force

Before a baby is born, it gets food and oxygen from its mother via the placenta. The baby's blood flows through the umbilical cord to the placenta, where it receives food and oxygen from the mother's blood. This circulation is the same as the Microcosmic Orbit (fig. 1.12).

After the baby is born, it breathes in oxygen through its lungs and starts to eat and digest its own food. Its blood circulation changes so that more blood flows to the lungs and gut. The baby no longer needs the placenta, so this is removed by cutting through the umbilical cord. The body starts to move the Orbit by itself. As the person grows older, the Microcosmic Orbit gradually stops (fig. 1.13).

Fig. 1.12. Before the baby is born

Fig. 1.13. After the baby is born

The one-month-old baby shown here (fig. 1.14) already holds its tongue against the roof of the mouth and so makes it possible for the Microcosmic Orbit to move. It is believed that children do this in the womb.

Fig. 1.14. Babies automatically place their tongues up to the palate. This is the connection of the Microcosmic Orbit, the chi bridge.

Taoists regard the opening of the Cosmic Orbit as the “Born Again Process” (fig. 1.15). When we practice the Cosmic Orbit and touch the tongue to the roof of the mouth, we receive nutrient chi from the universe, just as we once received nutrients from our mothers in the womb.

Fig. 1.15. The born again process

Three Treasures of the Tao 丹田

Taoist teachings often refer to the “Three Treasures” of Heaven, Earth, and Man. Cosmic Chi Kung opens up all the possibilities of the Three Treasures. It cultivates self-awareness and develops your personal soul pattern (fig. 1.16). It is a process of self-transformation, of creating higher forms of vibration, and resonating with the source of life. It is process of self-regeneration in which the DNA is used to divide matter into new cells, creating bliss and divine qualities of love and truth.

The Taoist classics state, “Transform ching (sexual energy) into chi (life-force energy) and chi into shen (spirit energy).” This is truly the internal alchemical process of returning to the origin, the doorway into the Tao, the Primordial Void of clear light and inner sound.

Preliminary Practices for the Cosmic Orbit Meditation

ESSENCE OF TAO PRACTICES

The practices of Taoism have three main goals:

1. Learning to heal, love, and be kind to ourselves as we develop compassionate hearts and wholeness of being.
2. Learning to help, heal, and love others using the abundance of healing and loving energies we receive from the forces of nature, Heaven, and Earth.
3. Learning about our Original Source and helping it to unfold within us.

All of the Universal Tao practices share these three goals, so they naturally support one another. For example, to attain skill in Cosmic Chi Kung, it is helpful to practice the Six Healing Sounds, Iron Shirt Chi Kung, and Bone Marrow Nei Kung. Beyond the basic level, the Universal Tao System includes many other intermediate and advanced level Chi Kung practices and meditations. The further you advance, the greater will be your mastery of chi.

Your increasing level of skill in the Universal Tao system will reflect immediately in your Cosmic Chi Kung practice. Furthermore, you will discover that you can incorporate many of your Universal Tao practices directly into your practice of the Cosmic Orbit.

THE SIX HEALING SOUNDS

The Six Healing Sounds is a very important practice for making the connections between the organs and good energies associated with each organ. The Six Healing Sounds practice helps to enhance the connection to the cosmic source (fig. 2.1). It is a powerful exercise for transforming and releasing negative energies from the body, and it can change our inner energy quality, balance our organ energy, and have a calming and healing effect on our body. Each sound brings a different healing energy. The order of the organs' healing sounds is: lungs, kidneys, liver, heart, spleen, and Triple Heater. The Six Healing Sounds are best practiced before our nightly rest.

Please see more details about this practice in my book The Six Healing Sounds (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2008).

Fig. 2.1. The Six Healing Sounds

Iron Shirt Chi Kung and Bone Breathing

Iron Shirt Chi Kung and Bone Breathing are systems of standing meditations. These exercises help ground you and root your connection into the earth force, building good structure and absorbing greater force. In turn, this will help draw in the heavenly force, which will combine with the potent healing power of the earth's yellow light. The practices also strengthen the body so you can hold a higher energetic charge. These abilities are essential prerequisites for handling greater amounts of energy.

Iron Shirt Chi Kung also includes the art of "Changing the Sinews and Washing the Marrow." Through these aspects of Iron Shirt, you learn to absorb, store, and discharge large amounts of energy through the tendons and bones. These practices are outlined in detail in the following books: Iron Shirt Chi Kung (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2006) and Bone Marrow Nei Kung (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2006).

BREATHING EXERCISES AND SALIVA AND CHI MIXING

Spinal Cord Breathing

Spinal Cord Breathing enlivens the spine, promoting range of motion and flexibility, and activates the cranial and sacral pumps, enhancing the flow of cerebral spinal fluid. It also helps relax the back muscles so that meditation is comfortable for long periods of time. Spinal Cord Breathing can be practiced sitting or standing. Stand with a straight spine or find a suitable chair and relax, keeping the spine comfortably straight without allowing it to touch the back of the chair.

1. Begin by exhaling and feeling yourself relax.
2. Inhale, and gently tilt the sacrum back and press the chin toward the neck while holding your fists near your shoulders. Open the chest and expand the rib cage to activate the adrenal and thymus glands. Simultaneously pull back the shoulders and fists, and pull the scapulae together as you press the neck back and lightly clench the teeth. This activates the cranial pump (fig. 2.2).
3. Exhale, and push the sacrum and head forward, rounding the back. As you do this, bring the elbows forward, close the forearms and fists into the chest, and bring the chin down to the sternum. Don’t tighten any muscles. Just relax.
4. Repeat: Inhale, tilt the head and sacrum back, arch the back as you push out the abdomen, and retract the shoulders and fists. Then exhale as you round the spine forward, tuck the chin in, and bring the arms to the front. Continue arching the back as you inhale and bending forward as you exhale. Do this spinal cord breathing 36 times.

Fig. 2.2. The movements of Spinal Cord Breathing

Step 1: Wagging the Tail, Spinal Rock

1. Sit down and smile to the spine (fig. 2.3). Gently start rocking the spine left and right, like a dog wagging its tail. Feel each vertebra from the lumbar working up through the thoracic and then to the cervical vertebrae. This opens the spine in a lateral direction.
2. When rocking this way, the whole spine has a vibration and the energy can move throughout the entire back, especially in conjunction with the Spinal Cord Breathing exercise. The Spinal Cord Breathing activates the three pumps: the sacrum, the Door of Life, and the cranial pump. When the lumbar spine and the Door of Life are open, the fluid can flow and there are sufficient nutrients to feed back to the brain.

Step 2: Riding the Horse

Rocking the sacrum and the lumbar spine back and forth on the sitz bones will activate the sacral pump. This will help create good movement of the bones, and openness throughout the spine. This internal movement enhances the flow of chi (fig. 2.4).

When you rock like this throughout the meditation, it creates a vibration rising up the spine from the base of the coccyx through the lower lumbar area and up to the cranial base (fig. 2.5).

Step 3: Roll the Abdomen

In this step you hold your breath and roll the abdomen until it is totally empty (fig. 2.6). This creates suction, a vacuum-like sensation that energizes the internal organs. Start slowly and progress only as you feel comfortable.

1. Hold your breath.
2. Suck in the abdomen and pull it in more and more.
3. Pull up the abdominal muscles.
4. Roll the abdominal muscles to the top of the abdomen and push out.
5. Push out the abdominal muscles and pull down again.
6. Roll the muscles back again.

Fig. 2.3. Begin to rock the spine and smile into organs (lumbar to cervical).

Fig. 2.4. “Riding the Horse”—rock lumbar to sacrum, activating the sacral pump.

Fig. 2.5. Rock the whole spine and feel the energy vibration activate the three pumps.

Step 4: Gasp Air into the Intestines

When we are totally out of breath we gasp in air. This has a strong cleansing effect on the whole abdominal area. In the beginning, if you have blockages in the small or large intestine, try to clean the intestine and take more natural fiber. The air will help the composting in the digestive tract and help to eliminate toxins.

1. Breathe out with the lungs' sound, sss-s-s-s-s-s, while the hands move down in front of the body with the palms facing down.
2. When out of breath, let the suction from the throat and abdomen suck the air in, all the way down to the large intestine. This adds chi to the whole digestive tract. Raise the hands up with palms face down and exhale with the lungs' sound (fig. 2.7). The fresh air will push out the trapped gas and you may even belch. Do this for 3 to 6 times and the saliva will begin to be produced; then proceed to the next step.

Fig. 2.7. Gasp air into the intestines.

Empty Force Practice

Empty Force Breathing helps to increase blood circulation and chi flow to the abdominal area by creating an abdominal cavity and vacuum in the stomach. The Empty Force helps exercise the organs and is a major rejuvenation practice. First, you flatten the stomach against the spine. Then, you roll the energy in five areas with the abdomen pulled in (fig. 2.8).

Fig. 2.8. Empty Force Breathing

1. Inhale and exhale. Exhale and flatten the abdomen until you feel as if the navel is touching the spine. Inhale again, and flatten down the abdomen again.
2. Then, roll at the solar plexus area.
3. Roll on the right side.
4. Roll from the center.
5. Roll on the left side.
6. Roll at the lower abdominal area.

Saliva and Chi Mixing

To Taoists, saliva is the fluid of life. It is the essential fluid for the body, moistening the organs and lubricating all the joints in the body. Saliva will also secrete a major longevity hormone and proper daily chewing will help mix the air with saliva and food. Taoists say, “Eat your liquid and drink your food.” This is because food chewed to liquid will mix well with a lot of saliva and activate enzymes for optimal digestion.

The Saliva and Chi Mixing practice has a number of healing attributes:

1. Assists in elimination of germs.
2. Helps moisturize the internal organs and joints.
3. Increases oxygen available to the body.
4. May enhance hormonal balance.
5. Helps prevent tooth decay.

In this practice, we learn to do the following:

- Mix saliva with cosmic chi
- Mix chi with ching (sexual chi) as taught in the Healing Love practices

Step 1: Mix Saliva and Air with Cosmic Chi

1. Chew the saliva and mix the air and oxygen into it by circling the tongue in the mouth.

a. Suck the saliva back and forth in the mouth to increase it.

b. Move the tongue to massage the gums (fig. 2.9).

c. Knock the teeth to strengthen the bones and activate the saliva gland: right side 9 times, middle 9 times, left side 9 times (fig. 2.10).

Fig. 2.9. Sucking the saliva and massaging the gums

Fig. 2.10. Knock the teeth on the right side 9 times, in the middle 9 times, and on the left side 9 times.

2. Open your palms to gather the cosmic chi and smile to the cosmos.
3. Activate the throat with your mouth closed and let the abdomen serve as a sucking machine. Draw the cosmic chi through the mid-eyebrow to the nose, into the mouth, and mix with the saliva. The saliva is a powerful force mixed with the cosmic energy (fig. 2.11).

Fig. 2.11. Close your mouth and feel the suction in the throat and abdomen draw the cosmic chi in.

Step 2: Push the Combined Energy to the Navel

In this step the saliva mixed with chi is forcefully swallowed down the throat. The saliva is really sucked into the stomach by the flattened stomach moving out, which creates a vacuum to pull the saliva down.

1. Exhale and flatten the stomach, lower and tighten the neck, and hold the breath as long as you can.
2. Tighten the neck, swallow the saliva with force 3 times, pushing it down to the navel (fig. 2.12).

Fig. 2.12. Sucking the saliva to the stomach

Step 3: Let the Combined Energy Help Heal Your Body

1. Cover the navel and feel the saliva turn into fuel glowing inside your navel. Breathe in and breathe out. Feel the lower abdomen warm.
2. Use both palms to roll your chi ball and feel the chi balls in the tan tien rolling and turning the saliva into instant chi (fig. 2.13).

Fig. 2.13. With the stove burning, saliva turns into chi.

Strengthen and Lengthen the Tendons by Working with the Tongue and the Sexual Organs

The tongue is connected to all the tendons and especially to the heart, arteries, and veins. Exercising the tongue improves the flexibility of the tendons in the body.

The sexual organs are connected to all the tendons in the back. When the male sexual organ becomes shorter, it will cause the tendons in the back to be shorter, and will cause the back to be tight and tense.

Stretching the Tongue (for Men and Women)

1. Exhale and flatten down the abdomen until it feels as though the navel touches the spine. Hold the breath out as long as you can (fig. 2.14).
2. Exhale more and spit the tongue out with the rest of the air.

Fig. 2.14. Navel touches the spine.

3. Hold your breath and stretch out your tongue as much as you can to the left, top, right, and bottom for 6 rounds. Move the eyes also with the tongue. Reverse the direction. Feel the perineum is moving in connection with the tongue (fig. 2.15).
4. When you are out of breath, gasp the air in. The extra oxygen you gasp into the digestive tract will be rushed to the tongue and will strengthen the tongue and the tendons.

Fig. 2.15. Stretching the tongue

Stretch the Sexual Organs—Male

1. Inhale, exhale, and flatten down the abdomen. Bring the navel toward the spine.
2. Flatten the abdomen and stick the tongue out. Use the thumb and index finger to grip the head of the penis. Pull the penis and thrust the tongue out more at the same time as you pull the penis to the right, left, front, back, and middle. With each pull, suck the flattened abdomen up toward the spine and rib cage. Release and repeat. Keep on pulling until you are out of breath (see fig. 2.16).
3. Then gasp air into the intestines. When you exhale again, do the sss-s-s-s-s-s sound until you are out of breath. The chi will rush to strengthen the sexual organ (see fig. 2.17). Do this with 3 to 6 breaths.
4. Use the thumb and index fingers to grip the scrotum and repeat the exercise 3 to 6 times.

Stretch the Sexual Organs—Female

1. Follow the instructions for inserting a jade egg with string attached into the vagina given in the Internal Egg Exercise in my book Bone Marrow Nei Kung (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2006). Exhale and flatten the abdomen. Inhale again. When you flatten the abdomen, stick the tongue out.
2. Use the thumb and index finger to grip the thread that is connected to the egg inside. Pull the thread and thrust the tongue out more at the same time. With each pull, suck the flattened abdomen up toward the rib cage. Release and repeat. Keep on pulling until you are out of breath (fig. 2.18).

Fig. 2.18. Pull on the egg, suck in the abdomen, and feel it pull up the sexual organs.

3. Then gasp air into the intestines. When you exhale again, do the sss-s-s-s-s-s sound until you are out of breath. The chi will rush to strengthen the sexual organs.

PROTECTING AND CLEANSING WITH UNIVERSAL CHI

Before the practice of the Cosmic Orbit it is also good to create a protective chi field, call upon the eight-trigram pakua power, and clean the body's cells with the Sacred Water practice and green and blue chi from the universe. The more you clean the cells the more cosmic healing can take place. For more detail please refer to my book Taoist Cosmic Healing (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2003).

Protective circle and chi Field

You can make a connection with the sacred fire in the universe to create a chi field as a protection area. Feel your fingers extend way out into the universe and touch the sacred fire in the sky. Bring the fire down and make a circle around your community, your house, the meditation hall, or around your body wherever you are. Only allow good intentions to enter the space and expel the negative chi out.

Fig. 2.19. Arm bones long; touch the sacred fire.

Fig. 2.20. Make the circle of a protective chi field.

Create a Sacred Fire Protective Chi Field

1. Be aware of yourself. Feel the bones in the arms and fingers grow and expand. Reach into the universe and touch the sacred fire in the universal cauldron. Let the sacred fire from the cauldron fill and condense in your arms and bones (fig. 2.19).
2. Use the Yi power to draw the sacred fire protective circle on the ground around your house, office, the room you work in, or anyplace you wish to protect (fig. 2.20).

Fig. 2.21. Create and surround yourself with a chi dome and the guardian animals, then activate the eight forces.

3. Create and surround yourself with a chi dome and the guardian animals. Set up the Blue Tortoise in the north, Red Pheasant in the south, Green Dragon in the east, White Tiger in the west, Yellow Phoenix above, and Black Tortoise below (see fig. 2.21).

4. Activate and call upon all eight elemental forces of nature and the universe: wind, mountain, fire, and thunder (lightning) on the east; earth, lake (rain), water (ocean), and heavenly power on the west.

The Power to Create Sacred Water

In the Sacred Water practice we exercise the right of being the children of the cosmos, by charging water with chi to make it sacred water (known in the West as Holy Water) (fig. 2.22).

Fig. 2.22. Sacred water from the cosmos

Water is life (fig. 2.23). Our health depends on adequate intake of water. We need to have a strict, regular daily water intake to prevent the stresses and associated damages of dehydration. With sufficient water, the chief conductor and supervisor of the body's well-being—tryptophan and its neurotransmitter derivatives, serotonin, tryptamine, and melatonin—will be well positioned to regulate all functions. Well-hydrated and healthy skin needs water to constantly replace that which it loses to the outside environment. This then allows blood vessels in the face and the body to open up and provide necessary nourishment for exposed skin cells.

Fig. 2.23. Water is life.

However, science has discovered that even if we clean water through filtration processes so that it looks and tastes alright, closer analysis using high-powered microscopic technology indicates that its cell structure is "unclean." Water, like humans, maintains the memory of its old "self." We store our "memory" within our DNA; water stores its memory within its cells. In the Sacred Water practice we ask for the power to give bio-electromagnetic power to the water, which can cleanse the body's cells of sick, toxic, or negative energies.

In his book The Message from Water, Masaru Emoto advises us that "water is telling us to take a closer look at ourselves—water is a mirror reflecting our mind." When we project chi and love into water and then freeze it, it will turn into a "regular" and well-structured crystal. If we project negative energy into water, the opposite will apply (see fig. 2.24).

Fig. 2.24. The emotions change the water structure. (These pictures and their descriptions are from The Message from Water, by Masaru Emoto.)

When we project a nice, loving instruction or thought into water, like "let's do it" the water will pick up this vibration and restructure itself. If we project negativity into the water, such as with a command like "do it!" the water will acknowledge this accordingly. When we look into a pond we see our image. If we drink a glass of negative image water, its destructive energy will enter our system and attempt to multiply.

Sacred Water Practice Invoke the power of the Sacred Water practice to cleanse and heal the body's sick, toxic, or negative energy.

The three tan tiens can generate different waves that can change the crystals of the water. When we feel love, compassion, joy, and happiness, these feelings change our body's structure so that it can receive and radiate out good and healing energy (fig. 2.25). Our projections access the cellular level, clean out the polluted cells, and reprogram those remaining with the essence of our affirmation.

Fig. 2.25. Feel good; feel love, compassion, joy, and happiness.

1. Hold the cup with both hands near your heart. Be aware of your lower tan tien and spiral till the lower abdominal area is warm. Feel the chi radiate to the palms and to the cup of water, filling the water with chi (see fig. 2.26).

Fig. 2.26. Fill the water with chi.

2. Hold the cup with both hands near the heart and project goodness into the water. Feel the chi radiate to the palms and then radiate chi into the water (fig. 2.27).

Fig. 2.27. Each person's palms can generate chi or healing energy.

Project love, joy, thankfulness, gratefulness, appreciation, and the energy of compassion into the cup (fig. 2.28).

3. Fill the water with good intention. Command: "This sacred water will give me/you health, wealth, and longevity" (fig. 2.29).

4. Drink the sacred water. If you are practicing in a group, drink the water in unison. If you are working with a student, pass him/her the cup to drink using both hands. The sacred water will carry the message to all the cells of your body, where it will remain. Feel it removing the sick cells and purifying your body. You can also sprinkle it on any area that requires healing.

Cleaning with Green and Blue Chi The green light and blue light has the power to clean out space and clean out the body. It removes toxins, sickness, and bad fortune. It is good to clean both the space around you and your body before doing the Cosmic Orbit.

Draw the Green Light from the Universe

1. Be aware of the liver and gallbladder and the green forest while breathing through the throat.
2. Be aware of the green light in the universe. Let the light come in and blend it in the tan tien, then bring it up to blend with the compassionate heart and then up to the crown (fig. 2.30).
3. Project the light up to the universe. See it spiral and let it multiply.

Fig. 2.30. Draw down the green light from the universe.

Clean Out Sickness and Toxins with Green Light

1. Extend your arms up, with palms facing the heavens. Use one hand to spiral the green force down. The other hand holds the position and connects to the universe.
2. Let the big pool of green light from the universe spiral down through your community, your home, and then into your crown.
3. Let the green light blend into the cells and bond with sickness and toxins (fig. 2.31).
4. Let the green light draw the sickness out of the cells and flow down to the center of the earth (see fig. 2.32).
5. Bury the sick energy deep in an energetic hole. Give the command: “Don’t come back. You will be happy there. You will be transformed into good chi.”

Fig. 2.31. The green light bonds with sickness and toxins before returning them to the earth.

Repeat these steps 6, 9, or 18 times. For people who are very sick with cancer or tumors, you can do them up to 36, 72, or 108 times.

Fig. 2.32. Green chi removes the toxins as it flows out and down to the ground.

Draw the Blue Light from the Universe

1. Be aware of the kidneys, the bladder, the ocean, and water chi.
2. Be aware of the blue light in the universe. Let the light come in and blend it in the tan tien, then bring it up to blend with the compassionate heart and then up to the crown (fig. 2.33).

3. Project the light up to the universe. See it spiral and let it multiply.

Clean Out Sickness and Toxins with Blue Light

1. Extend your arms up, with palms facing the heavens. Use one hand to spiral the blue force down. The other hand holds the position and connects to the universe.
2. Let the big pool of blue light from the universe spiral down through your community, your home, and then into your crown.

Fig. 2.33. Draw down the blue light from the universe.

3. Let the blue light blend into the cells and bond with sickness and toxins.
4. Let the blue light draw the sickness out of the cells and flow down to the center of the earth (fig. 2.34).

Fig. 2.34. Blue light flushes out sickness and toxins before returning them to the earth.

5. Bury the sick energy deep in an energetic hole. Give the command: “Don’t come back. You will be happy there. You will be transformed into good chi.”

Repeat these steps 6, 9, or 18 times. For people who are very sick with cancer or tumors, you can do them up to 36, 72, or 108 times.

PRELIMINARY PRACTICES INTEGRAL TO THE COSMIC ORBIT PRACTICE

In addition to the practices mentioned above, certain practices are essential to the practice of the Cosmic Orbit. They will be described in detail before the Cosmic Orbit practice is presented in chapter 6. They are:

1. Warming the Stove/Bellows Breathing (chapter 3)
2. Laughing Chi Kung (chapter 3)
3. Three Minds Into One (chapter 4)
4. Cosmic Inner Smile (chapter 5)
5. Opening to the Six Directions and Three Fires (chapter 5)

Work through each part at your own pace and eventually join them together as a whole.

Warming the Stove and Laughing Chi Kung

In the Universal Tao, we teach Cosmic Healing Chi Kung within an entire system of exercise and meditation. As a part of this system, Cosmic Healing Chi Kung comprises the art of healing oneself and others. It focuses on energy work for projecting chi. You can easily learn the simple movements of Cosmic Healing Chi Kung without doing any other Universal Tao practices, but if you truly wish to master this art it is important to have a firm foundation in the basic Universal Tao practices.

The first of the practices that will help you to prepare for the Cosmic Orbit Meditation is Warming the Stove in conjunction with Bellows Breathing.

WARMING THE STOVE

We start with focusing the attention in the area between the navel, the Door of Life, and the sexual center, the point where the "original chi" flows into the body. This is called "Warming the Stove." Warming the Stove should begin with Bellows Breathing to enhance the generation of chi in the navel region.

Bellows Breathing

1. Sit on a chair with the back straight and the feet touching the floor about hip width apart. Place the hands over the navel. Start with the Inner Smile practice of smiling down to your abdomen to warm it up, then smiling to your heart and feeling love in the heart center, and on to the lungs, liver, spleen, and kidneys. Smile to the area about 1½ inches behind the navel and collect the energy there. At this time, you may already feel a strong sensation of heat or warmth in the navel region. If not, just continue to be aware of the sensations at the navel with your smiling awareness.
2. When you inhale, expand the lower abdomen at the navel area (below and around it) so that it bulges outward. Feel the diaphragm descend. Then, keeping your chest relaxed, exhale with some force to pull the lower abdomen back in, as if you were pulling the navel back toward the spine. Feel the sexual organs pull up also. This massages the organs, especially the kidneys and the aorta and vena cava pathways to and from the heart, emptying them of trapped energy and toxins. Repeat 36 times.

1. Rest, and keep the hands covering the navel. Lightly close your eyes and use the mind/eye power to help gather and condense the energy you have been generating. Feel the Door of Life, the kidneys, and the navel warm. Spiral with your hands and body into the kidneys and Door of Life. Activate and massage the sexual organs. Men, massage the testicles to transform sperm back into life force. Women, massage the breasts to transform the blood (menstruation) into life force. Inhale into the sexual center, and exhale, condensing the essence of the breath into the sexual center. Pause for a while. Feel the energy expand and radiate outward. Breathe in and out this way at least 18 times.
2. Rest a moment. Feel the navel warm. Feel the kidneys and Door of Life warm. Feel the sexual center warm. As you inhale, feel the sexual organs, perineum, and anus pull up toward the original force in the tan tien. Lightly push down as you exhale; feel the pressure building at the spot of the original force. Picture the original force with a mouth and nose, breathing into that spot.
3. Now amplify and feel the pulse in the area of the original force. As it pulses, feel the suction drawing the sexual energy up and combining it with the original force. Feel the energy expanding within you. Spend at least 10 minutes warming the stove in this way. Adjust your breathing to be soft, long, slow, fine, and deep. Breathe in even cycles. The breath should gradually become so fine and light it would not move a down feather placed in front of your nostrils.

For additional details regarding Warming the Stove and Bellows Breathing, see my book Healing Light of the Tao (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2008).

LAUGHING CHI KUNG

> "When a man smiles only with his eyes, not with his belly, do not trust him."

My wish is for everyone to be spiritually independent and connected personally to the source, cosmos, or primordial force in our common quest to return to Wu Chi (God). Through this process we can gain inner peace, happiness, and compassion for others and ourselves. We can also develop the ability to heal ourselves and to serve as positive energy sources. Naturally, the first step is to cultivate peace within. The Laughing Chi Kung meditation is a tool that aids in the following:

- Strengthening the connection we have to ourselves
- Opening to the abundant chi available from the cosmos
- Developing the skills of self-healing

I remember one day practicing the many forms of breathing exercises I had learned. After practicing the whole day I had not finished. I asked myself why there were so many different breathing exercises, when we have only one nose and two holes (fig. 3.1)? At this point I started to laugh and laugh. After a few minutes of laughing I felt more relaxed, more open and full of chi, than after an entire day of complicated breathing exercises. I realized that laughing is a natural and powerful method for calming the nervous system, stimulating circulation and digestion, activating the immune system, and generating more energy. This is what this meditation practice and breathing technique is: laughing for our health.

Fig. 3.1. Why are there so many breathing exercises when we have only one nose with two holes?

Laughing Chi Kung teaches us how to laugh from all the way down in our lower bellies, strengthening the deepest abdominal muscles, the diaphragm, and the muscles of the pelvic floor, the urogenital muscles. When our lower abdomen is enlivened through deep belly laughing, we create a good solid home for our awareness and energy.

Explanation of Benefits

When we laugh from the abdomen, a vibration moves through the body. This vibration will activate the heart brain and the thymus gland. Laughing from our lower tan tien, our second brain, stimulates all the functions of this area and activates the heart brain and the thymus gland. Allowing the laughter to reverberate through the diaphragm, sternum, spine, and all the organs is a fantastic internal workout. All the tension and tightness is vibrated from the inside and is released through laughter. Laughter is nature's best form of stress release. The relaxation you will feel in your abdomen and the rest of the body is unbelievable (fig. 3.2).

Fig. 3.2. Laughing Chi Kung

Laughing Chi Kung provides the following benefits:

1. It increases the mind's attention and improves circulation.
2. It activates the diaphragm and the diaphragm activates the abdominal area.
3. It activates the lymphatic system and improves the immune system.

The Six Steps of Laughing Chi Kung

The Laughing Chi Kung practice includes six steps as follows:

1. Generate chi with laughing.

2. Increase the chi by spiraling.
3. Raise the chi to the crown and open the nostrils.
4. Gather the chi in the lower tan tien.
5. Collect the chi.
6. Store the chi.

Step 1: Generate Chi with Laughing

Many reflex points in the large intestine become stimulated with laughter. When the reflex points are stimulated, this has a beneficial effect on the corresponding organ (fig. 3.3).

Fig. 3.3. Reflex points of the colon

Abdominal laughing exercises your diaphragm. When your diaphragm moves more easily, this assists the lungs to breathe more deeply and fully. When the muscles in your belly tighten, the pressure in your abdomen increases. This squeezes the arteries and veins and moves the blood. When the muscles release and your belly expands, it creates a vacuum for the major veins and arteries, the vena cava and the aorta, which attracts blood. This mechanism acts like a second heart, and lightens the workload for your primary heart (fig. 3.4).

Fig. 3.4. Abdominal laughing activates the diaphragm, helps in deep breathing, and activates the aorta and vena cava to increase circulation and reduce the work of the heart.

Laughing out loud also activates the bloodstream, which affects the thymus gland. The thymus is perhaps the most important organ of the immune system. In it the vital training of the different T-lymphocytes takes place to activate the immune system (see fig. 3.5).

Laughing will activate the blood stream and vibrate the thymus gland to let blood flow though it. When white blood cells pass through the gland it will insert the program to turn them into T-cells.

Bone marrow tissue is rich in fats, containing plenty of nourishment for the comprehensive production of the different blood cells: red cells for the transport of oxygen, blood platelets for clotting, and the various white cells for the immune system (fig. 3.6).

Fig. 3.5. Activate the lymphatic system and improve the immune system.

Laughing helps to increase the blood flow through the intestinal tissue. When undifferentiated white blood cells pass through the intestinal tissue, both in the small and large intestine, they are turned into B-lymphocytes (fig. 3.7). Every individual B-lymphocyte can make antibodies only against a specific foreign organism.

Fig. 3.6. Bone marrow tissue

Fig. 3.7. Bone marrow, bacterium, and thymus

Step 2: Increase the Chi by Spiraling and Spinning the Energy

After each session of laughing, we place our tongue at the roof of our mouth to complete the circuit and draw the energy down to the lower tan tien. Then we spin the newly generated energy in the lower tan tien to attract more energy from the cosmos. At first we actively spin and spiral our energy. Later, when we become more aware of the spinning and spiraling deep inside us and in the larger cosmos around us, the spinning and spiraling will happen spontaneously. Just being aware of this enables us to tap into enormous sources of energy (see fig. 3.8).

Fig. 3.8. Becoming aware of all the internal and external spins and spirals allows us to constantly attract energy from the universe.

Step 3: Raise the Chi to the Crown and Open the Nostrils

Once we can feel the spinning energy in the lower abdomen the middle mind will spin also. This is similar to the solar system spinning. When the two lower minds are full of energy, chi will rise up to the crown and push down to open the nostrils (fig. 3.9).

Steps 4 and 5: Gather and Collect the Chi in the Lower Tan Tien

At the end of a laughing meditation or practice, we want to collect the energy in the lower tan tien. To do this we follow a specific procedure in which men follow the energy outward as it spirals clockwise 36 times and next bring in the energy, spiraling counterclockwise 24 times. Women first spiral outward counterclockwise 36 times and then collect the energy, spiraling clockwise 24 times. With continued practice, the lower tan tien becomes very alive, creating the feeling of being centered in yourself.

Fig. 3.9. The three tan tiens are just like the solar system or galaxy turning and spinning inside us.

Step 6: Storing the Energy

Storing the newly generated energy is an important part of the Laughing Chi Kung practice. Energy can be stored for everyday use, for emergencies, or used to protect the body from sickness. Scientists have discovered that the villi in the large and small intestines have properties that are similar to a storage battery. The body can store an instant form of energy like chi in the lower tan tien. The only other way we can store energy is in the form of fat. We can activate the energy in fat by fasting. However, fasting often causes the body to panic; as soon as we eat again, it tries to store even more energy in the form of fat.

Through hundreds of years of practice the Taoists have discovered that bones and cells can also store energy. But we always have to begin with storing energy in the tan tien. Storing energy in the lower tan tien allows us to draw on this storehouse when we need it (see fig. 3.10).

Fig. 3.10. Energy in lower tan tien and bone cells

The Laughing Chi Kung Practice

Boisterous Laughing

1. Place your hands over your lower tan tien and laugh loudly from your belly. Feel your laughter shake the sternum and the lower abdomen and reverberate deep inside your body (fig. 3.11). Continue laughing for five minutes.
2. Rest and place the tip of your tongue on your upper palate. This allows the energy in your head to drop down to your tan tien.
3. Guide any excess chi in your body to the area behind your navel and in front of the kidneys.
4. Turn the eyes down to the lower abdomen. Spiral the energy counterclockwise, like the earth spirals around the sun. Keep on spiraling until the area becomes warm and filled with chi. Direct the chi up to the crown until it pushes down to the nose. Feel the nose open and breathe deep as the chi starts to flow down to the tongue. This will help open the Microcosmic Orbit (fig. 3.12).
5. Rest and enjoy the sensations of lightness and peacefulness. Feel the spaciousness inside your body and mind.

Fig. 3.11. Laughter shake

Fig. 3.12. Turn mind and eyes down to lower abdomen.

Giggling

Rest at the lower abdomen and start to laugh again. This is a quieter, more internal laugh.

1. Place your hands over your lower tan tien and giggle from your belly. Feel your laughter shake and reverberate throughout your body (fig. 3.13). Continue laughing for five minutes.
2. Rest and place the tip of your tongue on the upper palate. This allows the energy in your head to drop down to your tan tien.
3. Guide any excess chi in your body to the area behind your navel and in front of the kidneys.
4. Turn the upper mind down.
5. Rest and enjoy the sensations of lightness and peacefulness. Feel the spaciousness inside your body and mind.

Silent Giggling: Hit the Belly Drum and Feel It Vibrate Inside

1. Place your hands over your lower tan tien and giggle silently from your belly. Feel your laughter shake and reverberate throughout your body (fig. 3.14). Continue laughing for five minutes. Rest and feel the energy rise up to the crown.
2. Place the tip of your tongue on the upper palate. This allows the energy in your head to drop down to your tan tien.

3. Guide any excess chi in your body to the area behind your navel and in front of the kidneys.
4. Gather the excess energy in your body by spiraling the energy around the navel 36 times outward and 24 times inward. Men spiral clockwise outward and counterclockwise inward; women spiral counterclockwise outward and clockwise inward. You may use your hands to help you spiral. Feel as though your intestines are physically spiraling (fig. 3.15).

Fig. 3.13. Giggle from your belly.

Fig. 3.14. Silent giggling

Fig. 3.15. a. Men collect the energy by spiraling outward from the navel 36 times in a clockwise direction. b. Then they spiral inward 24 times in a counterclockwise direction, ending at the navel. c. Women collect the energy by spiraling outward from the navel 36 times in a counterclockwise direction. d. Then they spiral inward 24 times in a clockwise direction, ending at the navel.

5. Rest and enjoy the sensations of lightness and peacefulness. Feel the spaciousness inside your body and mind.
6. Hold both hands near your heart and smile to the heart, breath into the heart, and feel your heart's calmness. Feel peace, and feel that all three tan tiens are alight together.

Breathing Between heaven and earth

After performing the laughing we use our breathing to focus on different centers of the body from head to toe. To do this exercise, sit comfortably near the edge of your chair with your feet flat on the floor. Relax your body while maintaining the alignment of your spine (fig. 3.16).

Fig. 3.16. Empty your mind down to the lower tan tien.

Breathing to the Mid-eyebrow, Heart, and Lower Tan Tien

1. Start with becoming aware of your personal star above your crown. Breathe from your lower abdomen. Smile and breathe to connect with your personal star (fig. 3.17).
2. Be aware of your mid-eyebrow in front of you and be aware of a good feeling (smiling face, a nice place, your favorite thing). Smile at this and breathe into the mid-eyebrow and into the brain for 36 breaths.
3. Be aware of your heart, smile into it, and feel it grow soft. Breathe this good feeling into the mid-eyebrow and down into the heart. Smile, feel good, and keep breathing for up to 36 breaths (see fig. 3.18).
4. Be aware of the lower tan tien, breathe into this good feeling from the mid-eyebrow and down to the heart and to the lower tan tien. Feel warm and relaxed and again breathe into this feeling 36 times (see fig. 3.19).

Fig. 3.17. Smile and breathe in the good feeling to connect with your personal star.

Fig. 3.18. Breathe the good feeling into the brain and smile down to the heart, making your heart feel soft.

Fig. 3.19. Breathe the good feeling down to your heart and to the lower tan tien.

Breathing to the Soles of the Feet, the Sacrum, and the Bones—Opening the Third Eye

This exercise connects us to the earth energy and helps it to rise up and activate the bones. When the temple bones are activated, they connect to and open up the third eye—a major opening for receiving cosmic energy.

1. Be aware of the soles of your feet and feel them breathing. Keep breathing and feel the center of the earth pulsing and breathing. Touch your sacrum and feel your sacral holes breathing and pulsating together with the soles of the feet (fig. 3.20).
2. Become aware of the bone marrow inside your sacrum.
3. Feel the pulsing and breathing chi rise up from the earth to the soles, then up to the sacrum to activate all the vertebrae in your spine, then rise up to the crown.
4. Feel the chi activate your temporal bones. Feel them pulsing and breathing.
5. Become aware of your third eye (between your eyes) and feel your third eye open.
6. Rest and enjoy the feeling of being both quiet in your body yet energized.

Fig. 3.20. The soles of the feet and the sacral holes breathing and pulsating

Combining the Laughing Chi Kung Exercises

1. Start with the three ways of laughing—boisterous, giggling, and silent giggling—and do each for 5 minutes. Rest, spin, and move the chi up to the crown and open the nostrils.

2. Put your tongue up to the palate and let chi move down to the heart center.
3. Smile to the heart and make the heart soft; calm the breath to the heart and feel the three tan tiens spiraling.
4. Breathe in to the mid-eyebrow and down to the heart, and finally down to the lower tan tien.
5. Be aware of the energy rising through the soles of your feet to activate the sacrum and raise the chi to the spine and up to the temple bones, opening the third eye.

Three Minds into One and the Powers of Ten

By just dropping our energy down and smiling to the lower tan tien we can activate our three minds—the observing brain mind, the conscious heart mind, and the aware abdominal mind. They can then be fused together to form one mind, which in the Tao we call Yi 意. From this one mind we can do all of our thinking and sensing and connect to the cosmos. This enables us to use a fraction of the energy needed when the upper mind works alone (fig. 4.1).

Fig. 4.1. The three minds

UPPER MIND, MONKEY MIND

The Taoists refer to an overused upper mind as the “monkey mind” (fig. 4.2). The monkey mind never rests and consumes an amazing amount of the body’s energy. In fact, when a person is very emotional, the upper brain can spend up to 80 percent of the whole body’s energy (fig. 4.3).

Fig. 4.2. The upper mind is known as the “monkey mind.”

Fig. 4.3. The upper mind activates all the senses, organs, and emotions, which consume a lot of energy.

THE MIDDLE BRAIN, THE CONSCIOUS MIND

The heart has its own brain, the conscious mind.

THE HEART’S CODE, PAUL PEARSALL, PH.D.

Taoism believes that the heart (middle tan tien) is also a “mind,” the seat of consciousness. The heart refines the spirit and then manifests in radiance of the spirit. The nature of the heart governs and exerts authority on the other organs.

The capacity of the heart to think is demonstrated by an experience documented in the book, The Heart’s Code, by Paul Pearsall. He relates the true story of an eight-year-old little girl who had received the heart of a murdered ten-year-old girl. This girl started screaming at night about her dreams of the man who had murdered her donor. Her mother said her daughter knew who it was. Her mother and the psychiatrist she had consulted finally decided to call the police and, using the descriptions from the little girl, they found the murderer. Everything the little heart transplant recipient reported was accurate: the time, the weapon, and so on.

Recent research has revealed that the heart generates a strong electromagnetic field within and around the body. The electricity manifests as an electrical field within and around the body, subtle but detectable. The field is shaped like a donut, or torus, similar to the biomagnetic field of the human aura, and the geomagnetic field of the earth. When we feel love and compassion, the heart radiates and shines to all the cells of the body and to people around us.

The images (fig. 4.4) show the use of ribbons to model the paths of electrical currents inside the thorax. The colors along the ribbons indicate potential (red indicates positive, blue indicates negative). (Pictures are from the website www.sci.utah.edu/sci_images.)

The axis of the heart's electromagnetic field is tilted at an angle to the body axis, similar to the tilt of the earth's magnetic field (see fig. 4.5). In the Tao, we believe that the heart tilts 45 degrees toward the North Star and that the North Star exerts a strong pull on the heart.

Electric current near the heart

Fig. 4.4. Schematic of the heart's magnetic field, the radiant heart

Fig. 4.5. Axis of the heart's electromagnetic field

In the Tao, we believe that the heart fibers are bundled into seven layers, which generate seven electromagnetic fields and seven states of compassion energy (fig. 4.6).

Fig. 4.6. Generation of seven electromagnetic fields

THE SECOND BRAIN IS A KEY CONCEPT IN TAO PRACTICE

In the beginning of my practice with my master, he taught me to lower and sink my mind down to the lower tan tien. Still, I did not understand the concept of the second brain. I only understood it much later when I read that Western technology had discovered that the nerve endings in the stomach and intestines, especially those that are related to emotional responses, are the same as those in the upper mind.

The second brain is located in the regions of the small and large intestines, which carry the same kind of neurons and tissue as the first brain in the head except that they are larger in size and consume less energy (fig. 4.7). This lower brain, situated in the abdomen, is what Taoists call the lower tan tien.

Fig. 4.7. The existence of neurons enables the second brain to learn.

Western understanding of the second Brain

The West has now recognized the existence and importance of this second lower brain (which we refer to as our "guts") and is beginning to learn about how the higher and lower brain interact (fig. 4.8).

"COMPLEX AND HIDDEN BRAIN IN THE GUT" MAKES STOMACH ACHES AND BUTTERFLIES

> The gut has a mind of its own. Just like the larger brain, this system sends and receives impulses, records experience and responds to emotions. The gut can upset the brain and the brain can upset the gut.

Fig. 4.8. Brain power of the lower tan tien—the seat of the awareness mind

In his book The Second Brain, Michael D. Gershon describes how this second brain has been known in the West for over a hundred years, but that people really did not know how to use it as a conscious element of the human organism. The Taoists, however, have worked with this brain for 5,000 years. They have discovered that "lowering" the higher brain into the lower brain allows the higher brain to rest and recover. In addition, the lower brain can attract energy from the universe and charge the higher brain or other parts of the body.

Conserve Energy with the Lower Brain

This second brain has all the properties of the normal higher brain and can perform many of the same tasks: it can be trained to think (fig. 4.9), and to do much of the daily work of the brain, such as send and receive impulses, record experience, and respond to emotions. It is able to do this while using much less energy than the higher brain.

Fig. 4.9. Taoism believes in the thinking capability of the second brain.

The Two Brains Interact in Sleep

It is important for health to train the upper mind to rest in the lower tan tien and work together with it. This happens naturally in a good state of sleep, which charges the brain, increases the sexual hormones, and repairs the body. During sleep, the brain produces 90-minute cycles of slow wave (healing wave) sleep. When the stomach has no food to digest during sleep, the abdominal brain will also produce 90-minute cycles of slow wave muscle contractions punctuated by short bursts of rapid muscle movement (fig. 4.10).

Fig. 4.10. In a good state of sleep, the upper and lower brains interact with each other.

Good sleep is essential for resting the brain, so keep in mind the following prerequisites:

1. Sleep soon after dark, by 9 p.m. Between 9 p.m. and 2 a.m. is the time when melatonin is produced.
2. Do not have food in the stomach.
3. The room must have no light; it should be completely dark (neon light will awaken the pineal gland).
4. Couples should use separate beds or have enough space to recharge vital energy.
5. There should be no noise.
6. The room should be cool.

Rest the Upper Brain During the Day

The Universal Tao practices also enable us to rest the upper brain during the day by emptying it down to the lower brain when we do not need to use it or are doing routine things. When we let our upper mind rest, we conserve energy and improve the health of the body, mind, and spirit (fig. 4.11). When we lower down the upper mind, it will also lower our blood pressure and anxiety levels.

Fig. 4.11. Universal Tao practices utilize the lower brain and charge the upper brain.

BALANCING THE THREE ENERGY CENTERS

The three energy centers of the body have different generating and storing capabilities: the upper mind can generate and receive energy, but it is not good at storing energy; the organs can store energy very well, but they are not good at generating energy; the sexual organs can generate energy very quickly and can multiply it, but they cannot contain it—as soon as it is generated it goes out (fig. 4.12).

The Universal Tao practice of Three Minds into One balances the three energy centers (fig. 4.13). It charges the organs with chi, which they then store and gradually release to the brain. This effect can last for 10 to 12 hours. This practice gives a calm release of energy, unlike coffee, which creates nervous side effects.

Fig. 4.12. Our three energy centers have different generating and storing capabilities.

Fig. 4.13. Universal Tao practice balances the three energy centers.

Three Minds into One

Paradoxically, in order to project ourselves out into the immensity of the galaxies and the universe to gather limitless resources of cosmic chi for healing, we must take the first steps of the journey within ourselves. In order to "go out," we must first "go in." The vehicle for this magical journey is powered by our ability to relax in mind and body.

As we physically relax and let go of muscular and emotional tensions we gain access to the inner realms by turning on our very special subtle smile. It opens the pathways of the parasympathetic nervous system. This helps us to reduce the habits of our senses to flow outward so that we can be more alert in sensing our inner universe.

This simple process of “going in” enables us to develop our internal skills that will allow us to safely “go out” to the universe (fig. 4.14).

Fig. 4.14. Focus your attention inside and connect with the outside universe.

Overall, this is a process of expanding awareness outward and turning consciousness inward (fig. 4.15). There are five major steps.

1. Relax the body and the nervous system.
2. Empty the mind down: turn the upper mind into an observing mind, and observe inwardly; spiral at the heart and start to turn the conscious mind down to the lower tan tien.
3. Combine three minds into one mind at the lower tan tien and keep it spiraling.
4. Spiral at the crown and the mid-eyebrow.
5. Connect to the Tao.

Fig. 4.15. Combine three minds into one mind at the lower tan tien.

Step 1: Relax and Let Go

Smile to the mid-eyebrow, eyebrows, eyes, mouth, jaw, tongue, lips, cheeks, ears, shoulders, ribcage, and brain. Let the relaxed sensations and the observer mind (upper brain) sink down into the lower tan tien.

1. Smile to the mid-eyebrow. Relax and let go. Smile to the eyebrows and let them grow long to the sides. Lower these relaxed sensations down to the tan tien (fig. 4.16).

Fig. 4.16. Smile to the mid-eyebrow: relax and think of the eyebrows growing very long.

2. Smile to the eyes: relax the eyes and feel how nice and cool they are. Let the eyes gently draw back in their sockets and start to sink down to the chest and gradually down to the abdomen, the home of your feeling and awareness mind (fig. 4.17).

Fig. 4.17. Smile and relax the eyes, sink into the eye sockets, and gradually feel the eyes dropping down into the abdomen.

3. Relax the two broad muscles extending from the outer portions of the upper lips across the cheekbones, and lightly smile, feeling their connection to the upper front of the ears. Gradually feel the ears growing “long,” up and down. Feel the ears grow all the way down and connect to the kidneys (fig. 4.18).

Fig. 4.18. Smile to the ears and listen to the kidneys.

4. Open your mouth and relax your jaw, separating the upper and lower teeth. Feel the jaw relax. Once the jaw relaxes, the shoulders will relax and drop down. Continue to feel the jaw relax until you feel the saliva start to come out. Relax down to the rib cage. Feel the rib cage drop down, softening all the joints, relaxing down to the lower tan tien. Let the tongue relax back in the mouth. Feel the tongue start to drop down into the throat to the chest and all the way down to the navel as the “floating” sensation sinks down to the lower tan tien.

5. Smile to the shoulders and relax until you feel the shoulders drop and the rib cage relax (see fig. 4.19).
6. Place your tongue on the roof of the mouth to make the connection (see fig. 4.20).

Fig. 4.19. Relax the jaw, shoulders, and tongue. Move the awareness down to the lower tan tien.

Fig. 4.20. Place your tongue on the roof of the mouth to make the connection.

Step 2: Empty the Mind Down and Spiral or Turn the Wheel

1. Spiral at the heart to activate consciousness and sink deep into the empty space within. Smile down and empty the mind down to the lower tan tien, the awareness mind (fig. 4.21).

2. Let go and feel the vastness of the outer universe within: you are back to your primordial force (fig. 4.22). When we are back in the primordial force, similar to being back in the womb, we are fed by the universe. Sense your inner universe as being very vast, very deep, and very dark. Just keep on smiling deeper and deeper down in the body and fill it with good feeling.
3. Once you sink deep enough to the dark, empty vastness, you can begin to see the dot of light, as you enter into the "Mystery Gate." You are actually entering into one of your own cells and into the outer genes and DNA. The spaces between each cell are very big and when we enlarge DNA to imitate the star, the space between mirrors that of the cosmos.
4. Start to spiral at the lower tan tien. When the abdomen is warm, it is full of chi. It can then charge up to the brain.

Fig. 4.21. Empty the mind down to the tan tien and spiral or turn the wheel.

Fig. 4.22. Be immersed in the dark empty space of your inner universe.

Step 3: Turn Three Minds into One Mind

The lower tan tien is like a battery that can be charged with the energy of the universe (fig. 4.23). Spinning the tan tien and being aware of the spin far in the universe is enough to establish the contact and get the process going.

1. Fuse the three minds into one mind (the Yi power) at the lower tan tien.
2. Keep spiraling to draw the energy in.

Fig. 4.23. The universe charges tan tien power.

Step 4: Spiral at the Mid-eyebrow and the Crown

1. Spiral the Yi power at the mid-eyebrow and the crown (fig. 4.24).

Fig. 4.24. Spiral the Yi power at the mid-eyebrow and the crown.

Step 5: Connect to the Tao

1. Once you get in touch with your own inner universe, you will then have the ability to connect with the outer cosmos. Turn the consciousness in and expand the awareness out to connect to the universe and the six directions at the mid-eyebrow and the crown (see fig. 4.25). The expression, “tan tien and the universe,” is a reminder to feel your lower tan tien, your heart, your mid-eyebrow, and your crown spiraling while the universe spirals in the six directions around you.
2. Tune in to the cosmic forces. The cosmic forces will turn into chi, and heal and strengthen the body, turning these forces into spiritual food.
3. Repeatedly use your Yi, the three-mind power, to recharge your chi for various purposes. You recharge by connecting to the chi in the six directions of the universe simultaneously. Then, to charge a particular area or direct chi into the body at a particular point, establish a connection point for the chi by placing the hand or fingers on the surface at that location. This is like giving an address for the chi to go to.

Fig. 4.25. Tan tien and the universe: consciousness in and awareness out

EXPAND YOUR AWARENESS AND CALMNESS

When the upper mind is overactive it will suppress consciousness and awareness, but when we fuse our minds in the lower tan tien, we become conscious and aware of things we were never conscious or aware of before. It is better to turn your consciousness in and expand your awareness outward.

Awareness is non-selective; it covers all that influences us, all information that reaches us. That information is filtered and only a tiny part becomes conscious. But we can use our upper brain mind to tune in to specific parts, like tuning to a specific radio or TV station. Working with this information happens in the middle brain.

When consciousness and awareness are both out, it is like having good radar and a good monitor but no one to watch them. If you turn your mind and your awareness out, you become a spiritual slave. If you have no inner observation or self-consciousness, people will be able to tell you to do anything and you will do it.

Roots and anchors exist to keep us from straying too far from home. The self is the center of the heart and the center of the body is the lower tan tien. If you turn your heart, senses, mind, and awareness out, there is nothing left on the inside and you have left yourself unrooted. You will be more inclined to be influenced by the thoughts and energies of others because you have allowed yourself to be tainted by mass emotion, by what you have “picked up.”

Imbalance on a small or grand scale may lie ahead if you are not careful.

Some believe enlightenment can be purchased from the supermarket, others that it can be hitched on to like a tour bus. Some wait for reincarnations and second comings, divine intervention and alien interception. Whatever your beliefs, the most important thing is to check and know that they are really yours. The Tao believes that we can all become immortal, but that we have to work toward this end by way of natural and constant progression. The time it takes to prepare is usually about the same time it takes to live this mortal existence.

We are capable of expanding our awareness very far into the universe (see fig. 4.26). Accomplished Taoist masters were able to sit in a room and expand their awareness like radar so that they could perceive what happened elsewhere in the universe. When we bring our three minds into one mind, expand our awareness like a radar, and let our conscious mind watch the monitor in our tan tien, we achieve greater awareness, consciousness, and calmness. In addition, a developed tan tien has its own set of senses, which are recognized as the sixth sense.

Fig. 4.26. Consciousness is like a watcher, watching what the awareness picks up.

HUMAN ENERGY HAS THE SAME QUALITY AS THE UNIVERSAL ENERGY

We are really children of the universe. We are composed of the same elements as one finds in space and our internal structures can be found externally as well (fig. 4.27).

Fig. 4.27. We are the universal children.

The universe has all the components to create life. We have the same structure as the cosmic particles. The universe is filled with nitrogen, protons, and electromagnetic power, which are the same as our energy, bio-electromagnetic power.

POWERS OF TEN—THE UNIVERSE AND THE HUMAN

We have included an extract from the wonderful publication Powers of Ten by Philip and Phylis Morrison, due to its relevance to the Cosmic Orbit and the intrinsic and boundless relationship with the Tao. Powers of Ten is a true masterpiece, an enlightened work of divine comprehension. It demonstrates natural progressions and transitions and the cyclic nature of things, leading us through the realms of infinity.

The “outward” explosion merges with the “inward” implosion, creating the inner eye of a non-vacuous nothingness.

The macrocosm and the microcosm merge in heavenly intercourse. Our cells and atoms have a very close relationship with that of the cosmos.

The next pages contain a series of pictures taken from the book. We have made a few adjustments to the annotations, in our attempt to clarify and enhance understanding from a slightly less scientific point of view. The first (to which we have added our labels) shows a picture of space a billion light years away. In each consecutive picture the distance is lowered by a factor of 10. Gradually they focus in on our galaxy, the Milky Way, and to the solar system in it, and from there to the earth, to a specific location on the earth (Lake Michigan), and to two people lying on the shore of the beach of this lake. The pictures zoom in on the couple, a hand, the skin, and, as the zoom is increased, to a cell, the gene chromosomes, and so on. (We have selected only some of the pictures, so—unlike in the original book—the increments between them are greater than a single power of ten.) Zooming in on the microcosm and expanding out to the macrocosm reveal a remarkably similar picture. Our cells connect to the cosmos; the book firmly describes this: “As above, so below.” At both extremes there is much emptiness or a void. This is the ultimate source of things (fig. 4.28).

Fig. 4.28. 1 billion light years: 10^{25} meters

Most of “space” looks as empty as this, the glow of distant galaxies like clotted dust. This emptiness is normal. At this scale, the distribution of matter is roughly uniform; there is virtually no pattern or structure. A tenfold larger view would show no new structure, no new void. This view will dim slowly, for a few billion years at least, as the faint clusters drift farther apart.

At 10^{24} meters or a 100 million light years we look toward our distant home in the Milky Way, but we mostly see one large intervening cluster of galaxies, called the Virgo Cluster (fig. 4.29).

Galaxies as a rule associate into orbiting clusters and groups. There is reason to believe that our Milky Way is itself an outpost of the big Virgo Cluster, responsive to its steady gravitational pull: part of a super cluster. Out beyond the Milky Way is an enormous space nearly devoid of noticeable galaxies.

At a million light years away our galaxy, approximately 200 billion stars, is clearly visible (fig. 4.30). The flat circular disk of the Milky Way adopts the form of a spiral. It travels in space with two satellite galaxies, the irregular little Clouds of Magellan. We have only observed a few galaxies that are larger than our own and smaller than the Clouds of Magellan.

At a trillion kilometers, only the sun is to be seen, against a background of fainter stars beyond (see fig. 4.31). Once this was all we knew of the frontier of the sun's system. We know now that a great cloud of icy comets orbits slowly at the frontier, though they are invisible in the weak sunlight. We see them only when a few fall each year into the brighter regions near Earth. There we catch sight of them, moving in the sky like temporary planets, the sun's fires boiling out of their long faint tails.

Fig. 4.29. 100 million light years: 10^{24} meters

Fig. 4.30. 1 million light years: 10^{22} meters

The paths of the outer planets fill the picture taken at 10 billion kilometers (fig. 4.32). The strongly tilted orbit belongs to little Pluto. The four others are those of Neptune, Uranus, Saturn, and Jupiter, with their many satellites. Between Jupiter's path and the sun run the inner planets in their smaller orbits. The planets circulate counterclockwise here (which we view at an angle), all nearly on the same plane. The planetary system, apart from Pluto, is as flat as a pancake.

Fig. 4.31. 1 trillion kilometers: 10^{15} meters

Fig. 4.32. 10 billion kilometers: 10^{13} meters

At a 100 million kilometers, we see the inner solar system (fig. 4.33). The red arc is traversed by planet Earth during some six weeks each September and October.

At a 100 thousand kilometers, the whole Earth appears, isolated, elegant, and fragile (fig. 4.34). We recognize our globe in open space, a spacecraft in orbit with no Atlas to support it. Its smooth, swift motion around the sun carries it across such a square at this very hour.

Fig. 4.33. 100 million kilometers: 10^{11} meters

Fig. 4.34. 100 thousand kilometers: 10^{8} meters

In the view from 100 kilometers away, the metropolitan area of Chicago nestles at the south end of the lake (fig. 4.35). On the day the picture was taken, someone walking along the street might have looked up to a blue sky and never known that a camera plane was flying high above, beyond his or her eyesight. The lattice visible among so many blurred streets is the mile-square grid of wide Chicago boulevards.

The picture from 10 meters away shows that, along the Chicago lakeside, a man and a woman are at a picnic in the park (fig. 4.36). This picnic has been at the center of every picture viewed so far.

Fig. 4.35. 100 kilometers: 10^{5} meters

Fig. 4.36. 0.1 kilometer: 10^1 meters

“Of all things, man is the measure,” Protagoras the Sophist proclaimed. His measurements were correct, as this image portrays a life scale of a man and his daily pleasures, including food for the mind, body, and soul (fig. 4.37). The man rests from these activities, as life inside and all around him continues.

The scale is now intimate: the view at .1 meter (10 centimeters) is an up close look at the back of the man’s hand, a little enlarged (fig. 4.38). This animate structure is the creative force of all human manifestation, making it possible to put thoughts into actions. It is the connecting pull between the mind and body communication. Every cell in this living object continually corresponds with all other cells in the entire being.

Fig. 4.37. 1 meter: 10^0 meters

Fig. 4.38. 0.1 meter: 10^{-1} meters

At 10 microns, we pass through the living skin to enter a capillary vessel, where blood oozes by. Most blood cells are the small, incomplete, short-lived disks that give red blood its color. This white cell, a lymphocyte, is a long-lived participant in the complex cellular and chemical strategy called the immune system, the body's defense against infection (fig. 4.39).

At .1 micron (1 thousand angstroms), the coils of DNA molecules are visible (fig. 4.40). Held safely inside the cell nucleus, these enormously long molecules are cunningly spooled and folded within this tiny space. These vital instructions are carefully duplicated at every cell division. One such thread of DNA is stored in each of the forty-six chromosomes within the nucleus of every human cell.

Fig. 4.39. 10 microns: 10^{-5} meters

Fig. 4.40. 0.1 micron: 10^{-7} meters

At 100 angstroms, the DNA is seen as a long twisted molecular ladder, the double helix (fig. 4.41). The individuality of the organism is held in the running sequence of the differing rungs. That chemical message is spelled out at great length in a molecular alphabet of four letters. One alphabet serves all life, but the tale retold in every cell of the body differs from individual to individual.

The molecular building blocks are the “letters” of the genetic message, which spell out the long text; they are a form of molecular typography. The view at 10 angstroms (1 nanometer) shows these chemical patterns, the ordinary stable structures of bound atoms, themselves indifferent to life (see fig. 4.42). The central carbon atom is bonded to three visible hydrogen atoms (and to another atom that lies behind). A similar linkage might well be found abundantly among carbon and hydrogen atoms drifting in the cold thin clouds of our interstellar space.

The quantum laws of atomic scale require a description of electron motion that is more subtle and less sequential than for the moving particles of ordinary experience. Accordingly, the dot texture shown at 1 angstrom does not map individual electrons (fig. 4.43). Instead, it suggests the cloud of electrical charge the electrons paint out during their symmetrical but untraceable quantum pattern of motion. In that cloud the surface electrons are shared by the bonded atoms.

Fig. 4.41. 100 angstroms: 10^{-8} meters

Fig. 4.42. 10 angstroms: 10^{-9} meters

A transient view of the eternally dancing structure of stable carbon-12 is shown at 100 fermis (fig. 4.44). The neutrons and protons that join to form it are universal nuclear modules. Protons are found free as natural hydrogen; neutrons can be set free by energetic nuclear reaction as in the fission of uranium. Study of these particles as independent objects has revealed one more analogue to chemistry: they too react upon collisions at high enough energy to produce a host of new particles, mostly transient ones.

Fig. 4.43. 1 angstrom: 10^{-10} meters

Fig. 4.44. 100 fermis: 10^{-14} meters

The two rails of the DNA ladder come apart during cell duplication, each to act as a template for one complete new copy of the ladder of rungs. When the frequency is 8Hz, transcription occurs in the nucleus, while translation takes place in the cytoplasm (fig. 4.45).

Fig. 4.45. Transcription and translation

During transcription, the genetic information in DNA is copied to RNA, which in the Tao is known as cupping or self-intercourse (fig. 4.46).

Fig. 4.46. During transcription, the genetic information in DNA is copied to RNA.

Taoism refers to a power symbol known as the pakua, which encompasses the eight forces of nature. Pa means "eight" and kua is "symbol." The eight forces that the pakua holds are kan (water), li (fire), chen (thunder), tui (lake, rain), kun (earth), ken (mountain), sun (wind), and chien (wood). Each force corresponds to a particular organ and one of the five senses as well. The eight forces, like the five elements, are the result of the interplay of yin and yang. The sixty-four hexagrams and eight connecting lines are similar to the DNA and RNA (fig. 4.47).

Fig. 4.47. The sixty-four hexagrams and eight connecting lines of the pakua are similar to the DNA and RNA.

The infinite worlds of the universe are intimately connected with the finite worlds of the human being. Each universe spirals indefinitely into itself and then out again, creating space and energy. This energy is infinite, and yet we are able to measure this mystery with the powers of the mind and technology. With these powers multiplied, we have proven that we can begin to make the connections between the properties and nature of our outside world and that of our own natural physical body. It is imperative to understand the relationship of these intertwining universes, for we are the creators of harmony, balance, and freedom, or agony, destruction, and war within these worlds.

It is only because of our continuous research into the unlimited possibilities of the internal and external universe that we have discovered some of the unknown, intrinsic mystery of life. We still have so much to unravel. Because of our natural ability to be just and balanced with these pulling forces, we are drawn to discover the ways in which the world turns.

GOD IS TOO BIG TO FIT IN ONE RELIGION

When the early Taoist masters calmed down and turned their consciousness in and their awareness out to the universe, they discovered the center of the universe and the spiral force. They also discovered that when energy and the mind’s thinking pattern were sent up to the universe, they would multiply.

The founders of the Tao system discovered that they could send specific patterns of energy, for example good or bad emotions, into the universe. These patterns would multiply there and gain in strength before they returned to the sender or to wherever the sender wanted them to go. When many people send the same patterns into the universe, they multiply further and attain some independent existence. An example of this is how religions are formed. Some people think that all of reality comes about this way.

Like in The Powers of Ten, we can bring our attention to the lower tan tien, which gives us another vast universe. Then our inner universe can connect with the outside universe (fig. 4.48).

Fig. 4.48. You can create positive energy patterns in the universe by generating a pattern within. God is too big to fit into one religion.

Multiplying Positive Energy Patterns in the Universe

We can heal ourselves by using positive images and affirmations. Once we create positive images of ourselves and affirmations of positive decisions, we can send them out into the universe. They will be multiplied and return to be manifested for us.

Creating Positive Images

1. Hold a positive image, such as “I am 27 years young” in the center of your awareness in the lower tan tien (fig. 4.49).
2. Then move the image up to the third eye and intensify it.

Fig. 4.49. Positive images

Affirming Positive Emotions and Making Positive Decisions

1. Hold a positive image of yourself as a happy, joyful person in the center of your awareness in the lower tan tien, as you make positive affirmations (fig. 4.50).

Affirm: "I let go of old emotional experiences, seeing them for what they are, and fill myself with radiant joy, love, and compassion."

Affirm: "I make an agreement with myself to enjoy the best of life and to live to my fullest abundant potential."

Fig. 4.50. Positive emotions

Sending Positive thoughts out to the universe to Be Multiplied

1. Send your positive images and affirmations out into the universe (fig. 4.51).
2. The positive energy will multiply and return to be manifested for you. If you have a question, you can also send that out and the answer will come.

Fig. 4.51. Send out positive images and emotions to the universe.

Cosmic Healing Chi Kung

THE COSMIC INNER SMILE

The Cosmic Inner Smile is a powerful relaxation and self-healing technique that uses the energy of love, happiness, kindness, and gentleness as a language to communicate with the internal organs of the body. It is a very powerful Chi Kung practice that aids the transformation of negative emotions into positive virtuous energy. By learning to smile inwardly to the organs and glands, your whole body will feel loved and appreciated and enjoy more chi.

The Inner Smile originates from self-love toward our own body (fig. 5.1). The secret of true love is to be lovable. To be lovable is to possess a smile that says, "I love you with a heart filled with joy and gratitude." A genuine smile transforms negative energy into loving energy that has the power to relax, balance, and heal. In the Inner Smile practice you smile down to your abdomen and warm it up, smile to your heart and feel love in the heart center, and so on. Your energy levels increase, the heartbeat remains calm, the body relaxes, and energy charges up the brain. For more details on the Inner Smile practice, please see my book The Inner Smile (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2008).

Each organ corresponds to a specific element and color. For example, the kidneys correspond to the element of water and the color blue, which is the color of gentleness and calmness. The heart corresponds to the element of fire and the color red, which is the color of goodness. The spleen is bright yellow, the color of openness and fairness; the lungs are bright white, the color of courage and righteousness; the liver is bright green, the color of kindness and generosity. These organ colors and their associated universal connections have great healing power.

In the Cosmic Inner Smile meditation each organ is connected to its associated color; when the organ's vital color is abundant it will radiate out as an aura for healing and protection (fig. 5.2).

The Cosmic Inner Smile

To prepare for the Cosmic Inner Smile, do the Three Minds into One practice described in chapter 4. The second brain is the essence of the Inner Smile. During the meditation, keep emptying the mind down to the lower tan tien and the organs and cells (fig. 5.3). By emptying the mind, we transfer energy from the mind to the organs.

Fig. 5.1. Self-love toward our own body

Fig. 5.2. The Cosmic Inner Smile

Fig. 5.3. Charge the organs with chi by smiling to the organs and the cells.

The Cosmic Inner Smile is performed in the following sequence:

1. Heart (and small intestine)
2. Spleen (and stomach and pancreas)
3. Lungs (and large intestine)
4. Kidneys
5. Sexual organs
6. Liver (and gallbladder)

Step 1. Connect with the Heart and the Small Intestine

The Cosmic Inner Smile begins with the heart because it refines the spirit. It is a natural governor and exerts authority on other organs. The heart and the small intestine are both able to store and transform chi.

1. Smile, relax, and empty the mind to the heart and the small intestine (fig. 5.4). Keep the tan tien spiraling.

Fig. 5.4. The heart and the small intestine can store and transform chi.

2. Smile to the heart and make it feel soft. Put the hands over the heart as you smile to it. Feel the heart fill with love and joyous energy. Feel the heart spiral and radiate (fig. 5.5).

3. Smile to the red and white blood cells (fig. 5.6).

Fig. 5.5. Feel the heart spiral.

Fig. 5.6. Red and white blood cells

4. Smile and bring the senses down to the tan tien. Drop down, let go, and sense the dark, deep, and vast inner universe within. Feel the vastness of the outer universe and the primordial force all around you.

5. Charge the brain with transformed chi from the heart and the small intestine (fig. 5.7).

Fig. 5.7. Charge the brain with transformed chi from the heart and the small intestine.

6. Leave the hands over the heart and start to spiral as before (fig. 5.8). Direct your mind to the tan tiens and the universe.

   Start to spiral in the lower tan tien, the heart, the brain, and the crown (fig. 5.9).

7. Be aware of the universes above you, below you, in front of and behind you, all spiraling. Feel the universe charge your tan tien, and the tan tien charge your heart and small intestine (see fig. 5.10).

Fig. 5.8. The heart can generate 37 layers of magnetic field.

Fig. 5.9. Spiraling at the three tan tiens

Fig. 5.10. Connect with the universe and become charged with the universal energy.

Step 2. Connect with the Spleen, the Stomach, and the Pancreas

The spleen and stomach are responsible for the storehouses and granaries of the body. The five tastes stem from these organs.

1. Smile, relax, and empty the mind down to the spleen, the stomach, and the pancreas (fig. 5.11).
2. Cover the spleen with your hands. Smile to the spleen, pancreas, and stomach. Feel openness and fairness there, and breathe bright yellow openness and fairness energy into them (fig. 5.12).
3. Leave the hands over the spleen and start to spiral as before. Direct your mind to the tan tien and the universe. Start to spiral in the tan tien until the heart, the brain, and the crown all start to spiral.
4. Be aware of the universes above you, below you, in front of and behind you, all of them spiraling and blending with the chi that you send up. Feel the universe charge your tan tien, and the tan tien charge your spleen, pancreas, and stomach (fig. 5.13).

Fig. 5.11. Connect with the spleen, the stomach, and the pancreas.

Fig. 5.12. Smile down and charge the spleen with loving energy.

Fig. 5.13. Charge your spleen, pancreas, and stomach with universal energy.

Step 3. Connect with the Lungs and the Large Intestine

The lungs hold the office of minister and chancellor, the regulation of the life-extending network to other organs.

1. Relax, smile, and empty the mind down to the lungs and the large intestine (fig. 5.14).
2. With the mind empty, smile to transform the chi in the lungs and the large intestine. Let the chi rise to charge the brain (fig. 5.15).
3. Maintain the hands and lungs connection, and direct your mind to the tan tien and the universe. Start to spiral in the tan tien until the heart, brain, and the crown start to spiral (fig. 5.16).
4. Be aware of the universes above you, below you, in front of and behind you; all of them are spiraling. Feel the universe charge your tan tien, and the tan tien charge your lungs and large intestine (fig. 5.17).

Fig. 5.14. Connect with the lungs and the large intestine.

Fig. 5.15. Transform the chi in the lungs with smiling energy and let the chi rise to charge the brain.

Fig. 5.16. Prepare to connect with the universe.

Fig. 5.17. Let the universal energy charge the lungs and the large intestine.

Step 4. Connect with the Kidneys

The kidneys represent strong will, strong purpose, clear ideas, and good feeling.

1. Smile, relax, and empty the mind down to the kidneys and let the kidney cells feel the loving smile (fig. 5.18).
2. Put the hands over the kidneys. Fill the organs with love and compassion.
3. Maintain the connection between the hands and the kidneys, and direct your mind to the tan tien and the universe. Start to spiral in the tan tien until the heart, brain, and the crown start to spiral (fig. 5.19).
4. Be aware of the universes above you, below you, in front of and behind you, all spiraling. Feel the universe charge your tan tien, and the tan tien charge your kidneys and bladder (fig. 5.20).

Fig. 5.18. Let the kidney cells feel the loving smile.

Fig. 5.19. Maintain mind connection with the tan tien.

Fig. 5.20. Connect with universal energy to charge the kidneys.

Step 5. Connect with Your Sexual Organs

1. Smile, relax, and empty the mind down to the sexual organs (fig. 5.21).

Fig. 5.21. Connect with your sexual organs.

2. Put your hands over the sexual organs. Smile to the sexual cells (fig. 5.22). Fill the organs with love and compassion. Let the sexual organs be engulfed in the light pink color. Let the brain be charged with chi from the sexual organs.

Fig. 5.22. Smile to the sexual cells.

3. Maintain the hands over the pelvic area. Be aware of the tan tien. Breathe gently to the sexual organs (fig. 5.23). Start to spiral in the tan tien till the heart, the brain, and the crown start to spiral together.

Fig. 5.23. Breathe gently to the sexual organs.

4. Be aware of the universes above you, below you, in front of and behind you; all of them are spiraling. Feel the universe charging your tan tien, and the tan tien charging your sexual organs (fig. 5.24).

Fig. 5.24. Charge the sexual organs with the universal energy.

Step 6. Connect with the Liver and the Gallbladder

The liver holds the office of general of the armed forces; it assesses circumstances and conceives of plans.

1. Empty the mind to the liver and the gallbladder.
2. Cover the liver with your hands. Smile to the liver (see fig. 5.25). Feel kindness and generosity, and breathe bright green kindness and generosity energy into the liver and the gallbladder. Let the liver be filled with the green, warm energy of the forest.
3. Keep the hands over the liver. Be aware of the tan tien. Start to spiral in the tan tien until the heart, brain, and the crown start to spiral together (fig. 5.26).
4. Send the chi up to be multiplied. Be aware of the universes above you, below you, in front of and behind you; all of them are spiraling and multiplying with your chi. Feel the universe charge your tan tien, and the tan tien charge your liver and gallbladder (fig. 5.27).

Fig. 5.25. Smile to the liver.

OPENING THE THREE TAN TIENS TO THE SIX DIRECTIONS

Opening the Three Tan Tiens to the Six Directions is a Chi Kung meditation that strengthens our connection to the universe, opening us up to the primordial force of the cosmos and the energy within nature. The practice combines the power of the mind with the extension of chi. This combination allows our personal consciousness to directly connect to the patterns and matrices of energy in the universe. When we put our thoughts into the web of the universe, we transform the electromagnetic energy into a force that is accessible to us. When we are connected to the Tao, life ceases to be a struggle.

Storing Energy in the Three Tan Tiens

Once we make the connection with the forces of energy in the universe, we then want to be able to store this energy in the body. Energy is like money: if you are making a million dollars a year and spend a million dollars, you have nothing left to use in the future. That is the way we live and use our energy in our society. We are spending more energy than we are saving and we are living on borrowed energy, paying very high interest. Our credit will run out very soon.

In the Universal Tao practice, we store energy in the three tan tiens, the reservoirs of energy within us: our internal chi savings accounts. All the tan tiens have both yin and yang within them. In nature, the yin and yang are present in all things. Day (yang) turns into the sunset, which turns to night (yin). It is very important to feel the qualities of yin within yang and yang with yin (sunrise/sunset). One quality does not exist without the other. They are inseparable qualities of the same force.

As we have seen, the upper tan tien is in the brain (the Crystal Room, third ventricle), and when it is full of energy, the capacity of the brain increases. We store our spiritual intelligence, the mind, here (see fig. 5.28).

The heart center tan tien, between the two nipples, is associated with the fire element. Yet within fire there is always water. The original spirit (shen) is stored here (fig. 5.29).

The lower abdomen at the navel is like an empty universe or ocean (fig. 5.30). We want to feel a universe of energy in the lower tan tien. Within this universe or ocean, there is a fire, like a volcano under the ocean: “fire under water.”

These reservoirs are places where we can store, transform, and collect energy. The reservoirs are the source of energy that flows through the body. The meridians are rivers of energy fed by these reservoirs. The goal of Opening the Three Tan Tiens to the Six Directions is to continually fill and replenish the energy of the three tan tiens. In these practices, we use a variety of hand movements and body postures to open to the energy around us. We draw the energy from the six directions into the body and activate the three fires; then we are ready to circulate the energy in the Cosmic Orbit.

We begin with the Three Minds into One practice given in detail in chapter 4. It consists of five steps:

1. Relax the body by smiling down.
2. Empty the mind down: turn the upper mind into an observing mind, and observe inwardly; making the heart soft helps to activate consciousness.

Fig. 5.28. The upper tan tien

Fig. 5.29. The middle tan tien

Fig. 5.30. The lower tan tien

3. Fuse three minds into one mind at the lower tan tien (the Yi Power) and keep it spiraling.

4. Expand the Yi Power to the mid-eyebrow, crown, and forehead, and thence into the universe.
5. Connect to the Tao. Feel yourself being charged by the universe from all six directions (fig. 5.31).

Fig. 5.31. Connect with the universe and the six directions.

Activating the Six Directions and the Three Fires

This powerful energetic technique teaches you how to expand your mind and chi, to touch the force in the cosmos, and to draw that energy back into the body. By practicing the Six Directions daily you will increase your healing and cosmic power. When you achieve the Three Minds into One Mind, begin expanding into the six directions, beginning with the direction straight down below you.

Direction Below

As you do this step, trust and believe that your visualization will turn into actualization: your hands become long; your feet become long, going all the way down into the earth and out past it into the galaxy below on the other side. Then go down through the galaxy, way beyond to the primordial force. It's as though you are extending all the way to the primordial force 30 million years ago or before (fig. 5.32).

1. Stand with your feet together. Put your hands down parallel to the ground.

Press your hands down and smile into the ground. Expand yourself deep down into the earth—very, very deep down into the earth.

2. Push, moving the hands forward six inches only. When you push, connect with the galaxy below.
3. Pull, moving the hands back by the sides; as you pull, think about your tan tien filling with chi. Smile to your tan tien, dark, deep, and vast.
4. Push: touch the primordial force in the universe.
5. Pull back the dark primordial force with your hands to your tan tien. Push and pull: project your awareness into the vast empty space. Then come back to your tan tien, which is also empty, just like the primordial condition before anything existed, the source of all. Push and pull 3 to 9 times.

Fig. 5.32. a. Hands expand through the earth and to the galaxy below. b. Hands push forward and pull back. c. Smile to the primordial chi from the universe as it is drawn in to fill the tan tien with chi.

Front Direction and Tan Tien Fire

Next, be aware of the front direction; a huge fireball appears in front of you. Open your palms: scoop up the chi, scoop up the fire. Bring the fire into your tan tien. Activate the tan tien fire (fig. 5.33).

1. Start with a small dot of light inside you. Expand your awareness, smiling to the universe in front of you.
2. Become aware of a big fireball in front of you. Feel your hands becoming bigger and longer. Scoop up the fireball. You may close your eyes to help your inner senses.

3. Use the fireball to light the fire in your lower tan tien. Feel the fire burning in the darkness, the “fire burning under the sea.”

Fig. 5.33. a. Be aware of the universe in front. b. Expand your hands very big and long to the universe in front. c. Hold the fireball to activate the lower tan tien fire.

Back Direction and Kidney Fire

Be aware of the back of the tan tien, the Door of Life, and the back or rear direction. Extend your mind very far away to the back. Scoop up the fire and light up your “kidney fire” (fig. 5.34).

1. Expand your awareness all the way to the back. Move the arms toward the universe behind you.
2. Touch the universe; scoop up the fire. Activate the kidney fire. Maintain your awareness in the tan tien and expand, smiling out to the universe. The energetic spiral glows in the tan tien. Spiral in the heart, spiral in your crown, and spiral in the universe.

Fig. 5.34. Be aware of the back direction, move the arms toward the universe behind you, and scoop up the universal fire.

Heart Fire

Raise your hands up under your armpits, and feel yourself holding two fireballs. Touch the heart by extending the fingers energetically in from the sides; feel your hands extending into your heart and very far away. Activate the heart fire (fig. 5.35).

1. Move your hands up under your armpits and extend your fingers deep into your heart. Keep your awareness on the infinite space to the sides.
2. Connect to the tan tien and increase the fire in yourself.
3. Feel your heart soft in the center of the chest as you smile down. Feel the warmth of the fire, and the energy of love, joy, and happiness in the heart.
4. Feel the connection with the unconditional love in the universe as you keep your heart consciousness in your tan tien and extend your awareness out to the universe.

Fig. 5.35. Activate the heart fire.

Sacred Fire (Chi Fire, Holy Fire)

Connect the three fires to combine into one fire: heart to kidneys to navel to heart (fig. 5.36).

1. Move your hands together in front of your heart.
2. Connect the heart fire to the kidney fire, the kidney fire to the tan tien fire, and then back up to your heart.
3. Connect them all as one triangular sacred fire, circulating the chi between the three centers, first slowly, then getting faster and faster.

Fig. 5.36. Connect the three fires and the sacred fire.

Opening the Third Eye to the Six Directions

Now, extend your hands out to the front, very far away—pushing, pushing, pushing. Turn your palms inward, and extend your middle fingers inward toward your third eye. Picture a crack in the middle of your forehead, and pull the crack open. Feel the light from the heavens opening it and feel the light from the heavens shining into your brain.

1. Open your palms. Open your eyes. Look to the universe. Extend your hands to the front, palms vertical. Extend the arms from the scapulae. Smile and touch the universe (fig. 5.37).
2. Turn your palms inward and extend your middle fingers inward toward your third eye.
3. Picture a crack in the middle of your forehead and let the heavenly light shine into the brain; pull the crack open and let the light reflect into the organs (see fig. 5.38).
4. Close the third eye. Pull: open-close-open-close. With the third eye open, the light from the heavens shines into your brain and reflects down to all your organs. Open and close the third eye 3 to 9 times.

Fig. 5.37. Look out as you smile into the universe in front of you.

Fig. 5.38. a. The middle finger hooks into the third eye and light reflects down into the organs. b. Pull open the third eye; let heaven open and shine its light into the brain.

Front Direction: Push/Pull Master Practice

This is the master practice that is imperative for successful completion. When you first start practicing you should do it at least 100 times and increase up to 200 times. Push and pull. When you push, feel your hands extended far away—very long—reaching into the sky. Touch the universe. Turn the visualization into the actualization.

1. Push: Extend your arms and hands to the front, palms vertical. Extend the arms from the scapulae. Expand: smiling, touching the universe—touching the force, touching the cosmic chi (fig. 5.39).

2. Pull: Draw the chi back to you from the universe. Moving the arms from the scapulae, draw the hands toward your body in a horizontal position, drawing the chi into the lower tan tien (fig. 5.40).

Fig. 5.39. Master practice: touch the universe.

Fig. 5.40. Drawing in universal chi—feel your tan tien and fill it with chi.

3. Push, very far away to the universe. Pull. Push: smile, relax, and let go, touching the sky, touching the universe (see fig. 5.41).

Fig. 5.41. Let go—push and touch the universe 6, 9, or 18 times.

Now, move your hands to the left and right directions. Pull the universal energy in. Push; touch the universe. Pull; think about your tan tien. Push—all the way—touching the universe.

1. Move your extended hands from the front horizon to the left and right sides and push to touch the universe (fig. 5.42).
2. Pull into the tan tien: Smile to your tan tien. Keep smiling to your tan tien (fig. 5.43).
3. Push to both sides. Expand all the way, smiling and touching the universe.
4. Push and Pull: Touching, reaching into the universe, drawing in the chi. Smile energy into you from both sides (see fig. 5.44). Do this 3 to 6 times.

Fig. 5.42. Touch the universe—left and right.

Fig. 5.43. Pull: just feel your tan tien.

Fig. 5.44. Draw the chi in from both sides.

1. Turn your palms up to the universe and fill the bones of your hands and arms with chi (fig. 5.45).
2. Scoop up the chi. Pour the chi over your crown, and touch your crown. Project the chi all the way down to the perineum and down through the earth to the universe below (fig. 5.46). Connecting your tan tien and the universe, always feel your tan tien, heart, and crown spiraling, and the universe around you spiraling.
3. Remember to use the mind. Extend it down to the earth and gather the energy. Again extend it up to the universe and gather more energy. Bring it back down to the mid-eyebrow and bring in more energy. Gather the energy and bring it to the tan tien (fig. 5.47).
4. Touch the navel and feel the chi start to spiral faster and faster in the lower tan tien. Keep moving the energy. When we move it to a certain level, it gets faster and faster (spiral speed). Feel the tan tien and the universe all spiraling at a fast speed (fig. 5.48).

Fig. 5.45. a. Raise your hands up to the universe. b. Feel that the hands are big and long and that the bones are hollow. Fill and pack the bones with chi.

Fig. 5.46. Scoop up the universal chi and pour it over the head.

The Cosmic Orbit Meditation

The Cosmic Orbit meditation enables us to connect with the beneficial chi of the universe and bring it into our bodies. It is based on awareness of three forces: the pull of the North Star, the tan tien spiral, and the pull of the core of the earth.

The rotation of the earth around itself at 1,000 miles per hour—caused by its core liquid and orbit around the sun at 67,000 miles per hour—creates the gravitational and the magnetic forces. This is the yin and yang polarity and the life force within our cells. These incredible speeds greatly influence the liquid in the body. The fact that we are 70 percent water keeps us connected to the forces all around us. This connection is strongest in the tan tien, which is linked to the core of the earth.

The North Star is another force that pulls us toward it. We now know that the North Star is actually 100,000 times bigger than our sun. Taoists regard the North Star as the northern gate to heaven. It is the one object in the sky that is easily recognized (see fig. 6.1).

Although the position of the North Star in the sky seems fixed, it does move, though very slowly. The earth's axis 5,000 years ago was aligned with Thuban. Now the earth is tilted toward the North Star and all the living things on the earth are influenced by it. Perhaps in another 2,000 years the direction of the tilt will change again (fig. 6.2).

Fig. 6.1. The North Star: the gateway to heaven

Fig. 6.2. The earth axis tilts toward the North Star.

We are aligned to the North Star (North Pole) and the Southern Cross (South Pole) (fig. 6.3).

The Big Dipper and the North Star appear near one another in the sky. Like the North Star, the Big Dipper has experienced movement over time, though surprisingly little (fig 6.4).

Fig. 6.3. North Star (North Pole) and the Southern Cross (South Pole)

Fig. 6.4. Big Dipper movement

The space between each star in the Big Dipper is actually very far and no one knows why the stars stay together as a group (see fig. 6.5).

The North Star is a major source of violet light, which is the divine or soul energy. The Big Dipper is a major source of red and infrared light. In addition, Taoists believe that the cup of the Big Dipper gathers all the violet light from the universe.

- Violet light is the color of the higher self, or higher soul.
- Violet light has all the properties of all of the other colors. It has a rapid regenerating effect on damaged organs and nerves.

Fig. 6.5. Space between each star in the Big Dipper

- Luminous violet light has a unique vibration and can be programmed. It develops the crown center, spiritual core center, and is good for psychological ailments.

In the Cosmic Orbit meditation, we draw the violet light in and feel the pull of the North Star, making us lighter (fig. 6.6).

Fig. 6.6. Feeling the luminous violet light and the pull of the North Star

Fig. 6.7. The synergy of the three forces

The Cosmic Orbit meditation allows us to benefit from the synergy of all three forces (fig. 6.7).

Preparatory Practices for the cosmic orbit Meditation

Let's start to put the preparatory practices together. As you progress, you can be creative with how you prepare. With continued practice, the preparation takes less and less time. Remember, these are just guidelines, you must make the practices and meditations work for you.

Step 1. Warming the Stove/Bellows Breathing (see chapter 3)

1. Focus the attention in the area between the navel, the Door of Life, and the sexual center to “warm the stove.”
2. Do the Bellows Breathing 36 times.
3. Rest and feel the warmth grow in the abdominal area.

Step 2. Laughing Chi Kung (see chapter 3)

1. Do Boisterous Laughing out loud for 5 minutes. Spiral the chi in the lower abdomen. Feel the warm chi build up and start to rise up to the crown and open the nostrils. Take some deep breaths.
2. Do Giggling (not loud) for 3 to 5 minutes. Rest and spiral, allowing the chi to flow up to the crown.
3. Do Silent Giggling and feel the vibration inside for 3 to 5 minutes and rest. Let the energy flow up to the crown.

Step 3. Three Minds into One Mind (see chapter 4)

1. Let the energy flow down to the mid-eyebrow and breathe this energy into the center of the brain. Do the breathing 9 to 36 times.
2. Breathe the good feeling into the mid-eyebrow and down to the heart. Hold it in the heart for a moment, allowing it to radiate through the body. Keep on breathing 9 to 36 times.
3. Breathe the good feeling through the mid-eyebrow, down to the heart, and exhale down to the lower tan tien. Hold the chi there, feel centered and balanced. Do this breathing 9 to 36 times. Feel all three minds (upper mind, heart mind, and the lower abdominal mind) merge in the lower mind. Feel calm and relaxed.

Step 4. The Cosmic Inner Smile (see chapter 5)

1. Sit on the edge of the chair and rock from the sacrum up through the lumbar spine, then up to the neck. Rest and smile to the spine. Feel the spine warm and open.

2. Smile to the heart and feel joy, happiness, and love. Let this good feeling flow down to the spleen, stomach, and the pancreas. Breathe the yellow light of openness and fairness into the spleen, stomach, and the pancreas. Repeat 3 to 6 breaths.
3. Breathe the good feeling into the heart with the red or violet light and let it radiate down to the lungs. Breathe the white light of courage and righteousness into the lungs. Repeat 3 to 6 times.
4. Breathe the good feeling into the heart with red or violet light, and let it radiate down to the kidneys. Breathe the blue light of gentleness and calmness into the kidneys. Repeat 3 to 6 times.
5. Breathe into the heart the good feeling with red or violet light and let it radiate down to the sexual organs. Repeat 3 to 6 times.
6. Breathe the good feeling into the heart with red or violet light and let it radiate down to the liver. Breathe the green light of kindness and generosity into the liver. Repeat 3 to 6 times.
7. Feel all the organs surrounded by light.
8. Move your tongue around to activate the saliva, and swallow down to the stomach and down to the small and large intestine. Keep on smiling down and follow the warm feeling of the saliva.

✪ Step 5. Activate the Six Directions and the Three Fires (see chapter 5)

Stand up away from the chair, and do the Opening of the Six Directions and Three Fires. Make sure that you remember “consciousness in and awareness out” throughout the practice, as you spiral the three tan tiens and connect to the universe spiraling in all six directions.

Now you are ready to do the Cosmic Orbit meditation.

THE COSMIC ORBIT

The Cosmic Orbit meditation is based upon the Microcosmic Orbit meditation. The Microcosmic Orbit awakens, circulates, and directs chi up through the Governing Channel—which ascends from the base of the spine up to the head—and down through the Functional Channel or Conception Vessel, which runs from the tip of the tongue down the middle of the torso to the perineum.

Dedicated practice of this ancient esoteric method eliminates stress and nervous tension, energizes the internal organs, restores health to damaged tissue, and builds a strong sense of personal well-being.

The Microcosmic Orbit Meditation

The Microcosmic Orbit is the foundation of Cosmic Healing Chi Kung practice. Each new practice is dependent upon the high quality of your meditations and your ability to perfect the Microcosmic Orbit. In order to master Cosmic Chi Kung, you must practice meditation daily. The Microcosmic Orbit meditation strengthens the original chi and teaches you the basics of circulating chi. It allows the palms, the soles of the feet, the mid-eyebrow, and the crown to open. These specific locations are the major points where energy can be absorbed, condensed, and transformed into fresh new life force.

The following steps are a summary.

1. Be aware of the crown and the North Star; feel the crown and heart being pulled toward the North Star.
2. Be aware of the soles of the feet and the bones growing down into the ground; feel the soles of the feet breathing. The chi from the earth and galaxy below enters into the soles at the Bubbling Springs points and travels up into your bones.
3. Be aware of the spiral of the earth as it rotates and orbits around the sun, which affects every cell in the body; feel this spiral inside you.
4. Focus on the lower tan tien (the area where the original chi is stored, between the navel, kidneys, and sexual organs). Feel the pulsing in this area, observe whether it feels tense or relaxed, cool or warm, expansive or contracting. Notice any sensations of chi: tingling, heat, expansiveness, pulsing, or electric or magnetic sensations. Allow these to grow and expand. Then let this energy flow out to the navel center.
5. Use your intention (mind-eye-heart power) to spiral in the navel point, guiding and moving the chi. Let the energy flow down to the sexual center (Ovary Palace or Sperm Palace).
6. Move the energy from the sexual center to the perineum and down to the soles of the feet.
7. Draw the energy up from the soles to the perineum and to the sacrum.

8. Draw the energy up from the sacrum to the Door of Life (the point in the spine opposite the navel).
9. Draw the energy up to the mid-spine point (the T11 vertebra).
10. Draw the energy up to the base of the skull (Jade Pillow).
11. Draw the energy up to the crown.
12. Move the energy down from the crown to the mid-eyebrow.
13. Touch the tip of your tongue to your upper palate, press and release a few times, then lightly touch the palate, sensing the electric or tingling feeling in the tip of the tongue. Move the energy down from the mid-eyebrow to where the tip of your tongue and palate meet.
14. Move the energy down from the palate through your tongue to the throat center.
15. Move the energy down from the throat to the heart center.
16. Bring the energy down from the heart to the solar plexus and feel a small sun shining out.
17. Bring the energy back down to the navel.
18. Continue to circulate your energy through this entire sequence of points, at least nine times. Once the pathways are open, you can let your energy flow continuously like a river of energy without needing to stop at each point.
19. Conclude when you wish by collecting energy at the navel.

Men: Cover your navel with both palms, left hand over right. Collect and mentally spiral the energy outward from the navel 36 times clockwise, and then inward 24 times counterclockwise.

Women: Cover your navel with both palms, right hand over left. Collect and mentally spiral the energy outward from the navel 36 times counterclockwise, and then inward 24 times clockwise. For further details of this practice see my book Healing Light of the Tao (Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 2008).

The Cosmic Orbit Meditation

Connect with the North Star to Receive the Violet Light

1. Begin by raising the hands to the universe; feel that the hands are big and long and that the bones are hollow. Fill and pack the bones with chi (fig.

2. Be aware of the North Star and Big Dipper (fig. 6.9).
3. Let the North Star and Big Dipper descend down to your hands Use the left hand to hold the handle of the Big Dipper and pour the violet light from the universe down to your crown, then let it flow through the whole body (fig. 6.10).

Fig. 6.8. Raise your hands up to the universe.

Fig. 6.9. Connect with the universal violet light from the North Star and Big Dipper.

Fig. 6.10. Pour the violet light down and through your body.

4. Guide this healing light down into your skull, deep into your brain, cervical vertebrae, sternum, thoracic vertebrae, lumbar vertebrae, and down through your legs. Feel it penetrating and enlivening your bones, deep into the bone marrow: washing, cleansing, energizing (fig. 6.11).

Fig. 6.11. Let your whole body feel clean and radiant, shining with the healing light.

5. Feel this "liquid-like" chi spill all the way down to your feet. Feel it connecting with the earth through the soles of your feet; be aware of the Bubbling Springs in the feet (the K1 point of the Kidney meridian) breathing and pulsating.

Open the Back-Crown Point

1. Touch the back-crown point. Pour the chi all over your crown.
2. Think of your soles so that you feel as if there is a waterfall of chi flowing from your crown all the way down to your soles.

3. Feel your fingers grow long and the chi penetrate down through your spine to the coccyx. Leave the fingers touching the back of the crown, to maintain the energetic connection with the coccyx (fig. 6.12).
4. Be aware of the tan tien and spiral it like universal energy in motion. Feel the heart center spiraling and the crown spiraling. Be aware of the universe spiraling above, below, front, back, left, and right, charging the three tan tiens (fig. 6.13).
5. Let all of the sick energy and the negative forces leave the body and go down into the ground for Mother Earth to recycle. Extend the chi from above all the way down through the earth and the universe below.

Fig. 6.12. Feel your fingers growing long, all the way down to the coccyx.

Fig. 6.13. Feel the universe spiraling and charging the three tan tiens.

Open the Mid-Crown Point

1. Move to the mid-crown point. Touch the point and project your fingers deep through the middle of your body down to the perineum.
2. Focus on the perineum. Feel the chi from the universe flow right to your perineum.
3. Look for one dot of light. Look into the darkness, the immense, vast darkness. This is the primordial force.
4. Be aware of the tan tien and spiral it like the galaxy. Feel the heart center spiraling and the crown spiraling. Be aware of the universe spiraling above, below, front, back, left, and right.
5. Let all of the sick energy and the negative forces go out of the body and down into the ground for Mother Earth to recycle. Extend the chi from above all the way down through the earth to the universe below (fig. 6.14).

Fig. 6.14. Open the mid-crown point and extend the chi from above to the earth and universe below.

Open the Other Head Points

1. Scoop the energy and then come down and touch the mid-eyebrow, focusing on the base of the skull; feel the fingers penetrate straight through to the base of the skull (fig. 6.15).

Fig. 6.15. Mid-eyebrow point

2. Be aware of the tan tien and the universe spiraling. With the spiraling, the chi will become hot in the fingers. It will expand and penetrate out through the back of the head all the way to the universe behind (fig. 6.16).

Fig. 6.16. As the tan tien and universe spiral, the chi penetrates out through the back of the head.

3. Move the fingers down to touch the upper lips. Feel the chi charge the upper palate (fig. 6.17).

Fig. 6.17. Feel the chi charge the upper palate.

4. Come down to the middle of the upper lip. This point revives consciousness. Feel the universe and galaxies spiral and charge the palate. The circuits are flowing down through the tongue and to the throat (fig. 6.18).

Fig. 6.18. Feel the universe and galaxies spiral and charge the palate.

5. Picture your fingers like laser beams of chi. Feel your tan tien and the universe spiral and charge your fingers.

6. Move your fingers out from the mid-eyebrow around the side of the head to the top of the ears. Touch the left and right ear and feel the fingers grow very long.

7. Your fingers are like lasers, cutting open your skull right in the middle around to the top of the ear. Make a cross into the brain and open the upper tan tien and the back of the head and the third eye. This opens the whole brain. Chi will go right into it (fig. 6.19).

8. Leave your fingers there. Spiral your lower tan tien and the universe. Concentrate on your lower tan tien spiraling your heart and crown; chi penetrates into your brain. The universe is also spiraling in all directions: above, below, in front, behind, left, and right. Gather the chi in your lower tan tien. It is a big empty space: you can put so much chi inside there!

Fig. 6.19. Opening the Jade Pillow

9. Move your hands all the way to the back, cutting to the back of the skull. Touch, and feel the upper tan tien open (fig. 6.20).

Fig. 6.20. Touch the back of your skull and feel the upper tan tien open.

10. Touch the base of your skull. Focus on the mid-eyebrow. Feel the chi flow like a laser beam from back to front and out to the universe in front (see fig. 6.21).

Fig. 6.21. Feel the chi flow like a laser beam from the back out to the universe in front.

11. Complete the opening process by moving the hands back around to the mid-eyebrow, cutting as you go.

12. Touch the upper lips and feel the connection with the tongue and the front palate (fig. 6.22). When you are aware of the universe spiraling, you are charging energy into yourself.

13. Move down to the throat center and touch and focus on the C7 point on the back of the neck (fig. 6.23). Focusing on the back of the neck and the throat center will activate the thyroid and parathyroid and thymus glands.

Fig. 6.22. Charging the upper lips, tongue, and front palate with energy

Fig. 6.23. Move the fingers down to the throat center and feel them penetrate through C7 and to the universe behind.

Recharging Energy While Doing the Cosmic Orbit

Any time you want to recharge the energy (when you feel the hands getting low in energy and to help you open the body), reach into the universe and bring down the energy. Whenever you are scooping up the universal chi, your hands and legs will feel very warm. With your consciousness turned in and your awareness out, you are recharging your energy from the constant love and orgasmic energy all around you—the creative energy of the universe.

The inner alchemy of sexual energy takes place in the three tan tiens where yin and yang energy are merged together. In the Taoist formulas the Phoenix and Dragon symbolize the female and male. In the three tan tiens you can constantly feel male and female, Phoenix and Dragon, uniting to become one energy. This primordial love and orgasmic energy within is the most important energy that you need every day. If you want more energy, just become aware of six directions of the universe: below, above, left, right, front, and back. Everything is spiraling and moving around you. When you are aware of the universe spiraling, you are charging energy into yourself.

1. Feel that your bones and your arms and legs are hollow. Fill and compact them with chi (see fig. 6.24).
2. Scoop the universal chi and pour it down over your crown and all the way down, down, down to the middle tan tien.
3. Feel the Dragon and the Phoenix making love in the heart center. Feel the yin and yang, male and female, Dragon and Phoenix reunite, make love, spiral into one love and orgasmic force in the heart center, lower tan tien, and the crown, and spread out to all the cells in the body (see fig. 6.25).

Fig. 6.24. Recharge your energy from the universe.

Fig. 6.25. Feel the universal love and orgasmic energy spread throughout the body.

Opening the Middle Tan Tien and Heart Point

1. Recharge from the universe; pour chi over the crown down through the body and lower your hands down to the heart center. Touch with the fingertips (fig. 6.26).
2. With your hands at your heart center at the mid-sternum, imagine the fingers long; reach through and focus on the point opposite the heart, T5/T6 on the spine. Chi and golden light will penetrate into your thymus gland. Feel the chi penetrate through your heart all the way through T5/T6 to the galaxy behind (fig. 6.27).

3. In the middle tan tien and the universe also feel your fingers penetrate into the bones and bone marrow and spread out into your rib cage.
4. Move to the left and right, opening the heart center (like opening a book), which also activates the thymus gland and all of the lymphatic system, the immune system, the T-cells, B-cells, and the killer cells. Opening the heart center will immensely help the immune system (fig. 6.28).

Fig. 6.26. Pour chi over the crown down through the body and lower your hands to the heart center.

Fig. 6.27. Opening the heart point: touch the heart and focus on the back of the heart. Feel the energy go all the way through to connect with the galaxy.

Fig. 6.28. The heart center is also connected to the thymus gland, which is the most important organ in the immune system.

5. To open the left and right sides of the heart, move your hands around under your armpits, extending the chi like laser beams cutting open the middle tan tien. Pause under the armpits as you send the chi into the center (fig. 6.29).

Fig. 6.29. Opening the left and right sides of the heart

6. Be aware of the tan tien and the universe spiraling. With the spiraling, the chi will become hot in the fingers. It will expand and penetrate out through the back of the head all the way to the universe behind (fig. 6.30).

Fig. 6.30. Sending heart chi out to the universe

7. Continue to move your hands around to your back at T5/T6; touch, and send the chi from back to front (fig. 6.31). Let the beam of chi penetrate out through the heart center to the universe in front of you.

8. Then move the hands back to the front, cutting as you go.

Fig. 6.31. Open the back, touch the back at T5/T6 and feel the energy come to the front.

Opening the Solar Plexus Point

1. Move down now to the solar plexus, found between the sternum and navel (see fig. 6.32). Touch the solar plexus on the point opposite T11 and focus on T11 on the spine. Feel your fingers penetrate all the way through.

   Think that a sun is shining in your solar plexus and radiating light throughout the whole body. Just keep on holding and feel the sun in the body. The more you can feel and see the sun shining in the body, the more you can clear the sickness from the body. Sickness doesn’t like light and warmth; it likes darkness, wetness, and dampness.

2. Feel your chi fingers penetrate into the bone and bone marrow and spread out into your rib cage (see fig. 6.33).

Fig. 6.32. Touch the solar plexus on the point opposite T11.

Fig. 6.33. Feel your chi fingers penetrate into the bone and bone marrow.

Opening the Navel Point

1. Raise your hands and charge with the chi in the universe. Feel your hands to be very big, very long. The bones are hollow and compacted with compressed universal chi.
2. Scoop the chi from above and guide it down. Pour all the way down, down, down, down to the navel.
3. Touch the navel, and focus on the Door of Life (Ming Men) opposite, on the spine between L3 and L4. Touch and feel the chi penetrate to the Door of Life. Feel the chi penetrate through to the back and out to the universe behind (fig. 6.34).

4. Feel as if there is a laser beam cutting open the left and right sides (fig. 6.35). Begin at the navel and slowly circle all the way back to the Door of Life; all the while the energy is cutting like a laser and opening this area.
5. Open the lower tan tien the same way as the upper and middle tan tiens. Feel your tan tien and universe spiraling—charge more chi into your hands, and let them be like lasers cutting open your lower tan tien.

Fig. 6.34. Tan tien and universe spiraling

Fig. 6.35. Opening the lower tan tien

6. Cut around to the sides; pause. The fingers of the left and right hand are very long, extended energetically inside. Cut and feel the energy penetrate into the center.

7. Wherever you touch, focus on the opposite point and feel the energy flow (see fig. 6.36).

8. Continue cutting to the Door of Life. As you touch the Door of Life, you will feel the energy go right through to the navel and into the universe (fig. 6.37).

Fig. 6.36. Tan tien and universe feel more chi.

Fig. 6.37. Touch and send the chi from the Door of Life back to the navel and out to the universe in front.

Opening the Sexual Palace

Finally, move the hands back to the navel and go down to the pubic bone and focus on the back. Penetrate right through the sexual organs (ovaries/prostate and bladder area).

1. Move the hands back to the navel, extending the fingers and “cutting” the tan tien open as you go. Touch the navel; tan tien and the universe are spiraling. Feel more chi, and feel the tan tien open (fig. 6.38).
2. Touch the sexual center and let the chi penetrate through to the sacrum (fig. 6.39).
3. Touch the sacrum and let the chi penetrate through to the sexual center.

Fig. 6.38. Opening the tan tien at the navel

Fig. 6.39. Chi penetrates from the sexual center through to the sacrum.

Opening the Bones and Sacrum

When we are young, our bones produce many blood cells. The older we get, the more hollow the bones become and they slowly diminish their production of blood cells. We lose a very big factory. In the Taoist practice we work to revive this factory. Smile to your bones; feel chi going into the bones and activating the bone marrow. When you have nothing to do, just touch your bones and smile and feel funny, happy, laughing bones.

The sacrum bone controls all the bones and bone marrow production. Sometimes when I need to enhance my immune system I touch my sacrum and the sternum. Both of these bones are very important and help to activate the immune system and increase the white and red blood cells.

1. Begin by touching the hipbones and laugh inside the bones (fig. 6.40). Laugh inwardly and feel the laughing vibration in the bones. Feel your fingers are very long and penetrating right into your bones and bone marrow.

Fig. 6.40. Touch both sides of the hipbones. Feel your fingers penetrate into your bones.

2. Touch the femur bones; feel the tan tiens and universe spiral (fig. 6.41). Charge the fingers. Feel the funny, happy, laughing vibration inside the bones and in the bone marrow.

3. Touch the sternum and laugh internally, sending the vibration into the bones: funny, happy, laughing bones. The marrow and thymus will activate—this is very important. Taoists describe the inner laughing as the sensation of hitting a drum and feeling the inner vibration—BOOMMMM! This is the echo of the energy vibrating in the bones.

Fig. 6.41. Touch the femur bones; feel the tan tiens and the universe spiral.

4. Now slowly lower the chi down through the bones to the earth. Move the hands down the legs as you bend down (fig. 6.42).

5. Lower yourself all the way down to the ground and sit on your feet. Feel the entire body sink down into the ground and gather the earth energy. Move the chi with your hands down to your toes, down through the earth and to the universe below (fig. 6.43).

Fig. 6.42. Lower the chi down through the bones to the earth.

Fig. 6.43. Squat down and move the chi with your hands down through the earth to the universe below.

6. Touch your heels and feel the energy go up into the heel. Raise your sacrum up (straighten your legs) while keeping your hands at your toes (fig. 6.44). Feel the whole area open, smile to the tan tien, and wiggle the tailbone side to side. This will open a lot of energy in this area.

7. Squat down again. Send the chi down to the earth and the galaxy below (fig. 6.45).

8. Touch your heels and feel your bones as you slowly begin to rise up (fig. 6.46).

Fig. 6.44. Raise your sacrum up, keeping your hands at the toes. Smile to your tan tien.

Fig. 6.45. Send chi down to the earth and the galaxy below.

Fig. 6.46. Touch your heels and feel your bones as you begin to rise up.

9. Raise your sacrum up again, maintaining hand contact with your feet. Fill your bones with chi as you guide it up with your hands (fig. 6.47). Smile to your tan tien.

10. For the third time, lower down. Open your palms, gathering the chi from the earth below. Gather and scoop up the chi.

11. Now reverse. When you touch your coccyx, think about the ground. The energy will go into the bone and spinal cord and reach up to the crown (fig. 6.48).

Fig. 6.47. Fill the bones with chi as you move your hands up.

Fig. 6.48. Feel your bones, and fill them with chi all the way up to your coccyx. Touch your coccyx; feel the tan tiens and the universe spiraling.

Opening the Governing Channel

1. Touch the sacrum and picture the sacrum growing. Make it bigger and bigger, extending it down to the universe (fig. 6.49).
2. Feel the eight holes of the sacrum breathing. The sacrum breathes the energy up into the spine (fig. 6.50).
3. Feel the sacrum big and breathing. As always, when you need energy, become aware of the universe and the tan tien (fig. 6.51). Feel the chi rise up through the spine and spread out to the glands and organs and fill them with chi.
4. Now bring your hands up to the Door of Life (Ming Men) and send energy through to the navel (fig. 6.52).
5. Connect with the energy of the tan tien and the universe (fig. 6.53).

Fig. 6.49. Touch your sacrum.

Fig. 6.52. Send energy from the Door of Life through to the navel.

Fig. 6.53. Connect to the tan tien and the universe.

6. Move up to C7, opposite the throat center; feel the fingers penetrate through to the throat center (fig. 6.54).
7. Fingers continue to touch the C7 point; feel the three tan tiens and the universe spiraling (fig. 6.55).
8. Move up to the base of the skull (Jade Pillow), which is opposite the mid-eyebrow.

Fig. 6.54. Touch C7; feel the fingers penetrate through to the throat.

Fig. 6.55. Feel the three tan tiens and the universe spiraling.

9. Finally, go up to the crown. Feel the energy penetrate from the crown all the way down to the perineum. This can take a while. All you have to do is think that your fingers are long. It's simple. You practice it, you have it! It's your aura that is extending and penetrating deep within your body all the way to the middle of the perineum (fig. 6.56).

10. Gather the energy and bring it back down to the tan tien. Just use the mind. Extend it down to the earth and gather the energy. Go back up and extend up and gather more energy from the universe. Come back down to the mid-eyebrow and bring more energy into the mid-eyebrow (fig. 6.57).

Fig. 6.56. Move the fingers to touch the crown and feel them penetrate through the body down to the perineum.

Fig. 6.57. Gather the energy.

11. Keep on moving the energy through the orbit. Touch the navel and feel the chi sink down to the lower tan tien and start to spiral, faster and faster (see 6.58).

12. In the beginning, when you move the energy slowly through the orbit, you will become aware of the spinal cord and all of the nervous system connected to the internal organs (fig. 6.59).

Fig. 6.58. Feel the chi sink down to the lower tan tien and start to spiral.

Fig. 6.59. Become aware of the spinal cord and all of the nervous system connected to the internal organs.

13. Feel the tan tien and the universe spiral faster and faster (fig. 6.60). The spiraling is at a rate of 30,000–60,000 miles per hour. When you move so fast, you become very still, just as the earth is spiraling and spinning so fast, yet it feels still.

Fig. 6.60. Feel the tan tien and the universe all spiraling at a fast speed.

14. Sit down and start to move the energy through the orbit at a very fast speed, from 1,000 rotations per minute to 10,000 per minute, and up to 30,000 per minute (fig. 6.61).

Fig. 6.61. Sit down and start to move the energy through the orbit very fast.

When you open the orbit and the energy starts to move through it, the body will be penetrated by more and more energy. That will make the body less dense. When the body is too dense, chi and light cannot go through it. That's when sickness can start to get into the body. Doing this meditation you will get a lot of energy right through the body (fig. 6.62).

Fig. 6.62. Open the Cosmic Orbit and your body becomes less dense.

Freedom, Harmony, and Balance in the Tao

FREEDOM IS THE GOAL OF THE TAO

The teachings of the Tao help us to attain inner freedom and mental resiliency. No one outside ourselves can rule us inwardly and control our spirit and mind if we do not allow it. When we know this, we become free.

Certain religious systems try to rule over us inwardly, attempting to control our soul. Understanding spiritual, emotional, and physical independence gives inner freedom and the ability to choose how to direct our own energy.

Freedom is Achieved through Internal Harmony

Freedom is achieved through internal harmony and balance, which create durable virtuous energy. Virtue is power. If we are filled with love and kindness, people will respect us. If we have internal harmony and balance we have internal power. People will want to listen to us just because they are drawn to us. When we have inner motivation, we have power. But if we lose motivation, our power will be gone as well.

Balance is very important in the Tao. Harmony is a force, one that is not directly produced by external competitions. Harmony comes from clarity and spiritual achievement. Harmony is generated from the spiritual growth that comes from understanding and balancing our own energy within (fig. 7.1).

Harmony is at the core of the universe (fig. 7.2). It is the key element of life for each individual, society, and humankind.

Fig. 7.1. Internal harmony comes from understanding and balancing our energy within.

Fig. 7.2. Harmony is at the core of the universe.

Harmony in nature is the most nutritious and supportive condition for human life (fig. 7.3). Those who are in harmony with themselves will not disturb the harmony existing in nature.

However, when people are not in harmony, they will destroy the harmony in nature as well. If you do not find internal harmony, you not only make trouble for yourself, but anything you create could harm other people (fig. 7.4).

The people who seek power and increase it for their own benefit take advantage of others by violence or force. Life itself is a set of conflicts. To diminish conflicts, there is a middle point that can be acceptable to both sides. This is called harmony. Harmony is supportive and helpful.

Fig. 7.3. Harmony in nature nourishes our internal harmony.

Fig. 7.4. Internal disharmony disrupts our environment.

A Win-Win Attitude

An important practice to achieve freedom, harmony, and balance is to work toward win-win situations. In that case there is a balance in yin and yang. Both parties gain (yang) and most likely both parties give in a little (yin). They balance each other. In win-win situations both parties are happy. If one is the winner and the other the loser, the winner is happy, the loser unhappy. That does not create freedom.

Throughout the whole cosmos, yin pushes yang and yang pushes yin; no one loses and no one wins. This will continue for a billion years (fig. 7.5). We can practice the win-win attitude every day of our lives.

Fig. 7.5. Yin and yang

ACHIEVING INNER HARMONY

Internal harmony is based on understanding the nature of things as they are and not always as we would like them to be. As a Taoist master put it: “If you want to know the truth, forget about right and wrong, for the conflict between right and wrong is the sickness of the human mind.”

Harmony also comes from understanding yourself, your own mind, body, and energy. In other words, find your center in your lower tan tien and the answer will come (fig. 7.6). Do not rely too heavily on the intellectual mind, which always tries to see things as right and wrong.

We can progress toward harmony within ourselves by understanding our own energy pattern and how to move it. We are aided in that by practices such as the Cosmic Inner Smile, Cosmic Healing Sounds, and Cosmic Orbit meditation (fig. 7.7).

Fig. 7.6. Harmony is based on our internal understanding.

Fig. 7.7. Universal Tao practices help us to achieve inner harmony.

Tao Teachings Guide Us to Harmony

He who practices the Tao does less and less every day until he reaches the point where he does nothing. He does nothing, yet there is nothing that is not done!

CHUANG TZU

- One who knows when he has enough is rich.
- Only one who empties himself finds fulfillment and completion.
- What you desire and what you fear are within yourself.

Achieving Harmony between Yin and Yang in Relationships

A relationship is just like the Tai Chi diagram, which has two equal sides. Each takes the specific expression of yin or yang according to its nature. Similarly, in a relationship, when the energies are in balance with each other, a positive condition will result (fig. 7.8).

Fig. 7.8. Balance is the key to a harmonious relationship.

In a relationship between a woman and a man, to achieve balance, the woman needs to exercise her creative energy and the man needs to have receptive energy (fig. 7.9).

Fig. 7.9. Yin within yang and yang within yin

When there is imbalance in the amount of either yin or yang, usually a negative condition will result (fig. 7.10).

Fig. 7.10. Imbalance creates disharmony and discomfort.

Harmony in relationships or in groups involves creating a healthy point of energy linkage. When the point of linkage is healthy and helpful, it brings balance and harmony. Then the two different forces do not fight against each other; being interdependent, they can work together for mutual help (fig. 7.11).

Fig. 7.11. Balance of healthy energy creates a nurturing linkage in human relationships.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH ON UNIVERSAL TAO PRACTICES

Dr. Rhonda Jessum, Ph.D., conducted a study at the Institute for Applied Biocybernetics Feedback, in Vienna, Austria, on October 25, 1996 (fig. 7.12).

Fig. 7.12. Mr. Gerhard Eggetsberger, Director of the Institute for Applied Biocybernetics Feedback, Vienna, Austria

Her study focused on how Universal Tao practices impact the brain's abilities. She presented the findings of her study—"EEG, Meditation, and the Healing Tao, A Case Study of Master Mantak Chia"—in May 1997 (fig. 7.13).

Fig. 7.13. Dr. Rhonda Jessum, Ph.D., presenting her findings.

Brain Waves

This study was based on the measurement of brain waves, which occur in three frequencies: beta (15–18 Hertz), alpha (8–10 Hertz), and theta (4–7 Hertz).

Beta Waves (15–18 Hertz)

Beta waves are the highest activity level of frequency. They are associated with external, narrow, focused attention, positive and uplifting emotions, and increased physical arousal (fig. 7.14). If we sustain beta brain waves too often and for too long, our stress and high blood pressure will increase.

Fig. 7.14. Beta state (15–18 hertz)

Alpha Waves (8–10 Hertz)

Alpha waves are present in the meditative higher consciousness state of mind. They are associated with meditative states in general and the experience of deep calmness and surrender. Alpha waves are also present when a person is absorbed in imagery, watching TV or a happy comedy, at home relaxing or drinking beer (fig. 7.15).

Fig. 7.15. Alpha state (8–10 hertz)

Theta Waves (4–7 Hertz)

Theta waves occur during a trance-like state, which is related to the state of shaman journeying. This is the state we experience just before falling asleep or waking up (fig. 7.16).

Fig. 7.16. Theta state (4–7 hertz)

The Study Focused on Four Universal Tao Practices

The study measured brain-wave frequencies during four practices: the Cosmic Inner Smile, the Six Healing Sounds, the Microcosmic Orbit, and the Orgasmic Upward Draw (figs. 7.17, 7.18, 7.19, 7.20).

Fig. 7.17. The Cosmic Inner Smile

Fig. 7.18. The Six Healing Sounds

Fig. 7.19. The Microcosmic Orbit

Fig. 7.20. The Orgasmic Upward Draw

The study measured ultraslow brain potentials as I, Master Chia, meditated (fig. 7.21).

Fig. 7.21. Measurement of ultraslow brain potentials

Cosmic Inner Smile Results

The first test was conducted while I was practicing the Cosmic Inner Smile. I smiled down to my abdomen and warmed it up, smiled to my heart and felt love. My energy levels increased, my heartbeat remained calm, my body relaxed, energy charged up to my brain (fig. 7.22).

Fig. 7.22. First test: Cosmic Inner Smile

The measurements of my brain waves during the meditation showed that a high level of alpha waves were present (fig. 7.23).

Fig. 7.23. High level of alpha waves present during the Cosmic Inner Smile meditation

Microcosmic Orbit Results

Through this testing, we found out that when we do the Microcosmic Orbit our body goes through many different kinds of brain waves (fig. 7.24).

Fig. 7.24. Movement of the Microcosmic Orbit

When I lowered my mind down to the lower tan tien there were a lot of theta waves. When I started to move the energy, there were a lot of alpha and beta waves. Moving back down to the tan tien, I got a lot of theta again. The alpha, beta, and theta waves were continuously cycling in this manner (fig. 7.25).

The test shows that when I lower down my mind and feel my navel warm, my mind very quickly calms down, indicated by a lot of theta waves. As long as I keep on holding my attention on my tan tien a lot of theta happens. However, the machine only measures the waves of the brain, not the tan tien waves. During the Microcosmic Orbit my brain produced alpha and beta as well as theta waves, creating a healing energy. The results of the study support our experience that this practice—which teaches us to use the lower brain and rest the upper brain—helps to conserve our energy. This helps us to be strong and healthy, to live longer and be happier.

Fig. 7.25. Altering dominance of alpha and theta waves during the Microcosmic Orbit meditation

Summary of the Research

The study also showed that different brain waves are associated with different meditations. The practice of a number of Universal Tao meditations increases the brain's ability to do many more functions and move flexibly between the states of consciousness. For example, in the Orgasmic Upper Draw, we are in high arousal while maintaining a deep state of consciousness, which activates the brain. When we feel arousal inside and move the orgasm into the body we feel a very high and deep state of consciousness.

During each practice I always kept awareness in my tan tien and spiral. The brain was not working; it was resting while I used the lower brain. So, in the graph showing the summary of the research, a lot of theta waves appear, as well as alpha and beta (fig. 7.26).

To see the comparison of all the practices tested in Vienna, look at the graph (fig. 7.27). The left and right brain became increasingly synchronized as I progressed from the Inner Smile to the Six Healing Sounds and up to the Microcosmic Orbit. Finally, as I did the Orgasmic Upper Draw, the left and right brain started to synchronize on all levels.

Living Light Kirlian Technology

In addition to the testing done on me, two students were photographed using Kirlian living light technology before and after they performed the Inner Smile practice. These photographs demonstrate the synchronizing of the left and right brains and the enhancement of energy through the whole body (fig. 7.28).

The Universal Tao System and Training Center

THE UNIVERSAL TAO SYSTEM

The ultimate goal of Taoist practice is to transcend physical boundaries through the development of the soul and the spirit within the human. That is also the guiding principle behind the Universal Tao, a practical system of self-development that enables individuals to complete the harmonious evolution of their physical, mental, and spiritual bodies. Through a series of ancient Chinese meditative and internal energy exercises, the practitioner learns to increase physical energy, release tension, improve health, practice self-defense, and gain the ability to heal him-or herself and others. In the process of creating a solid foundation of health and well-being in the physical body, the practitioner also creates the basis for developing his or her spiritual potential by learning to tap into the natural energies of the sun, moon, earth, stars, and other environmental forces.

The Universal Tao practices are derived from ancient techniques rooted in the processes of nature. They have been gathered and integrated into a coherent, accessible system for well-being that works directly with the life force, or chi, that flows through the meridian system of the body.

Master Chia has spent years developing and perfecting techniques for teaching these traditional practices to students around the world through ongoing classes, workshops, private instruction, and healing sessions, as well as books and video and audio products. Further information can be obtained at www.universaltao.com.

THE UNIVERSAL TAO TRAINING CENTER

The Tao Garden Resort and Training Center in northern Thailand is the home of Master Chia and serves as the worldwide headquarters for Universal Tao activities. This integrated wellness, holistic health, and training center is situated on eighty acres surrounded by the beautiful Himalayan foothills near the historic walled city of Chiang Mai. The serene setting includes flower and herb gardens ideal for meditation, open-air pavilions for practicing Chi Kung, and a health and fitness spa.

The center offers classes year round, as well as summer and winter retreats. It can accommodate two hundred students, and group leasing can be arranged. For information worldwide on courses, books, products, and other resources, see below.

About the Author

Mantak Chia has been studying the Taoist approach to life since childhood. His mastery of this ancient knowledge, enhanced by his study of other disciplines, has resulted in the development of the Universal Tao System, which is now being taught throughout the world.

Mantak Chia was born in Thailand to Chinese parents in 1944. When he was six years old, he learned from Buddhist monks how to sit and “still the mind.” While in grammar school he learned traditional Thai boxing, and soon went on to acquire considerable skill in Aikido, Yoga, and Tai Chi. His studies of the Taoist way of life began in earnest when he was a student in Hong Kong, ultimately leading to his mastery of a wide variety of esoteric disciplines, with the guidance of several masters, including Master I Yun, Master Meugi, Master Cheng Yao Lun, and Master Pan Yu. To better understand the mechanisms behind healing energy, he also studied Western anatomy and medical sciences.

Master Chia has taught his system of healing and energizing practices to tens of thousands of students and trained more than two thousand instructors and practitioners throughout the world. He has established centers for Taoist study and training in many countries around the globe. In June of 1990, he was honored by the International Congress of Chinese Medicine and Qi Gong (Chi Kung), which named him the Qi Gong Master of the Year.

About the Authors

Mantak Chia

Master Mantak Chia

Master Mantak Chia is the creator of the Universal Tao System and is the director of the Universal Tao Center and Tao Garden Health Resort and Training Center in the beautiful northern countryside of Thailand. Since childhood he has been studying the Taoist approach to life. His mastery of this ancient knowledge, enhanced by his study of other disciplines, has resulted in the development of the Universal Tao System which is now being taught throughout the world.

Mantak Chia was born in Thailand to Chinese parents in 1944. When he was six years old, Buddhist monks taught him how to sit and "still the mind." While still a grammar school student, he learned traditional Thai boxing. He was then taught Tai Chi Chuan by Master Lu, who soon introduced him to Aikido, Yoga and broader levels of Tai Chi.

Years later, when he was a student in Hong Kong excelling in track and field events, a senior classmate named Cheng Sue-Sue introduced him to his first esoteric teacher and Taoist Master, Master Yi Eng (I Yun). At this point, Master Chia began his studies of the Taoist way of life in earnest. He learned how to circulate energy through the Microcosmic Orbit and, through the practice of Fusion of the Five Elements, how to open the other Six Special Channels. As he studied Inner Alchemy further, he learned the Enlightenment of the Kan and Li, Sealing of the Five Senses, Congress of Heaven and Earth and Reunion of Heaven and Man. It was Master Yi Eng who authorized Master Chia to teach and heal.

When Mantak Chia was in his early twenties he studied with Master Meugi in Singapore, who taught him Kundalini, Taoist Yoga and the Buddha Palm. He was soon able to clear blockages to the flow of energy within his own body. He learned to pass the life force energy through his hands also, so that he could heal Master Meugi's patients. He then learned Chi Nei Tsang from Dr. Mui Yimwattana in Thailand.

A while later, he studied with Master Cheng Yao-Lun who taught him the Shao-Lin Method of Internal Power. He learned the closely guarded secret of the organs, glands and bone marrow exercise known as Bone Marrow Nei Kung and the exercise known as Strengthening and Renewal of the Tendons. Master Cheng Yao-Lun's system combined Thai boxing and Kung Fu. Master Chia also studied at this time with Master Pan Yu, whose system combined Taoist, Buddhist and Zen teachings. Master Pan Yu also taught him about the exchange of Yin and Yang power between men and women, and how to develop the Steel Body.

To understand the mechanisms behind healing energy better, Master Chia studied Western anatomy and medical science for two years. While pursuing his studies, he managed the Gestetner Company, a manufacturer of office equipment and became well acquainted with the technology of offset printing and copying machines.

Using his knowledge of Taoism, combined with the other disciplines, Master Chia began teaching the Universal Tao System. He eventually trained other Instructors to communicate this knowledge and he established the Natural Healing Center in Thailand. Five years later, he decided to move to New York, where in 1979, he opened the Universal Tao Center. During his years in America, Master Chia continued his studies in the Wu system of Tai Chi with Edward Yee in New York.

Since then, Master Chia has taught tens of thousands of students throughout the world. He has trained and certified over 1,200 instructors and practitioners from all over the world. Universal Tao Centers and Chi Nei Tsang Institutes have opened in many locations in North America, Europe, Asia, and Australia.

In 1994, Master Chia moved back to Thailand, where he had begun construction of Tao Garden, the Universal Tao Training Center in Chiang Mai.

Master Chia is a warm, friendly and helpful man who views himself primarily as a teacher. He presents the Universal Tao System in a straightforward and practical manner, while always expanding his knowledge and approach to teaching. He uses a laptop computer for writing and is totally at ease with the latest computer technology.

Master Chia estimates that it will take thirty-five books to convey the full Universal Tao System. In June, 1990, at a dinner in San Francisco, Master Chia was honored by the International Congress of Chinese Medicine and Qi Gong (Chi Kung), who named him the Qi gong Master of the Year. He is the first recipient of this annual award.

In December, 2000, the Tao Garden Health Resort and Universal Tao Training Center was completed with two Meditation Halls, two open air Simple Chi Kung Pavilions, indoor Tai Chi, Tao Tao Yin and Chi Nei Tsang Hall, Tai Chi Natural Swimming Pool, Pakua Communications Center with a complete Taoist Library, Internal World Class Weight Lifting Hall and complete 8 Court Recreational Facilities.

In February, 2002, the Immortal Tao practices will be held at Tao Garden for the first time using Dark Room technology, creating a complete environment for the higher level Taoist practices.

Master Mantak Chia has previously written and published these twenty-three Universal Tao books:

Tao Huang

Tao Huang was born and grew up in Dingxi (Settling West) County in Northwest China. Tao Huang was destined to be a healer or shaman according to the prophesy revealed in his family graveyard. In previous incarnations he was twice a Buddhist and spent two lives as a native Indian spiritual practitioner. He began chi kung practice during his teenage years, right after the Cultural Revolution, and healed his physical problems.

While visiting the United States at the age of 24 on an exchange program, he found Taoism among other spiritual disciplines, such as Christianity and Buddhism. After returning to China a year later, he searched for a temple to begin his Taoist pursuits. But instead, on the winter solstice of 1988, he had his heart-sealed awakening through Lao Tzu to live and preach Taoism in the West. Later, he was ordained into the 26th lineage of the Dragon-Gate School, and received the teachings of talisman, Yellow Court, inner alchemy, and mystic practice.

He came to the United States as an immigrant in 1990 to present the teachings of Laoism and practices of Taoism under the spiritual name, Valley Spirit. He is the author of Laoism, the Complete Teachings of Lao Zi. His biography was recently published (2000) in the Ways of Spirit. He is now a Taoist practitioner managing his Tao Healing Arts center in Lakewood, Ohio. He is currently working on the Taoist Trilogy, Jing, Qi and Shen, and the teachings of the eight spiritual meridians.

Acknowledgments

The Universal Tao Publications staff involved in the preparation and production of Door To All Wonders: Application of the Tao Te Ching extend our gratitude to the many generations of Taoist Masters who have passed on their special lineage, in the form of an unbroken oral transmission, over thousands of years. We thank Taoist Master I Yun (Yi Eng) for his openness in transmitting the formulas of Taoist Inner Alchemy.

Thanks to Juan Li for the use of his beautiful and visionary drawings, illustrating Taoist esoteric practices.

We offer our eternal gratitude to our parents and teachers for their many gifts to us. Remembering them brings joy and satisfaction to our continued efforts in presenting the Universal Tao System. For their gifts, we offer our eternal gratitude and love. As always, their contribution has been crucial in presenting the concepts and techniques of the Universal Tao.

We wish to thank the thousands of unknown men and women of the Chinese healing arts who developed many of the methods and ideas presented in this book.

We wish to thank Dennis Huntington for his editorial work and writing contributions, as well as his ideas for the cover. We appreciate his research and great labor. We wish to thank Colin Campbell for his editorial contributions on the revised edition of this book, as well as thanking our Senior Instructors, Rene J. Narvarro and Annette Derksen, for their insightful contributions to the revised version. We thank Joost Kuiterbrouwer for his suggestion on choosing the book title and numerous insights. We thank especially Marion Knabe for her many times of editing over the past three years before the draft reached Dennis's hand.

A special thanks goes to our Thai Production Team for their cover illustration and book design and layout: Raruen Keawpadung, Computer Graphics; Saysunee Yongyod, Photographer; Udon Jandee, Illustrator; and Saniem Chaisarn, Production Designer.

Preface

For over 2500 years, the five thousand pictographs/words of Tao Te Ching, the Scripture of Laoism and the Bible of Taoism, have been regarded as among the greatest treasures in the world. Li (plum), born around 640 B. C. with a personal name Er (ear), compiled the text in Midwest China. His legendary name, Lao Tzu—meaning the old philosopher or the ancient child—rose from his mother's lips as she delivered him under a plum tree. His white hair gave him the countenance of an aged man, which elicited his mother's cry of joy upon seeing him emerge into this world. During his lifetime he worked in the capital as a keeper of the Imperial Archives. This enabled him to reconstruct the paths of many enlightened sages and holy men who came before his time. After having meditated for three years inside a cave in Northwest China (now known as Lao Tzu's Cave), he achieved his enlightenment. Before disappearing from the society, Lao Tzu wrote his farewell gift—Text—to a Tao-pursuer, who was a Passer (like a highway gatekeeper). Confucius gave him a name—Dragon—after the visit.

The Text contains two sections. The first is Tao Ching (Ching meaning classic), and the second is entitled Te Ching. The word Tao in the literal sense means God, God's creation, nature, universal essence and its manifestation, the Way of life and its practice. Te refers to action, virtue, morality, beauty, and gracious behavior. Many years after these writings came into existence, He Shanggong, The Man-On-The-Riverbank, who was believed to be the reincarnation of Lao Tzu, divided the Text into 81 chapters. Numbers have always figured prominently in Chinese philosophy and symbolism. Tao Ching has 37 chapters and Te Ching is composed of 44. To assess this numerically, we see that three and seven is ten, and four plus four equal eight; together they are eighteen, or double-nine, which when multiplied equal 81. Individually, three represents the multiplicity (seed), and four portrays the foundation (cross). Seven represents the masculine spirit (horse) and eight, the feminine spirit (sheep). Biologically, fetus growth takes thirty-seven weeks to complete; spiritually, the seed of Tao is contained in the thirty-seven chapters. Each spiritual being contains the copy of three, the dual souls of seven and eight, and the two deaths of four: one for flesh and the other for soul. The sacrifice of double four (double-cross) for the nurturing and cultivation of spiritually reborn seed: the transformation of love and virtue into pure-person (the oneness between spirit-nine of pure soul and God's nine of pure spirit).

Tao Te Ching translated into English.

We are presenting Tao Huang's English translation of Lao Tzu's Tao Te Ching for your reference in Appendix I after Chapter IX, the last chapter of commentary.

Lao Tzu's Text of Tao Te Ching receives a fresh translation from the original Chinese Text in Door to All Wonders. Avoiding accumulations that have accrued to the Standard Version over the centuries, Tao Huang (with the assistance of Professor Edward Brennan) translated the Text assembled from the Mawangdui texts. Huang commented, "Chinese archaeologists unearthed them in 1973. These are the oldest texts extant. There is a new edition on Guodian's unearthed material (about 100 years or more before the MW texts), but there are missing words, phrases or chapters in so many places that it is impossible to rely on that edition faithfully. We respect the originality and simplicity of the Mawangdui Text. The Mawangdui Text and the Standard Version of the Text are mixed in our translation in a few places. We use the Standard Version only to fill in the blanks in cases where there are words or phrases missing in the Mawangdui texts."

Throughout its history, the Text has merged through a myriad of changes due to the translations of various commentators and translators. The process of word-interpretation, philosophical rationality and speculation defeat the mystical application and wisdom illumination. More ideal explanations and linguistic understanding shadow its innately meditative experience and spiritual insightfulness. Yet, regardless how philosophers rationalize, leaders manipulate, military strategists deploy, scholars garble, meditators chant and religious people worship, the Text remains virtuously untouched, unscathed by time.

In viewing the variations found between the Mawangdui Texts (the oldest existing copy unearthed in 1973) and the original standard version, the problems are astonishingly and clearly evident. Throughout history, the philosophical Laoists have tended to standardize the Text as their own teaching by dismissing its practical application, central to its essential meaning. There are also many that have changed their vision quest into the more religious practice of Buddhism. Together, they have declared the Text to be rife with abundant tricks and sophistries, bearing no more stance or justice. This sullied reputation arises from justifying the criticism of the believers' misleading attitude. These mental configurations of the Text can be observed in various Chinese titles such as Lao-Tzu, The book of Lao-Tzu, Tao Te Ching, Te Tao Ching or The book of Lao-Tzu Tao Te Ching.

Equally, the translators have run a similar course. The examples of English versions, though relatively new, are derived from Chinese and other sources as well. The first English title is The Speculations on Metaphysics, Policy and Morality of the "The Old Philosopher," Lao Tzu – translated by John Chalmers in 1868 from French to English – put "the thought of Lao Tzu into a readable English dress." However, he did not realize that his work would become the model of the practice of copying, just as Lao Tzu himself expands into all sorts of Laoism/ists/schools. His Text reaches a more descriptive scale than the historical Chinese commentators could hope to achieve. Some of the copies are: Taoist texts, ethical, political and speculative (Frederick Henry Balfour, 1884), The Remains of Lao Tzu (Herbert A. Giles, 1886), Tao-Teh King (James Legge, 1891), Lao-Tsze=s Tao-Te-king, (Paul Carus, 1896, the first American version and revised in 1913 as The Canon of Reason and Virtue), The Light of China (Heysinger, 1903), The Sayings of Lao Tzu (Lionel Giles, 1904), The teachings of the Old Boy (T. MacInnes, 1927), The Way and Its power (Arther Waley, 1934), The way of acceptance (Herman Ould, 1946), The Wisdom of Lao Tzu (Lin Yutang, 1948), The Tao, the Sacred Way (Tolbert McCarroll, 1982), The Way of the Ways (Henrrymon Maurer, 1982), The essential Tao (Thomas Cleary, 1991), and The Tao of the Tao Te Ching (Michael LaFargue, 1992), Lao Tzu Tao Te Ching (Ursula K. Le Guin, 1997), The Living Tao (Stephen F. Kaufman, 1998).

The above list is just a small sampling of the existing copies found in English. Unpredictable numbers of new copies will flourish in the future. To go beyond this fruitful result, the English readers must endeavor to connect to Lao Tzu's original mind, not others' mindless minding of Lao Tzu. They desperately need the energetic vibration generated through Lao Tzu, not the linguistic interpretation. They need a direct spiritual sensation passed down by Lao Tzu. It is to this societal need that we are destined to restore the original image of the text. We wish to capture the original state of Lao Tzu's simultaneously mindful conscious flow, and to sense the vibration of the wordless uttering sound of Tao: the voice of our own truly naked sexless being.

Essence Trans-Illuminated

Regarding his relationship to Lao Tzu, Tao Huang states that he has a direct connection to the the "Old Master," Lao Tzu himself! "The transmission of Lao Tzu took place on the Winter Solstice in1988. He came to me through meditation, and I wrote automatically what my life should be in the West. It was the beginning of the heart-sealed teaching of my life, or direct spiritual initiation."

In terms of writing 'The Door,' Master Huang explains, "I have carefully divided eighty-one chapters into nine. In each chapter for this book, I have selected all the words and phrases in the Tao Te Ching related to the main topic for the chapter. For example, in Chapter One, there are 32 chapters in the Tao Te Ching represented that mentioned or stressed the word Tao. This book is so important in many ways. Firstly, it is the first in English history that has the integration of meditation, interpretation and illustration together. Secondly, there is no Chinese commentary to do so. Thirdly, we have rearranged the chapter division to present the true meaning of the integration of heavenly power and human power in the mystic field within us.

"The essence of this project is more experiential than conceptual in nature, even though it is laced with all sorts of Taoist concepts. Taoism is all about experience: words are the final elixir, or the representations of that elixir, being crystallized. They are like DNA in a living flesh."

The Door to All Wonders is neither a translation nor a transliteration of Tao Te Ching. Even though Lao Tzu's words can be translated, certain Chinese words cannot. English has no equivalent words for Tao or Chi; nor does Chinese have its equivalence for English words such as mind or God. Even though His teaching has been passed down through literary form, the essence could not be transliterated. It has to be transmitted through faithful devotion and trans-illuminated through heart awakening. Faith opens the door to the wisdom mind, allowing the power of teaching to be illuminated within the golden chamber of the heart.

We, as ethnic Chinese, have witnessed how the original text of Tao Te Ching has become proliferated through personal or literary censorship. Equally, as we are destined to present the teachings of the Tao in the West, we are also Westernized, capable of navigating between Chinese and English like a universal citizen.

Yet, words serve best for the purpose of conveying the meanings of insightful or enlightened life experience—just like our vessels glorify the power of God through their destined journeys. To this end, we have digested all the words in His teaching, knowing how they should be registered in the mind and echoed in the heart. By the time we reach the point that we can neither translate the power of the Tao nor demonstrate its virtuous action through words, we are trapped in a dead-end, lost in the wilderness as the words are blown off life's footprints by the cosmic wind.

The light comes from above, opening our hearts; the wills are charged, demonstrating the quality of teaching. The universal power transcends the cultural characters as the teachings are relived through the sacred vessels locked within the heavenly numbers. The marriage of Tao and Te are completed.

The two-volume text integrates our body and mind, as its eighty-one chapters seal our nine bodily holes with their shining words pouring through our channeling fingertips. We italicize them as our conscious expression marches through topics of all subjects. The thirty-seven chapters of the Tao become the first five chapters in our presentation: the five elements in Chinese mind or the five chambers in the mystic apple. The forty-four chapters of Te (the original double-cross) become the living cross we each carry under the universal chariot or within the completion of ten symbolized in Chinese.

Note on Transliteration

There are different systems for transliterating Chinese words into English. For this book, we have opted to retain the spelling of selected words to remain consistent with the standard used in Master Chia's previous books (based on the Wade-Giles system). We are using the spelling Tao, Lao Tzu, Chi and Ching. In the Pinyin system, these words would be spelled Dao, Lao Zi, Qi and Jing. Other Chinese words may appear as spelled in the Pinyin system.

Cosmic Bridge

The title, Door to All Wonders, comes straight from the last sentence—actually, the last phrase of the first chapter of Lao Tzu's Tao Te Ching.

First of all, the door is an eye opening and a conscious connection with the wonders of the universe, or God's creation. The 'Door' functions as a middle point between the internal world and the external world, between the information within and without—or between those who have been initiated, ordained, or baptized and who have the gifts of God but have not established a cosmic bridge within themselves.

To the Taoists, the bridge is the North Star, the Big Dipper, the violet color and golden elixir. We do not train people in the other six hues of the rainbow colors, but only focus on the last one, the violet color that makes Taoism so special, so lonesome, and so wonderful. We have no time for pre-elementary school, nor middle or high school or college. We only take the post-graduate course. This is because in the Taoist belief, each one of the seven rainbow colors takes one lifetime to complete, if you are lucky enough. That is why it must take seven lifetime practices in order to produce a Zhen Ren, Pure Person—or White Horse in Christianity.

Therefore, the door becomes a necessary vehicle for people's communication on both sides—such as the teachers, who are always inside the door, and the students, if not initiated, who are wondering (or wandering) outside the door. In order to open the door, the readiness of heart and completion of purification must take place first. Otherwise, the heart-sealed teachings between teacher and student cannot begin. Ultimately, the door refers to a specific realm of consciousness of God, a line connecting two sides, or a flowing river covering both sides of the riverbed. Shoel is the word in the Bible.

Taking another example, Shakespeare's plays are doors, which are carried out either by readers and writers, or between stage players and audience. This is the precise functioning of a door, a cosmic vehicle connecting heart and mind, Xing and Ming, soul and spirit.

What, then, we have presented you now is our transmission, as Lao Tzu's words are italicized as stone-carved letters in the depth of our conscious flow. You cannot read Lao Tzu here; He has died into our hearts. You cannot objectify his teachings from our transmitted teachings; his words are now our words. What transmission you will receive depends on how your heart is driven by your faith.

As you go through the book, read the words as listening to a storyteller, hearing your inner conscious dialogue, and talking back and forth dreamingly between your true self and God. Now move on, cast your eyes upon your hungry souls; the messages in the teaching will shine upon you.

By presenting the four techniques in Chapter III—"emptying the mind, vitalizing the stomach, softening the will, and strengthening the character"—we hope to justify the societal need as we see it. "Emptying the mind" requires a complete realization of self and society before the mind can become tranquil and return to its infantile stage. Only when the mind is empty will the body be fat with love and the spirit be able to present itself. "Vitalizing the stomach" is filling the stomach with purified Chi. "Softening the will" discusses the process of fully accepting the body/mind and world by diminishing the ego anticipation: the will of self-deception/punishment. And finally, "strengthening the character" is standing up with one's authentic character—the true self—and allowing the body to be dusty and the mind shining. To achieve this is the answer to the Door to All Wonders: why Tao is always present, the Text always alive and Lao Tzu always smiling like a child. It is the key to the Door of All Wonders—open to those who wish to step into the mystery of life and beyond.

Words of Caution

The practices described in this book have been used successfully for thousands of years by Taoists trained by personal instruction. Readers should not undertake the practice without receiving personal transmission and training from a certified instructor of the Universal Tao, since certain of these practices, if done improperly, may cause injury or result in health problems. This book is intended to supplement individual training by the Universal Tao and to serve as a reference guide for these practices. Anyone who undertakes these practices on the basis of this book alone, does so entirely at his or her own risk.

The meditations, practices and techniques described herein are not intended to be used as an alternative or substitute for professional medical treatment and care. If any readers are suffering from illnesses based on mental or emotional disorders, an appropriate professional health care practitioner or therapist should be consulted. Such problems should be corrected before you start training.

Neither the Universal Tao nor its staff and instructors can be responsible for the consequences of any practice or misuse of the information contained in this book. If the reader undertakes any exercise without strictly following the instructions, notes and warnings, the responsibility must lie solely with the reader.

This book does not attempt to give any medical diagnosis, treatment, prescription, or remedial recommendation in relation to any human disease, ailment, suffering or physical condition whatsoever.

Editor's Introduction
Taoist Bone

By Dennis Huntington

Taoist Collaboration

The following chapters are the result of the collaborative efforts of two distinct Taoists. They have different backgrounds in their lives and different orientations, as they see it, in their practices of the Tao. Master Chia is like an older brother in some ways, a more experienced teacher of the Tao in Western cultures. He teaches an ascending range of practices designed to culminate in the Wu Chi, spiritual immortality and physical/spiritual immortality. However, at this point he is most famous for teaching people Taoist fundamentals for health and inner peace—which include understanding, cultivating and gaining mastery of their sexual energy.

The younger Taoist, Tao Huang, commented to me: "Master Chia has devoted his entire life to the teaching of the Tao, and it is in him that I see the hope and joy of devoting my life as fully as possible into the practice and teaching of the Tao. … Sexuality is the base of everything, but mystic insight is the seed. This is the ultimate yin and yang, the harmony of body and mind. This is perhaps the most help Master Chia did on my behalf: He made me like Jung with his Freudian approach. … I know it is difficult for you, but that is the nature of life. It is even more difficult for Master Chia this time, because we simply view and walk the Tao differently. In our Taoist tradition, we are all in agreement on the oneness of Tao, the power of Virtue, the duality of Ming and Xing, the trinity of Ching, Chi and Shen, and the pentagram of all the fives we have—and for that matter, that the universe also has. How to walk the momentary individual path among these agreements is the path of understanding, love and mutual acceptance. That is all we have, and that is the will of blood we have all inherited as long as we call ourselves Taoists."

You will find Tao Huang's commentary on immortality, based on Lao Tzu's references to it in the Tao Te Ching. Lao Tzu is one of thousands of immortals known in Taoist lore. There are eight famous immortals, referred to simply as the Eight Immortals. Each of them is unique in his or her background, style of life and in their practices for approaching the Tao. Yet, they all share a commonality of experience as they evolved into the oneness of the eternal, immortal, universal void of the all-encompassing Tao. While Master Chia and Huang may have attained different realms of expertise in their approach to the Tao, their ultimate destination is the same. We are fortunate to be the beneficiaries of their combined offerings.

I have elicited responses from Master Chia. His responses echo—in a sense of yin/yang polarity—the sentiments expressed above about viewing and walking the Tao differently. His general characterization of Master Tao Huang's practices might be represented by his comment to me one morning. Regarding their acquaintanceship, which began in 1995, he said: "It seems like he's always telling me about some experience he had in a dream the night before." This comment is consistent with the impression offered in the introduction to Tao Huang's biography that was published in the Ways of Spirit by Dandelion Books in 2000. To wit: "Tao has shared with me how he works closely with his dreams to inform his daily reality. In fact, he knows ahead of time when I am going to call him, telling me he dreamed it the night before."

These characterizations no doubt reflect Huang's introspective efforts in his quest for emotional/psychological liberation, his practices akin to dream yoga, and his 'neidan' meditation practices. Whereas, Master Chia's focus in his teaching is all about energy: Sense the Ching and Chi. Cultivate this life force energy; conserve it and refine it into Shen. Use the Shen to enter the Wu Chi, to return to Tao, and to attain immortality. His focus is on practical cultivation: "You do it; you get it!"

Door to All Wonders contains some descriptions of, and references to, Taoist practices. Huang has laid the foundation of the text with his commentary and practical information related to Lao Tzu's Tao Te Ching. Master Chia provides complementary perspectives and practices refined from his extensive experience of teaching people from all over the world. The thrust of the book is directed to the practical significance and ramifications of cultivating the Tao and Te—regardless of the exercises one may employ for training. The mindfulness of Tao and Te in our lives and in our cultivation practices streamlines the effectiveness of all that we are and all that we do.

Reference Base of Chinese Mystical Culture

Biographical/Cultural Resources

It became clear that I had to do some homework/research after my first reading of Tao Huang's manuscript. In the biographical sketch we read: "… destined to be a healer or shaman—the prophesy revealed in his family graveyard … previous incarnations—twice a Buddhist, two lives as a Native American Indian spiritual practitioner … chi kung practice—healed his physical problems … heart-sealed awakening through Lao Tzu … 26th lineage of the Dragon-Gate School … spiritual name Valley Spirit." Though interesting, these are not typical references that one would anticipate in a typical biography in a Western cultural setting—not, if you were a company personnel manager screening a candidate for a job! Likewise, if you were someone not familiar with the arts, sciences, and mythology of Chinese mystical culture, you might raise your eyebrows.

I garnered further clarification and elaboration to render these biographical statements more natural and reasonable for the reader to entertain. In addition, research in the form of reading other source books supports most of his personal statements as being highly credible. Further elaboration of Tao Huang's biographical/cultural resources that inform his writing is provided in the following paragraphs.

Cultural Orientation

"Chinese mystic culture was rooted in Taoism, a combination of everything from sky above to earth below, and all things in the middle. The details can be found in the text. Taoism provided me a groundbreaking thinking path—while Western culture opens the landscape of norms for my liberal thinking, especially the Christ path of love. I am still experiencing it day after day."

Prophecy in his Family Graveyard—Destined to be a Healer or Shaman

"According to Chinese geomancy, or feng-shui, the graveyard where a person was buried will influence the upcoming four generations. When the graveyard of the grandfather of Chiang Kai Shek (the founder of the nationalist party that is now based in Taiwan) was chosen, the best feng-shui master in that province predicted that on the third generation there would be an emperor.

"Feng-shui is one of the Taoist's four practices—weidan, neidan, fangzhong, and fangshi—and feng-shui is part of the fourth branch. Feng-shui has two branches, yang and yin. The yang branch deals with the living structure for those who are alive, while yin branch deals directly with the graveyard, dust to dust, and ashes to ashes."

This is the context in which Tao's personal prophecy was revealed.

Previous Incarnations

"My past life came through meditation—twice a Buddhist, two lives as a Native American Indian spiritual practitioner. During meditation for the last twenty years, some of the information dealt with past life experiences, such as incarnations as a Buddhist and as a Native American Indian. I have even met my former wives while taking the flesh as a Native American healer. Those are part of the past ways that have led me into the violet color Taoist practice."

Chi Kung Practice—Healed his Physical Problems

"Due to my very poor health, at age 19, I began to practice Chi Kung in my hometown. At first I taught myself by using one of the early copies of the book, Chi Gong, which had been published in China in the 1930's. I found this book in the college library as I searched desperately for a way to heal myself. A sentence that struck me deeply was, 'If you can utilize the Chi from earth and heaven, then you can have babies, regrow teeth, and change white hair back to black.' This was the beginning of my attraction to Chi Kung, a practice that has remained in my life despite many ordeals, and the trials that come with the devotion given to one's search for the meaning of life.

"During my high school years, I had suffered from chronic indigestion, rheumatoid arthritis, and insomnia. My hair had turned two-thirds white while I was still nineteen years old. I began Chi Kung practice with one of Liu Yi-Ming's students (Thomas Cleary has translated several of Liu's books). Within three years of practicing Chi Kung, my hair had returned to black. Every morning I did a 30 minute standing meditation with my index and middle fingers stretched out before me, while quietly counting my in and out breaths. After only a few weeks of this, my insomnia disappeared and I began to enjoy sound sleep once again. In the third year of daily practice, my arthritis disappeared. When the healing Chi began to seep through my fingers and bones, it seemed almost more than I could bear. As it grew, the healing lifestream permeated my entire being.

"With Chi Kung as an inner practice, little oxygen is consumed, while the absorptive capacity of the lungs rises significantly. This is not the case when engaging in extreme physical exertion, especially if competition is involved. It is rough on the lungs as well as the heart, and can be damaging to one's overall health. Therefore, I gave up my practice of daily running, which left me feeling exhausted. Chi Kung always left me refreshed and regenerated.

"In 1986, at age 24 (in my birth year of the Tiger), I had the privilege of coming to America as an exchange teacher. During that school term, I was invited to teach the Chinese language, as well as Chi Kung at a high school in Cleveland. This was a decisive year that changed my entire life personally, culturally, and spiritually. Personally, it awakened me to the path for my life's journey—one that would prove to be lonely, but alternately rewarding. Culturally, I knew that my traditional culture offered something not only for myself, but also for the entire world. It encompassed the essence of Chinese medicine and Taoist Inner Alchemy. Spiritually, I had chosen Taoism over Buddhism, Confucianism, and Christianity."

Heart-Sealed awakening through Lao Tzu

"At 3:00 a.m. on the Winter Solstice, 1988, I awoke feeling stuffed, even though I had not consumed more food than usual. I lit an incense stick and began to meditate. Very soon, I experienced the spontaneous movements of all kinds of martial arts forms throughout my body (I later discovered this to be connected to past lives as a Buddhist monk and a soldier). I then felt a strong, cold energy pervading my fingers and toes, and heard a bubbling sound coming from my fingers.

"Afterwards, I lit a second incense stick. A strong feeling urged me to write to my girlfriend (who is now my wife). I was in a Chi Gong state through which I experienced automatic writing. The words that came through me were not my own thoughts, nor were they in my own handwriting. By the time 'I' signed it, to my amazement and disbelief, the signature turned out to be Lao Tzu's spiritual name, 'Supreme Master Lao Jun,' or Tai-Shang-Lao-Jun in Chinese. I then felt a huge shaft of black energy rush out of my body and into the sky.

"I felt overjoyed after going through so many disappointments—as I had received the Tao and was sealed internally with the power of the inner alchemy tradition. Later on I learned that this kind of experience is the norm in Taoist tradition. It is a method of single-lineage transmission of teaching from master to student. I was, from that day forward, surrounded by thousands of years of Taoist tradition, and connected to the sacred teachings through the power of Lao Tzu.

"I had previously misunderstood the workings of the Tao. The sacred teaching of Taoism has never been lost; instead, it has been passed on only to chosen disciples when the time is right. I am pleased to be one of them, and grateful to bring this tradition into the West. Lao Tzu provided a second motivation for me to live in the West, and to become an American.

"I was very happy, and felt very fortunate that I was able to have Lao Tzu as my Spiritual Master. This became the foundation for me to become a true Taoist. I could now practice Taoism not simply from personal beliefs, but from personal connection to and embracement with a real Master.

"The heart-sealed teaching is the essential method in neidan practice. Just like a married couple, each is barren, having only half of the complete heart. When the teacher's heart and student's heart become one, or two souls become one pure spirit, the teachings are given and taken in their own way. This has been characterized by the eighth hexagram in I Ching, where two heads are cut off—only the two half-hearts merge into oneness. Essentially it is about two nines, one for our spirit/soul, and the other the cosmic/God consciousness. The oneness is the combination of white of seed/God consciousness and yellow court/sprout of spirit self. [More discussion on I Ching hexagrams is presented in another section herein.]

"Also, when the two hearts reach oneness, you cannot tell which is which. This is the most difficult situation for me to explain: which part of the exercises are inherently Lao Tzu's and which parts are my own understanding or reflection upon his teachings—or revelation."

Editor's Note: For additional commentary on this spiritual noumenon, there is an English translation, The Jade Emperor's Mind Seal Classic.[1] The Chinese characters for heart and mind are the same. Hence, this English translation of the Chinese text of the Taoist classic on the subject has used the word 'mind,' rather than heart, in contrast to Tao Huang's choice of terms.

Significance of Winter Solstice: "In Taoist tradition, we have four big times within a year, Winter/Summer Solstice and Spring/Fall Equinox. The same way for each day, 11:00pm/am to 1:00 am/pm and 5:00am/pm to 7:00am/pm. These are the four corners of the year and of the day. The energy is much stronger than at other times. These times are when either the yang or yin Chi begins, or the yang and yin reach a balance."

26th Lineage of the Dragon Gate School

"Dragon Gate is a continuation of historical neidan practice, which emphasizes the Taoist trinity of Ching, Chi and Shen. It is also the unification of Buddhism, Taoism and Confucianism. What I received was the path of heart and relocation from family name into spiritual name—from Zhi of intelligence to Chung of worship, the twenty-sixth character of Master Chou's poetic verse."

Lineage Names: "Chung means honor or respect the mountain. In Taoist tradition, each religious or spiritual founder has written a poem, the first word of the poem belongs to the first generation of that lineage or disciples, and on and on. Chung is the 26th word written by Master Chou Chuji, the founder of the Dragon Gate lineage. Also, four years from now, Lao Tzu would celebrate his 2600th year birthday; he was born on the 15th of February in the Chinese calendar."

Personal Name: "Tao is the name given to me by my father, which is different from the word Dao. My personal name means the rising part of the wave in the sea. I like that name; even though it is different from the word Dao, in English I can mix it up. Huang is my family name. In Taoist tradition, we do not change family name, we only change from generational name into spiritual name, and we also have the authority to give ourselves a spirit-name, besides a spiritual lineage name."

Spirit Name: "Valley Spirit, came to me after reading and meditating on the Tao Te Ching for many years. In Chinese it is called gu-xuan-zi: gu for grain or valley appeared in Chapter 6 of Tao Te Ching; and xuan, the mystic purple or violet, is the basic color of Taoism, which appears in many parts of the Tao Te Ching text. Zi is for seed or son. Valley is the nature of yin of the great mother; spirit is the son of God and oneness of spirit—together, it is the harmony of the Tao. I had the revelation when I was twenty years old when I read Lao Tzu in chapters 6 and 8. Valley is also referred to as grain."

Dragon Gate Initiation: "In 1992, upon my return visit from America, I revisited the Chincheng Monastery and received my initiation as a Taoist from the senior monk, Jiang Xingpin. He changed my family generation name into a religious generation name. My name was changed from Zhi to Chung, which means 'exalt and worship.' I now belong to the 26th generation of the Dragon Gate School of Taoism. The founder of the Dragon Gate School, Chou Chuji, or the Eternal Spring Pure Person, recognized and unified in his time the essence of the three teachings of Taoism, Buddhism, and Confucianism. If he could have had the opportunity to learn and experience the western teachings of Christianity, Judaism and Islam, I believe the Dragon Gate School would have become more universal and cross-cultural. This is the future development or evolution of human religious practice on earth.

"There was a deep significance in this new name for me. From that moment on, I no longer belonged to my biological family. I was now a member of a spiritual family with a lineage of spiritual ancestors in the Tao. The name Zhi belongs to the entire male line of my generation and was written in my family tree book, which had been destroyed during the Cultural Revolution. After the Revolution, the family generation name was discontinued.

"All the initiates in the Dragon Gate School carry the same spiritual generational name. I was overjoyed and deeply grateful for the new identity that had been bestowed upon me. I felt reborn. Only gradually did I become aware of the deep implications it held for me. I had to make a choice between a social career and the pursuit of my spiritual vocation as a Taoist practitioner."

Master Chia's Lineage, Longevity and Immortality

Master Chia has accumulated different aspects of Taoist practices from a variety of teachers—and continues to actively gather useful knowledge from a variety of sources. He has integrated his experience and knowledge into the Universal Tao System of interrelated practices. However, his main spiritual teacher was Yi Eng.

During my course of training for instructor certification, Master Chia talked about how he came to receive his spiritual transmission from his 90-year-old master (also known as White Cloud) in Hong Kong. He met with him for about twenty days almost daily for instruction and discussion until White Cloud determined that the time was right. He then transmitted spiritual energy to young Mantak Chia to awaken his consciousness and helped him to circulate Chi in his Microcosmic Orbit. He subsequently taught him the range of practices needed to open all the channels in his body. They maintained regular contact with close personal guidance until White Cloud had also conveyed those practices needed in order to achieve the inner alchemical transformations necessary for spiritual mastery, as well. Finally, he authorized young Chia to teach, and he counseled him to teach Westerners.

What is immortality? Master Chia explained to us that immortality is the ultimate goal of Taoist practices, but that it is a big leap from the normal development in everyday society. What is more, it takes many years of conscious cultivation to achieve the full scope of physical/spiritual immortality. However, anyone can improve their everyday life in a practical sense by learning the basic practices. Just believing and having faith in spiritual/immortal reality is useful for focusing one's commitments, but that alone does not get the job done. If people choose, they can also cultivate their experience to the higher levels of spiritual attainment—but first things first. What is important is to be present in this life, learn to transform stress into vitality and develop compassion through love. Then recycle that special quality of energy to keep the body healthy and in harmony with mind and spirit—and learn to cultivate true nature as spirit. Then you are open to develop possibilities beyond the cycles of life and death.

Taoists value health and longevity for their benefits for enabling a better quality of life. In addition, they are valued because they provide the strength and time necessary for sustaining the prolonged effort necessary to achieve spiritual immortality. Due to variables in individual circumstances, there is not just one time frame for everybody; so it is better to have more time available if it should be needed. Does longevity make one a sage or immortal? Such questions naturally arise from time to time. Master Chia has responded to such a question like this: "White Cloud told me his teacher, my Grand Master in China, was very old, more than 100, but I don't know exactly. He had gone to a cave in the high mountains for prolonged meditation involving out-of-body travel in the higher planes and returning to the source. For that kind of practice, Grand Master had put wax in his nose and other orifices to keep out insects and dust. White Cloud had to make sure that the body was not eaten while his teacher's spirit was away traveling to source. There are many stories like this where a faithful disciple or other attendant looks after an advanced meditator's body.

"Certainly if a person lives to be very old and has seriously applied themself in cultivating and transforming energy into spirit, it is very likely that they could become a sage. It depends on their level of practice. The same applies for immortality. If they haven't finished transforming their energy, they could become a partial spiritual immortal or partial physical/spiritual immortal."

So what is immortality—does it mean keeping the same body forever? Not really. Or, is it awareness of your spirit in different incarnations? No. Though meditators often report an awareness of past lives in their meditation experience—and this may be useful and interesting—it is not what is meant as the attaining of immortality. One's soul spirit has not been liberated when it is being cycled through various incarnations. it is still in need of purification until it achieves the evolved state of spiritual liberation.

On different occasions, Master Chia has discussed the difference between spiritual and physical/spiritual immortality. It depends on the degree of practice one has mastered. The distinction is easy to grasp. For spiritual immortality, one has achieved the ability to withdraw one's purified spirit energy from the body and traverse the inner regions independently—and merge in oneness with the eternal source, called Tao or Wu Chi or God, etc. In this state, the liberated spirit can manifest on the inner planes, but the physical body has returned to dust, and the spirit cannot return in the physical form.

Whereas, one who has attained physical/spiritual immortality has been able to complete the more tedious and time consuming process of transforming all of one's physical, soul and spirit energy into the spirit body during the time of life in the physical body. Thus, gaining all the powers of spiritual liberation, plus the ability to manifest at will in the physical form. In other words, in the achieved state of physical/spiritual immortality, one has mastered the ability to dematerialize and rematerialize the human body.

Education and Body Wisdom

"Back in America, I found myself avidly studying to integrate spiritual information and practices while desperately struggling with certain mindsets. Taoists have always questioned formal structures of authority and hierarchy. Perhaps because of my quite fierce Tiger character, I decided to discontinue my graduate work at the California Institute for Integral Studies. More and more I was sensing a clash between my spiritual awakening and the formal academic structure. They are two strange worlds of their own: one is original and authentic, and the other is corrupted and egoistic.

"Through my break with academia, I regained a sense of freedom that made me feel spacious and joyful. It was as though I could breathe freely again and discover my creative spontaneity. I regained my ability to listen to my heart and what I felt in my gut. I began to reconnect with my sensory awareness, and was grateful to become aware of the life current in my body and in the universe surrounding me. I gradually learned to integrate my gut with my heart and mind.

"In Chinese, the characters for heart and mind are the same, which reminds me of something I read in Carl Jung's autobiography. When he visited Arizona in the 1920's, Jung met an old Indian man whose name was Blue Lake. When Jung asked him what he thought of white people, Blue Lake said he felt they were all quite mad. When Jung asked him why, Blue Lake said it seemed that they were always agitated—incessantly running after things—and that they could think only with their heads.

"Jung then asked him where he formulated his own thoughts. Blue Lake did not speak, but pointed to his heart. Jung went on to say that for the first time in his life, he had met someone who spoke the truth about Western culture.

"My decision to end my graduate program at the California Institute of Integral Studies was closely related to the need to free myself from the conventional expectations that I had internalized in the course of my life. My family generation name, Zhi, reflected the Confucian dream which parents held for centuries, perceiving success in terms of fortune, career and profession. The first obligation of a son was to contribute to the fortune and wealth of his family. That was the primary way to honor his lineage. The Taoist view radically challenges the Confucian family culture. It is a way of cosmic individualism, since the lineage is restored through spiritual ancestry to the primordial spirit of our beginning through the creator of our individual spirits—but not biologically, due to further corruption.

"The new Taoist name reflected an entirely new perspective. The emphasis is to honor the spirit and rise beyond the ego and the boundaries of narrow self-interest that are so encrusted in the Confucian family ethos and in Chinese society at large. Although the long period of Communist rule had made inroads into our culture—in the unconscious of the people and the basic values of the country—Confucianism remained intact and was even reactivated. It served to consolidate the power of the Communist Party, effecting the domestication and subservience of the people to its authoritarian command structure. In contrast, the Taoist idea is to honor not the spirits of family lineage and the power of personal authority but to embrace the mountain power of the earth mother, where its power of stillness and spring interact to give birth to all things and welcomes them home after being lost or after death.

"It is not surprising that the Taoists have been feared, threatened and persecuted—as they question all attitudes viewed as contrary to nature. Likewise, they question attitudes contrary to that which spontaneously arises in humans, that which is in alignment with the universe. In this context, we can observe that in the fine arts (such as painting), and in martial arts practice, movement as a skill and a technique has been systematically expressed in formal disciplines of teaching and learning. As a result, it tends to destroy the creative, spontaneous impulse in the learning process.

"The Taoists' emphasis has been on creating an open energy space for the cultivation of a natural, spontaneous energy flow as the intuitive awakening and manifestation of that which is intrinsic in the wisdom of the body. Hence, we may observe that in Confucianism, as well as in mainstream modern education, there is a form of domestication of self-reliance, and of multiple originalities of the expression of self. The cultivation of truthful intention, and of inner emotions such as compassion, love, caring, generosity, and service are ignored and repressed. This results in stunting the personal growth and generating an all-pervasive neurosis and stress, as the body protests and seeks to be acknowledged and honored in its true being.

"In the Taoist vision of the learning process, the body memory—through which the universe and nature express themselves, and through which we are connected with our biological and spiritual ancestors—is the seat of intuitive awareness and of the mind as consciousness. In this view, the mind consciously mirrors the body. We carry within our body the entire process of the evolution of humankind and its interconnection with the universe and with nature. In its natural state, our body is in resonance with the universe and nature through the very crystalline structure of its bones, its vaults, the feet, the pelvis, the chest, the palate and the cranium, as well as through its glands and organs."

Taoist Bone: Spiritual Will 道骨

Taoist Story

Lao Tzu's Tao Te Ching and the Door to All Wonders are about how to cultivate Tao in our life with Te in order to achieve spiritual immortality. By the final stage, one must have attained a clear and unwavering state of spiritual will in order to be successful.

In the original manuscript that I received, a 'story' appeared near the beginning of the first chapter in the section entitled Communicable Tao. In hindsight, I would now characterize it as a symbolic representation—an allegorical presentation—of a concise summary of the essential concepts (an abstract) of Door to All Wonders. However, my first few attempts at reading this arcane parable and other statements and passages in the manuscript left me feeling exasperated and frustrated because there was not sufficient supporting information. Consequently, I had to try to guess the meanings intended. As it turns out, Huang told me after I queried him, "The story is the result of my twenty-years searching, as we all do in each and every stage of life's journey. Naming is the power of man, after being capable of ejaculating a spirit inside the womb." In this section, we will share some of the interesting background information that he has given me—plus, more snapshots of experience from the lives of both authors. I moved the 'story' into this Introduction, at the end of this Taoist Bone section—to be close to the discussion and background related to it.

In our communications, I referred to it as the story of the Just-Born-Baby and Just-Deceased-Old Man. Like myself, many Western Taoist practitioners and readers do not have a meaningful sense of the "Chinese experieance'--a different cultural reference and way of thinking. Nor is one likely to be acquainted with other factors in Tao Huang's personal life experience.

Inventing the Story

In response to my queries, Tao replied, "That parable story, Just-Born-Baby and Just-Deceased-Old Man, is about spiritual will. The related Chinese character would be Taoist Bone. The nature of Taoist Bone is about our inherited gift from God, through the manifestation of body and mind. The only way to open this bone is the enlightenment upon death. The bone, by the way, contains all the genetic information of the body and mind.

"Therefore, it is this Taoist bone coming again and again in the flesh form, which is announced by the birthing blood and the battling blood. Are we not battling with each and every breath for this blooded bone—whether our name, a conscious concept, or the cosmic mapping? Therefore, the battle of our life is the battle between blood and bone. We see the woman's blood either after the moon or after giving birth. Likewise, we see the blood in the man's battle or in the man's consciousness—we see the cosmic dance between love and seeing*, between voice and word, and between country and flag.

"It is such: my spirit-channeling story is as strong as a country or lineage, and is as strong as a woman's identification with her blood. It is to this bloodline that spirit is aligned and God consciousness is mapped.

"After spending twenty years of searching the love within my body and the will granted by God—called nature's supply in Chinese or gift from God in English—I cannot find anything that is valuable inside related to a country's territory or man's words. God is nameless and Tao is nameless.

"A couple of days ago when I turned on NPR [National Public Radio], a female reporter was speaking on the radio from Chechnya, in western Russia, saying that she could not understand why the majority of women were pregnant there. That phenomenon is how the dead soldiers are being reincarnated into flesh again. That is the bloodline between man's battleground and women's body. The blood never gets dried up, but circulates from flesh to flesh, love to love and spirit to spirit.

"What are we doing in Taoist tradition? We carry on the will of blood. It is the same with every career and profession and makes no difference in the matter of race or culture or nation—or even time for that matter. We are the blood flowing animals and we carry the will of the Cross or Tao and Te on our shoulders and through our feet.

"If not because of this blood, where are the passion and fire and stream of flow in life? If not because of the will, what is our connection to the inner and outer world, between ourselves and universe?"

Editor's Note: The above word, 'seeing'— in the context of "in the man's consciousness, we see the cosmic dance between love and seeing"—carries a significant heightened sense of experience. In the mental process and experience of people that share a visual-image-based written language system, such as Chinese and Japanese, there is a consciousness phase that is different from sound based writing systems. There is a visual mental process that is a unique pre-verbal stage of consciousness.

James Legge, in his Translator's Preface (written in 1882) for his translation of I Ching, Book of Changes, elucidates this special quality of 'seeing': "The written characters of the Chinese are not representations of words, but symbols of ideas, and the combination of them in composition is not a representation of what the writer would say, but what he thinks. … When the symbolic characters have brought his mind 'en rapport' with that of his author, he is free to render the ideas in his own, or any other speech, in the best manner that he can attain to. … In the study of a Chinese classical book, there is not so much an interpretation of the characters employed by the writer as a participation of his thoughts—there is the seeing of mind to mind."[2]

Spiritual Will

"The story of Just-Born-Baby and Just-Deceased-Old-Man is also a reflection of the door—the life connection of birth and death, the consciousness dividing into lineages and races and nations. It is what you will take.

"We must be the slaves of God. To be a slave is to be Job in the Book of Job. We have been enslaved since birth, having work to do and taking pilgrimages. So above, so below; in order to be a master, first slave. It is all your decision to take your own path, to devote your own love. How to consume your Chi of love is how to be the slave of yourself and of God at the same time. But sadly speaking, we are double slaves—the slave of God and the slave of man. In order to reach a spiritual state, the death of government/flesh and the death of religion/soul are a must, called two deaths in Christianity, Crucifixion and Resurrection.

"One more word on slave: It is true that for the entire Taoist path of internal liberation, we are our own boss and slave in the same body and mind. But in order to reach a complete liberation, work must be done, and karma must be dissolved. Otherwise, we would be still controlled by all realms of shadows—the shadows of colors, cultures, lineages, nations and races. The word 'will' is of spiritual will, like a steadfast rock of Peter, continuing the path of Christ love. It is this will that connects and relates all."

Background of Developing the Will to Live

"I was born at approximately nine p.m. on the third day of October 1962, in the Chinese calendar. It was the 30th day of October on the western calendar. I was the third child of my mother and the fifth son of my father. My father's first wife left three sons after her death. The period of 1958 to 1960 was an extremely precarious time in the countryside where we lived. Few children were being born at the time. There was so little food that few parents were inclined to have another mouth to feed. In my birth year, however, there was a great leap in the birth rate, as the previous year had been rich in harvest, and China had no debt to pay to Russia.

"At the time, my family in Northwest China was beset by great poverty, as most families were. The climate in our region, which lies in the central part of China in the heart of the central plateau, was quite inhospitable. Because of our difficult situation, severe malnutrition and poor housing, children were very prone to disease.

"I weighed less than four pounds at birth. My father, who was a relatively well-educated person and served as a secretary to the local community, did not wish to see my mother with more burdens than she already carried. He suggested she put me inside the "kang" to burn in the fire. My mother told my father, "I cannot do that—the baby is life." This was how she saved me. She told me this story when I was a teenager, and my first reaction was to feel very indignant toward my dad. My anger lasted no more than a few hours, however, as I came to understand that my father had acted as any poor peasant would have under the circumstances.

"After completing college, I was told by relatives that, out of his dozen grandchildren, my grandfather had loved me the most. When I was one or two years of age, he would hold me as I napped and take me on long walks. After two or three hours of walking, we would arrive home and I would awaken. My brothers and sisters would envy me my good luck as the recipient of this special act of love.

"In honor of my mother, I want to say that she gave me all the love she could, but that did not help to improve my poor physical condition as a child. I felt desperate and helpless. I recall that when I had bouts of diarrhea and fever, she would take a bowl of cold water and stir it up with three pairs of chopsticks. Following this she would swing the chopsticks around my head both clockwise and counterclockwise. After that she would turn toward the East, take the water in her mouth and spit it out on the ground. As she swung the chopsticks before my face, I would become calm and peaceful, and immediately feel the heat from the fever in my body subsiding. I still recall in my body memory that cool flow of water and the loving warmth of my mother.

"In winter, when a severe cold would set in, the atmosphere became very dry. Our hands and feet would wrinkle and blood would seep through the skin. My mother would put a bowl in the center of the room to collect the urine of the night. At dawn, the urine would be boiled and she would massage it into the skin of our hands and feet. It was a very effective remedy. In Chinese medicine, urine – especially a baby's – is still regarded as a valuable remedy for many ailments, particularly abdominal problems.

"When I return to the body-memory of my childhood and village, a deep sense of helplessness and despair overtakes me. It is not difficult to relive the sensation of pervasive hunger. We were never certain of our next meal. At times there was no water to drink. Under these conditions, your body shrinks and dries out. Simultaneously, there is a deep sense of acceptance, of knowing how nature rules.

"In hindsight, I realize that the lesson was to detach from everything, to have no expectations, and to accept what life offered. It helped me set aside personal goals and desires, and to follow the path that was revealed to me. The only permanent feature of life is change; this is the essential meaning of the I Ching. Only by understanding change can one follow it and thereby release any attempt to control a situation. Changes in nature are ruthless and merciless. We, the people on the yellow plateau, cannot now—and could not then—control and manage nature, even though Mao's slogan, 'Man must overcome Heaven' was incessantly and loudly trumpeted into our ears."

Master Chia's Life, Different but Parallel

On the point of urine remedies in Chinese medicine, if I may interject, there is a parallel in Master Chia's life that influenced his early disposition towards a life of healing and of teaching the Tao. He began his life in Bangkok, Thailand, as a healthy baby of Chinese parentage. He was born in dramatic circumstances during World War II when American pilots were bombing Japanese targets in the Bangkok area. His parents, being devout Christians, reasoned that the Americans wouldn't bomb a Christian church; so they went to their church to ensure a safe and secure delivery of their baby, Mantak.

As a young child, he was a very healthy boy in Bangkok's Chinatown. Though he was raised in a devout Christian family and was surrounded by the influence of Thailand's pervasive Buddhist culture, he also thrived in an environment of Chinese Taoist culture. He was a healthy boy, and he was frequently asked to pee in a jar so that neighbors could use it as medicine when they were sick. After awhile, he began to think, "I must be special." He felt proud that he could help people get well. From these early beginnings, he cultivated his knowledge of natural ways to live a healthy life and to help others to heal.

While still working successfully as the sales manager for Gestetner Company's Thailand head office in Bangkok, he opened his Natural Healing Center where he applied his skills for healing.

In the late 70's, he moved to New York City where he had intended to market a Chi machine (a Chi generator for enhancing the body's Chi) that he had invented. But, the American public didn't know about Chi; so, there wasn't a market for this health aid. However, while plying his healing arts in a health clinic in New York's Chinatown, he was later ferreted out by eager American students looking for a teacher of Taoist practices. The rest is history.

Quest for the Secret Code

Tao Huang continues, "There were two other books that I borrowed from the college library. One was the I Ching, and the other was The Interpretation of Dreams, by Sigmund Freud (Chinese translation). At the beginning of the Chinese Revolution, the I Ching had been forbidden reading. It was considered by the government to be a reflection of a pernicious feudal culture and a poisonous, conservative Confucian heritage. I had an unwavering desire to gain a thorough understanding of the I Ching, which was considered by the people to be one of the great treasures of China. It had always been valued as the foundation of Taoist Cosmology, and as the origin of Chinese traditional wisdom.

"To my disappointment, the study of the I Ching left me feeling very confused. I was unaware at the time that throughout Chinese history, the interpretation of this work had provided an ideological battleground for commentators. It had been the subject of a deep-seated conflict in the vision and worldview of Taoist practitioners and Confucian scholars. The Confucian interpretation focused largely upon linguistic explanation and analytical understanding. The Taoist version centered on practicality, on understanding natural events, and deepening one's conscious process. I was becoming aware of the fact that the Taoist view of the universe and of nature, as well as of human relations and Chinese science, was at the very root of Chinese civilization. Conversely, Confucian ideology had served, since very early times, as a principal instrument of the feudal order.

"I also realized that as Confucian culture had become dominant, the Taoist worldview and its theory on nature-related practices had often been viewed by rulers as dangerous, weird, and obscure, despite its contributions to science, medicine and other areas of Chinese culture. I had been quite unaware of the extent to which the Taoist worldview had been systematically repressed by the establishment, nationally as well as locally.

"I also began to understand that in the Taoist tradition, the I Ching was considered a sacred book. It was understood to contain a secret code that would awaken human consciousness. It served to reveal one's true destiny, and provided a key for transforming and enriching the life force we inherited from our ancestors and our parents, as well as the energies of heaven and earth. This view of life as a process of self-transformation—an inner journey—was rooted in the view that human beings are a microcosm that reflects the energies of the macrocosm. In the Taoist view there is no limit to the self-cultivation of one's intrinsic creative and spiritual potential.

"The Interpretation of Dreams had been declared taboo during the Cultural Revolution. It was viewed as a perverse product of Capitalism. In traditional Chinese culture, dreams had always been considered vital to predicting future events, collectively and personally. Freud emphasized the significance of dream interpretation as a means to understanding the present in light of the past. In his view, a key role was played by the libido. Obviously, the Chinese Communist establishment refused to see that its own taboo on sexuality and puritan attitudes were not so different from those reigning in Europe at Freud's time, especially in Vienna.

"Initially, I was quite attracted to Freud's views. They opened for me a whole new world, giving me a sense of freedom in the face of my puritan culture. Yet I also realized that there was a kind of obsession in Freud's ideas. When I undertook my undergraduate studies in psychology at Cleveland State University, I grew more and more dissatisfied with his position. I concluded that it reflected a pathological state in the elite of his time, which he then used as the basis for his views on sexuality. In my graduate studies at the California Institute for Integral Studies in San Francisco, I realized that my major objection to Freud was that his view on sexuality was highly reductive. I cannot deny, though, that his teachings provided income for psychology professors. I became very uncomfortable within the academic environment for that reason.

"My Chi Kung practice and its healing effects contributed to my changed attitude towards Freud. This shift was also dramatically influenced by my discovery of the work of Carl Jung and his ensuing break with the positivistic European tradition. His liberation from that mold clearly manifested itself in his discovery of the phenomenon of synchronicity (events happening simultaneously that are not coincidental but predestined), along with his great empathy for the Taoist tradition. This shines through in his commentary on the Taoist classic, The Secret of Golden Flower, and in his introduction to Wilhelm's first Western translation of the I Ching."

Story of the Just-Born-Baby and Just-Deceased-Old-Man

Upon dying, the voice and name are extinguished by spiritual will—if one has developed it—enabling the person to enter into immortal and eternal life.

There is a story of will that goes like this: Once, years ago, a baby came into this world crying tearlessly as its first action. It soon became aware of the sounds of crying voices coming from another source. People were mourning an old man who died at the moment the baby was born. During the course of the night, the newborn spoke with the deceased in a dream. The baby, pondering this course of events, inquired, "When I came into this world I cried, not because I wished to but because I had to. The doctor said that it was necessary to open my lungs to cause the exhalation that produced the sound of crying. The Buddhists say that it is a sad thing to be born into this world. But why are living persons crying for a dead man like you?"

The deceased responded clearly, "The people who are crying are those who own either my blood or my will."

The baby then questioned, "Why did no one cry for me when I came into this world?"

The dead person looked searchingly at the baby and explained, "See the blood that you are bringing into this world; someone needed to die in order for you to be born. The voice that you are crying with is the continuing voice of the one who has died."

"But why are you not crying for yourself? Are you not sad to be leaving this world?" the baby wondered aloud.

"I could not speak a word when I exhaled my last breath. All I have to say has been written in my will." replied the old man.

"Will you show me your will?" the baby pleaded.

"No, I cannot. You are not my blood. The will can only be obtained by those who have a blood connection."

Spurred on by the dream, the baby began searching for his crying voice, the blood-will he inherited. He found that from the sounds of ma-ma and ba-ba to readable words and manageable numbers, all wills are the same: written with letters and numbers. They vary only in the right to claim and the ways to apply. Generation after generation, drops of blood have expanded into rivers of blood; the wills of the blood-flowing-rivers have been written time and again in the same format acquired through the same process: the willful ability to interpret. Each will involves blood and willful exchange, and each exchange involves the death of an older generation, an older race/culture and the birth of a new generation, a new race/culture. Yet, the blood remains always the same. The format of these wills is forever changing with voices and names within the unchangeable sounds of male and female and with the symbols of letters and numbers. The sound transforms life as the symbols connecting the Ideal Image of God with the Realistic Land of countries.

——— End of Story ———

Get it? Could the baby have inherited the will through the family bloodline if he had belonged to the man's family? Not from the blood!

Consider this fact: In heredity, the oldest surviving records of ideas on the mechanisms of heredity are from the ancient Greeks. For example, Aristotle speculated that since blood perfused and nourished the organs of the body, procreation also must be via blood. He proposed that male semen was purified blood and that the female genetic contribution to the next generation was menstrual blood. However, these and other ideas made little or no contribution to the eventual development of our present understanding of heredity. After the Greeks, there was a 2000-year silence on the mechanisms of heredity. Genetics as a scientific discipline did not exist before the work of Gregor Mendel—in the middle of the nineteenth century.[3]

Therefore, the blood image must be a metaphor for something else. So, how does one get it, spiritual will? Hint: read the rest of the book on how to purify the 'blood' with Tao and Te.

I Ching/Genetic Code Summary

Purpose

Throughout the text in Door to All Wonders there are references to hexagrams of the I Ching and the Chinese characters that name or otherwise describe them. We have included these images in the chapters for reader reference along with the text. Because of this pervasive presence of I Ching underlying Taoist thought and culture, we are including a simple introductory summary of the I Ching structure—as well as its amazing correlation to recent discoveries and developments in modern science. This knowledge has practical applications, especially in the area of molecular biology, the genetic code, our DNA, and the subatomic world of quantum mechanics. This translates into significant power for our life, our spiritual experience and for the fulfillment of our evolutionary birthright.

For those of us who don't have an understanding of the workings of the I Ching or the modern science of genetics, some streamlined basics will be presented in this section. The intention is to give a sense of their basic structure and functions, just enough to appreciate their value and significance. It is not necessary to have extensive knowledge in order to benefit from reading the 'Door.'

In the Preface, Huang wrote: "… Tao Te Ching … The Text contains two sections. … He Shanggong (The Man-On-The-Riverbank), who was believed to be the reincarnation of Lao Tzu, divided the Text into 81 chapters. Numbers have always figured prominently in Chinese philosophy and symbolism. Tao Ching has 37 chapters and Te Ching is composed of 44. To assess this numerically, we see that three and seven is ten, and four plus four equals eight; together they are eighteen, or double-nine, which when multiplied equal 81 … the transformation of love and virtue into Pure-Person (the oneness between spirit-nine of pure soul and God's nine of pure spirit)."

We will not attempt to assess the system and symbolism of Chinese numerology in this introduction. But, we will help readers who haven't studied the I Ching to know some basic concepts of the structure and dynamics of the I Ching. The "double nines" are number designations (to be mentioned later) of two of the lines found in the trigrams of some hexagrams of the I Ching. There are different aspects in the process of reading the hexagrams; the lines are read from the bottom up. When reading the trigram aspect of the lines, the lower three lines are regarded as the Earth trigram and the upper three constitute the Heaven trigram. Each of the "double nine" lines referred to above is positioned in each of the two trigrams that make up the six lines of a hexagram.

Perspective

The roots of the Tao go back perhaps 20,000 years.[4] The legendary Fu-Hsi (Fuxi) is credited with compiling the ancient wisdom about 5,000 years ago. He created trigrams with broken and unbroken lines to represent the eight elemental forces of the universe and nature, and he arranged them in the famous eight-sided pakua figure (as seen in the Universal Tao logo).

Eight-sided Pakua with the Tai Chi Yin Yang symbol in the center.

By combining the eight trigrams as pairs of all the possible trigram combinations, he delineated the structure of the earliest version of the 64 hexagrams and the system that has come to be known as the I Ching. (See Fu-Hsi's table of the I Ching below.) The hexagrams were later rearranged and written down by King Wen about 3,000 years ago. This version was further refined by one of his sons, the Duke of Chou. Confucius and some of his disciples then edited the Chou version (and added more refinements) about 500 years later—during the time of Lao Tzu.

It may interest the reader to learn that the I Ching was recognized about thirty years ago as having the same mathematical structure as the genetic code.[5] Watson and Crick had correctly described the structure of DNA in 1953,[6] for which they received the Nobel Prize in 1962. We will also provide a simple non-technical summary for the matching structure of DNA, which correlates to the structure and dynamics of the I Ching.

In 1975, the wave character, the 'other half' of the DNA system was discovered—the half that is complementary to the material aspect. This implies that there is a universal system of communication between the cells operating at much higher speeds than the humoral or neural systems previously known. Ultraviolet frequency biosignals 'ride' on the spirals of DNA and activate specific codons[7] (biological information units in the 64-triplet code of DNA—analogous to the trigram combinations of the I Ching). This knowledge (as stated by Dr. D.A. Popp, discoverer of the wave character of DNA) leads us to the recognition that spirit can be transformed from matter, and matter only gains in significance through the spirit.[8] Thus, from the Taoist perspective, it seems likely that our spirit/consciousness can be cultivated to enhance the probability of the most beneficial possibilities in our lives.

I Ching Lines, Digrams, Trigrams and Hexagrams

The "I" in I Ching generally means change, transformation. There is also an ancient definition in Chinese that defines it as 'generating new life.' This latter meaning is useful to keep in mind in correlating the structures and dynamics of the I Ching and the genetic code, DNA.

Tao in manifestation is represented as the interchange of two interrelated primordial phases, yin and yang. In the I Ching system of representation, yin is characterized as a feminine, receptive, contracting quality of energy and is shown as a broken line (— —). Yang is the complementary component and is a masculine, donative (giving), expanding energy represented as an unbroken line (——). In the binary number system, yin and yang is represented as (0,1) or also written as (0,L)—which is great for computer analysis, etc. The yin/yang aspects, or tendencies, of energy, are not isolated as opposites, but rather, are conceived as being interrelated and working harmoniously for their common good. They are poles of an interconnected continuum of changing proportions, shifting by degree in relationship to each other. Thus, they are denoted as polarities of a whole, rather than as dualistic and separate opposites.

Explaining the methodology and practice of the I Ching, Confucius said, "In 'I', there is Tai Chi (great void), which generates two poles, which generate four quadrants, which generate eight octants." The two poles are the yang (——) and yin (— —) lines. The quadrants are the digrams made up of combinations of pairs of yin and yang.

Digrams:

Old yin	Young yang	Young yin	Old yang
6	7	8	9

The digram number shown beneath each pair is the number that is assigned for that configuration as part of the divination process. The combinations of the two lines (poles) give rise to the double duality of the digrams—yin and yang furnish the basic duality or polarity, and one more line furnishes the additional duality of old and young.

Adding one more line to the digrams results in eight combinations of octants—trigrams.

Trigrams:

Ken	Sun	Li	Chien	Kun	Kan	Chen	Tui

Kan
Hexagram

When the paired combinations of all eight trigrams are configured, the result yields the 64 hexagrams of the I Ching. For example, combining two Kan trigrams results in the Kan hexagram. The eight hexagrams that pair two the same trigrams retain the same name as the individual trigrams, as in this example. Brief traditional texts—called 'Images,' 'Judgments' and 'Oracles'—interpreting the meaning and structure of the hexagram have been appended to the hexagrams. The I Ching is capable of self-description and self-renewal and has a built-in mechanism for avoiding absoluteness—it is a Relativity Theory on a grand scale.

I Ching Divination Process

The I Ching is perceived as a 'world formula' consisting of 64 possible hexagrams that symbolize all states of being, or tendencies of energy orientation. Energy transformations occur in the unending flow of changes in life from the microcosmic through the macrocosmic levels of existence. Likely possibilities and probabilities of the outcomes of change may be ascertained—based on relevant variables present in a 'snapshot' of experience at a given moment in time. These possibilities and probabilities are arrived at through the 'oracular,' or divination, process in association with the appropriate hexagrams. This conception is the theoretical basis for describing the dynamics of the Tao in creation. It is the underpinning of Chinese mystical culture.

The sixty-four hexagrams of the I Ching can also be thought of as triads of digrams; that is, combinations of three of the four possible digrams. There are eight possible combinations of three broken/unbroken lines (resulting in trigrams as seen above). In addition to reading the trigrams, the I Ching divination process includes reading the digrams and their interrelated influence within the hexagrams and in relation to related hexagrams. Likewise, it reads the significance of individual lines in the context of a specific hexagram and related hexagrams. [Please refer to Appendix II for a complete listing of the hexagram configurations and Richard Wilhelm's translation of their names.]

The divination process serves to narrow the focus of probabilities and possibilities of transformations and outcomes—which can never be permanent and final, but only relative in nature. This is so, because—as Einstein has reminded us with his formula, $E=mc^2$—even solid matter is a state of energy. The elements of the I Ching hexagrams represent 64 dynamic states of tension between the opposites of yang and yin in maintaining a particular state. At some point in the dual polarities, yang changes to yin and yin changes to yang, and the states of energy change.

DNA Notes, Basic Concepts and Vocabulary

The biggest biological success story is the elucidation of how in-*form*ation becomes form. How genetic information flows, or how genes act, has been called the new paradigm of biology. We present here some basic concepts and vocabulary of current knowledge of genetics. Readers may take heart and be inspired with a sense of the practical probabilities of immediate benefits that one may influence in the genes. The principles of divination referred to above—which are determined as statistical probabilities and possibilities based on known variables and with considerations of chance and luck—also apply in the realm of genetics. Genes do not work in a vacuum, but interact with the environment at many levels in producing a phenotype (the expressed form of a character). The relationship of genotype to phenotype across an environmental range is called the norm of reaction.

DNA is the common information storage and expression system for most organisms on the planet. It is a system in which information flows from DNA to RNA to protein. DNA is the informational basis underlying all the processes and structures of life. The DNA—DeoxyriboNucleic Acid—molecule has a structure that accounts for two of the key properties of life, reproduction and generation of form. DNA is a double-helical structure whose inherent design is such that it can be replicated to make two identical copies. DNA replication is the basis for all reproduction, cellular and organismal. So DNA can be viewed as the thread that connects us with all our evolutionary ancestors. Furthermore, DNA generates form because a code that contains the instructions for building an organism is written into the linear sequence of the building blocks of a DNA molecule. We can view this as information, or "that which is necessary to give form."

DNA works in virtually the same way in all organisms. Most genes code for some type of protein: either active proteins such as enzymes or proteins that play a structural role in cells. A major landmark occurred in 1953: James Watson and Francis Crick proposed a double helix model for DNA structure. It showed that DNA could replicate by progressive unwinding of the two intertwined strands of the double helix and using the exposed strands as templates for new synthesis. Each one of the two intertwined strands of DNA is a chain of chemical groups called nucleotides, of which there are known to be four types.

Each type is composed of a phosphate group, a deoxyribose sugar molecule, and any one of the four bases—adenine (A), guanine (G), cytosine (C), and thymine (T). Two of the bases, adenine and guanine, have a double-ring structure characteristic of a type of chemical called purine. The other two bases, cytosine and thymine, have a single-ring structure of a type called a pyrimidine. Because proteins are strings of amino acids, a specific nucleotide sequence of DNA (a gene) contains coded information for specifying amino acid sequence and hence protein structure.

In the process of protein synthesis, RNA is a mediator between DNA and the resulting protein. In the code for RNA—which reflects the properties of DNA from which it is derived—the base letter T (thymine) is replaced by U (uracil). A phalanx of ribosomes moves along the mRNA (m = messenger), each starting at the 5′ end and proceeding along the entire length of the mRNA to the 3′ end. As a ribosome moves along, it "reads" the nucleotide sequence of the mRNA three nucleotides at a time. Each group of three, called a triplet codon, stands for a specific amino acid. Since there are four different nucleotides in mRNA, there are 4 x 4 x 4 = 64 different possible codons. These codons and the amino acids they stand for are shown in the figure, "Table of the Genetic Code."

The combinatorial arrangement of triplets of digrams corresponds precisely to the way that the combinations of three bases in DNA generate amino acids in living cells. The four digrams that combine in three's to form hexagrams are analogous to the four bases, which combine in three's to form genetic 'codons.'

DNA is composed of two side-by-side chains ("strands") of nucleotides twisted into the shape of a double helix, like a spiral staircase, with the strands running in opposite directions. In the double-stranded DNA molecule, the two backbones are in opposite, or antiparallel, orientation. The two chains are bound together by the pairing of specific bases: A with T and G with C. The bases of DNA interact according to a very straightforward rule, namely that there are only two types of base pairs: A-T and G-C. The bases in these two base pairs are said to be complementary. This means that at any "step" of the stairlike double-stranded DNA molecule, the only base-to-base associations that can exist between the two strands without substantially distorting the double-stranded DNA molecule are A-T and G-C.

At the end of replication of a DNA molecule, two molecules result. Each of these is a hybrid consisting of one of the parent strands intertwined with one newly synthesized strand, hence the term semiconservative. The coded information in the nucleotide sequence must be translated in groups of three nucleotides for each amino acid. In 1966, the complete genetic "dictionary" of all 64 possible triplet-coding units (codons) and the specific amino acids they stand for was deduced. Subsequent studies in many organisms showed that the double-helical structure of DNA, the mode of its replication, and the codon dictionary are the same in virtually all organisms, whether plants, animals, fungi, or bacteria. ["Notes"—gleaned from Modern Genetic Analysis.]

By letting the above-mentioned nucleotide bases T (or U), C, G and A be expressed by the digrams of the I Ching—this correlation, if substituted in the "Table of the Genetic Code," yields the same 64 hexagrams of the I Ching. Thus, the correlations are as follows:

Concluding Comments

For the sake of brevity, the presentations of both the I Ching and the Genetic Code were grossly oversimplified and superficial. The purpose was to provide a sense of the validity and significance of the I Ching for the uninitiated reader, since it is referred to often in the text. Likewise, due to the tremendous advances in genetic science, it is inspiring to have a sense of how we come to be the way we are. Consequently, it may also support us in our practices to know that we really do have the capability to profoundly influence our health and evolution. By getting the good biosignals humming and riding up and down those spiral stairways in our DNA, activating those good codons in our cells, transforming spirit from matter, and at the same time enhancing the quality and significance of our physical being—who knows what limits we may transcend!

That's it! This is as far as we go in the discussion of the correlation between the I Ching and the genetic code. The key to the structure and dynamics of life in our genes is the same as the I Ching's 64 dynamic states of tension between the polar opposites of yin and yang. It is the same as the wisdom, the cosmology of the world, embodied in the I Ching that was compiled 5,000 years ago by Fu-Hsi. Except that the I Ching has been further refined and enhanced by spiritually achieved sages who followed in the millennia since Fu-Hsi. By comparing the charts of Fu-Hsi's hexagrams and the Genetic Code's triplet codons, feel a sense of awe for the beauty and power of truth in the microcosm in each of the trillions of cells in your body. As well, sense the polar connection with the complementary primordial Chi of the universe, the macrocosm.

Be like Niels Bohr, one of the godfather's of the modern science of the subatomic world—quantum physics. The result of his work and others has confirmed the dual polarity nature of the wave/particle reality in the subatomic realm of existence. After he had already elaborated his interpretation of quantum theory—when he visited China in 1937, he was deeply impressed by the ancient Chinese notion of the complementarity of polar opposites, which paralleled his thinking. So much so, that when he was knighted in his native Denmark in 1947 in acknowledgement of his outstanding achievements—he chose the Tai Chi symbol and the inscription 'Opposites are complementary' for the motif of his coat-of-arms.[9] Create your own coat-of-arms in your body's consciousness in the core of your cells and manifest your body wisdom. The purpose of our Taoist practices is to enable us to be healthy, happy, conscious, evolving human beings and thereby be able to achieve life beyond life.

Meditation/Exercise. Huang talks about the presentation of practices in the 'Door' from his traditional perspective: "There are two exercises that belong to traditional practices, five animals and six sounds. The rest are conscious guiding practices that gear to awaken specific organs and parts of the body. From inner self to the highest virtuous gathering, the Tao of seed and the Te of virtuous love will become one, as if body and mind become one.

"I think that coming from the background where Master Chia has instructed in terms of exercises, it is a bit difficult to capture the exercise portion in the book. On the one hand, the presentation of exercises is sort of a reflection or revelation, and there are only two parts, or maybe three, which I just translated from the teachings of Hua Tue, one of the best known teachers in China; he is a Taoist and a Chinese doctor. The third one is from Master Chia's Fusion of Five Elements. In Taoist tradition, we only reveal half of the meditation exercise in a pure literal presentation. The other half depends on the quality of the master and the readiness of the student. The purer the energy the master has within, the more powerful the exercise will be.

"The most crucial part is that throughout Taoist history, there is no distraction or distortion upon the pure teachings, which are usually related to the specific location, the power of earthly Chi, and the personality of a master. Unless the student's background is cleaned, which has to do with family and social life, and unless he or she shows enough virtue and integrity, the teaching cannot be revealed. For example, I cannot reveal the exercise on Bigger Dipper unless s/he is under initiation and taking full responsibility for it. I cannot tell a person based on social or family hierarchy.

"The third most sacred part of the teaching has to do with timing, both the cosmic time and the readiness of micro-time within each person. Besides the micro and macro time factors, are the special influences of the Winter/Summer Solstice and the Spring/Fall Equinox. These yearly time periods of significance reflect the four time periods within a day, which are 11:00 to 1:00 am/pm and pm/am, and 5-7 am and pm. This has been summarized in the phrase: 'If you catch a day's time, you master the entire year.'

"The most intriguing situation is the trinity of three dantians (tan tiens) in our Taoist tradition. Because of the Chi that circulates between body and mind, and is independent by itself, there cannot be a single exercise for all. There is no such thing as an exercise that can open everything. This is why all the pressure points must be opened, and all the five levels of organs, skin, muscles, zang fu (glands), bone and bone marrow must reach a final completion before enlightenment can be achieved.

"Because the body is so complicated due to the ancestral illnesses and social conditioning—and because of the interaction between body and universe, particularly the inner planets and close stars out there—each exercise must be treated specifically. It can be handled only through consideration of an individual's quality. This is why in northern Taoist practices, we constantly use mind to guide the body, which generates movements or exercises as a result of experience. Also, when the two hearts reach oneness, you cannot tell which is which. This is the most difficult situation for me to explain—which part of the exercises are inherently Lao Tzu's and which parts are my own understanding or reflection upon his teachings—or revelation. All the italicized words or phrases or sentences appearing in the book belong to the Tao Te Ching.

"If readers or students have any questions, they must find or approach us directly in order to clarify the problems. We cannot just give them the meal and feed them at the same time. Only the right person can get the essential pictures of exercises. Or, if they are advanced enough, by reading the words, they get an energetic vibration right away. Then, they do not need exercises since the channels are opened already. The above are my suggestions and personal experiences according to our tradition. We never give everything away through words. If so, what do we have in order to live and exist and survive?"

Master Tao Huang's Bottom Line: "In Taoist tradition, I have only one background, it is in the power of Lao Tzu. He chose me, and made me as a faithful dog, a devoted slave, a heart-connected student. If you question the materials in the Door, go directly and ask Lao Tzu, and we will reach a mutual silence—the heart-connected, stomach-drumming and brain-smoked passage of the Tao."

Editor: Dennis Huntington has been practicing the Tao of Master Chia's teaching since 1986. He became a certified instructor in the Universal Tao in 1992, and then began teaching while living in Japan. He is now a resident instructor at the Universal Tao Training Center at Tao Garden Health Resort in Thailand. He returns to Japan regularly to teach, and he is Master Chia's liaison assistant for affairs in Japan. He moved to Tao Garden in 1998 to enhance his practice and teaching of the Tao. He also assists in the publishing area as a contributing writer and chief editor.

He had an inner voice experience when he was a young aviation electronics technician in the U.S. Navy. The inner voice experience itself excited his interest, and so did the message—to write a book. Before he came in contact with Taoist teaching per se, he conditioned himself with yoga practice. He experienced kundalini energy as a result of his hatha yoga and pranayama practice. When he began doing a simple form of meditation, he experienced the manifestation of the third eye, inner visual experience, out-of-body and dream experiences before he met any of his formal spiritual teachers in the physical body. He then practiced meditation of the inner light and sound current with the guidance of masters from India.

After studying electrical engineering, science and math as an undergraduate student, and after a brief stint as an IBM sales representative, he entered graduate school at San Francisco State University where he studied English, creative writing, and education. He taught high school English in Oakland, California. While teaching, he also became involved in the Bay Area Writing Project at the University of California at Berkeley for teaching writing. He later lived in Tokyo, Japan, and taught English as a Foreign Language before moving to Tao Garden.

Chapter I
Wordless Uttering Sound: Tao

求 道

Defining the Tao 道

The word Tao or Dao (pronounced dow) is no longer a strange term in Western society. Understanding its meaning is paramount to viewing the magnificence of the Cosmos, tapping into the mystery of the universe, and searching for the origin of nature. It encompasses the vast outer reaches of the universe, invisible, unfathomable and unreachable, yet retains its remoteness, ancient and untraceable. It is too irrational to conceive, too abstract to connote literally, mystic beyond comprehension. It remains forever silent, unaroused, sublimely peaceful. Before the Tao the voice can no longer lower its pitch, eyes can no longer project their curiosity, and movement is halted in its forward journey. The veil of its mystery cannot be pierced. Philosophy cannot define its elusive word. Science cannot magnify its potential. Technology cannot digitalize its incalculable number.

To define the Tao is to listen to the silence, observe the nakedness and activate the stillness. It can be likened to communicating with your inner voice, awakening your innate talent, finding a home with eternal beauty and releasing your full potential. There can then be no alienation nor intimidation of your ultimate power.

To define the Tao is to catch your breath, focus your attention, calculate and refine your action, move with care, and make friends with the enemy. The breath is life's inspiration, attention forms concentration, action results as meaning or consequence and stepping forward is the reward. As the enemy recedes in the shadow, the Tao permeates your aura.

To define the Tao is to stand on the highest mountain peak, swim in an ocean of love, and soar with the dove in the valley of death. It is to connect with the power. To sense the Tao is to stand in a cool spring shower; to view the Tao is to observe from a high tower; to smell the Tao is to breathe in a fragrant flower. It is to sleep peacefully behind a closed door, to peer through a window no more; to observe first the natural law, and to judge only the mind's intractable flaw.

To define the Tao can be anyone's individual response, but is no one else's business. To attempt to describe the Tao is a meaningless pursuit yet boundless in scope; to rationalize the Tao is futile; to reject the Tao is to render yourself powerless; to follow the Tao methodically is despairing; to know the Tao is to leave one breathless, to understand the Tao is to be deathless; to walk the Tao is to be weightless, to ignore the Tao is senseless.

To define the Tao is to chant with Lao Tzu, to laugh with Chuang Tzu, to analyze Confucius, to understand Buddha, to love Christ, to listen to Muhammad, to follow Moses, to watch the Above, and to embrace the Ultimate.

Tao can be expressed in many ways through our gifted power of communication. There are three forms of communication: oral, written and willful. Among these, oral communication is primary, resulting from the power of voice: the manifestation of inner consciousness and our spiritual trumpet. Verbalization is our first approach to living an independent life, finding the gateway to the Tao through the breath of life and vibration of sound. At the time that oral communication no longer served our human needs and expectations, letters and numbers were employed symbolically, marking the beginning of civilization as a cultural process.

Embracing these two, the voice of will becomes the most powerful force reaching from one person (dead or alive) to the multitudes: the collective will. This sacred passage permits the self to be expressed, to touch hearts, to justify morality and verify deeds accomplished. Our inner justice is profoundly different from the legal practice of justice for the sake of justice. It is a direct spiritual communication that goes beyond ego-anticipation and social-culture, an actualization process of human willpower.

Lao Tzu, the Superior Master Lao Jun, is forthright in his teachings of Tao Te Ching, stating that the Tao that is voiced is no longer that of eternal Tao. The name that is given is no longer that of eternal name. The Tao that is voiced defines the origin of the universe through subjective expression. This is, in essence, the communicable Tao of inner self that connects deeply to both our microbiological and psychological self as well as our macrocosmic and celestial self. The name that has been written extensively objectifies any subjective expression of this inner voice. Anyone who has reached her/his prime can verbalize and name. Upon dying, the voice and name are extinguished by the will enabling the person to enter into immortal and eternal life.

Inner Voice 心聲

Inner voice is the most sacred spiritual vessel. Without this inner voice, God is not alive, the Tao is not present, and the self is not active. This inner voice expresses and characterizes the beauty, the meaning and the strength of life. It is sometimes silent to the degree that there is no focal point while at other times it is immeasurably powerful. Yet, we often turn a deaf ear to this inner voice, refusing to abide by it or even give it credence. We choose instead to rely on an external world, that of authority and discipline, to define our life as something meaningful, leaving us with confusion and distortion of the true meaning.

Fig.1.1 When the hands, heart and mind are unified, the inner voice speaks itself.

In order to establish a clear relationship with this sacred vessel, the first set of meditation practices in this book begins with finding, restoring and listening to this inner voice in any given crisis. The exercises are:

1. Listen intently to the sound of silence: a combination of spiritual voice and personal voice.
2. Pay attention to the most immediate direction and clear message: the manifestation of your inner voice.
3. Verbalize it inwardly, whether or not it makes sense to you.
4. Name it with no preconceived notion.
5. Meditate upon it as a part of the visionary journey of your life before it actually takes place.
6. Connect your own name with it. See how it conforms to you and your personality.
7. Make it work for you. It is the divine plan and your decision must be made now.

Incommunicable Tao

We have discussed the first part of Lao Tzu's first two sentences: the Tao that is voiced and the name that has been written. The second part of the two sentences warns us that the eternal Tao cannot be voiced and the eternal name cannot be written. It deminstrates to us also that what has been voiced can never be the eternal Tao, and what has been given or written can never be the eternal name. The Eternal Tao can never be expressed completely and comprehensibly. The moment the mind's intention joins with the focus of the heart, the Tao becomes lost. The mouth cannot express an image, a colorful vision or an awareness of the total environment while simultaneously penetrating the very subtle fine line. It is for this reason that voicing the Tao will automatically and instantly disconnect from the eternal Tao. When an inner message is verbalized, the speaker is lost and the listener will interpret the received message according to whatever s/he may hear, desire or wish. The eternal name is thus lost.

Before something is named, it is subjected to how the observer regards it. Before Lao Tzu used the word Tao, many other words may possibly have been chosen. When something is named, changes occur due to its very nature or the nature of its creator or user. Thus, the word Tao has become a fixed word with fixed meaning, far and away from Lao Tzu's initial vision, and it is forever changing. This is why Tao has had many names, God has many names and we have many names. What has been expressed is not that which can be further described. No matter how hard we try, we are bound to fail.

Connection In-Between

Between the mind and the heart, mouth and hand, the communicable and incommunicable Tao, are three bridges we must navigate: the inner voice, the mutual connection and the use of language. The first, the inner voice, is exemplified by the baby's voice.

There is no thinking or reasoning involved; only the sound of the voice. It is the soul of the Tao, the true innermost spirit of that person at that moment in that particular place and in that state of mind. The second bridge is the mutual connection between the speaker and the listener in the state of agreement and/or understanding. It can be linked by either verbal or nonverbal form. When two people hold an international phone conversation it is not the content that matters but the continuous connection between them. Advertising serves a similar purpose in that it is neither the truthfulness of the message nor the quality of the products, but the securing of a mass connection: the truth between demand and supply.

The third bridge is in the use of language. When the expression is carried with clear and defining language, there will be no misunderstanding. The information is clear, as is the understanding of the listener, successfully serving the purpose of the construction and usage of language. When two people attempt to communicate using two different languages, their words sound like distinctive animal voices, incomprehensible to one another.

Usefulness of In-Between

Throughout the history of human civilization—the course of mental objectification—we have evolved from the use of a single voice to the many faceted forms of oral, written and the digital-computerized audio-visual communication. It is remarkable to realize that we are now, in effect, moving backward. We simplify the use of language and shorten the spatial distance in presenting the spiritual communication by means of global telecommunication. The methods have changed dramatically, but not the source. We remain as we are. Each momentary flash of an idea differs from other moments, and each individual idea differs from others, yet all the ideas are but the manifestation of mind through the expression of soul being guided by spirit. The eternal, invariable, unwavering, enduring and unchanging Tao is beyond expressing.

How could we then know? Only through our own peace and desire can we open ourselves to its ever-presence. When we have peace and serenity, we capture its subtlety. While attracted and seduced by the passion of desire, we experience its manifestation as we distinguish it as individual or personal, always limiting it within our own boundaries. When we are relaxed and free from passion and excitement, we see beyond the futile pursuit of games being played. To be engaged in the passion and excitement of the game being played out is a deviation from our connection with the center and balance. We are divided when we enact our little scenarios.

We become as two: being and non-being, birth and death, beauty and ugliness, good and bad. Being and non-being give birth to each other; difficulty and ease complete each other; long and short measure each other; high and low overflow into each other, voice and sound harmonize with each other; and before and after follow each other. This is how the world is harmonized in great accord. This ancient teaching enables us to become non-judgmental, non-prejudicial and indistinguishable.

"In-between" these two lies the hidden mystery. The mystery within the mystery is the door to all wonders. This mystery is where the center, the medium and the equilibrium embrace, balance and unify from both sides and both ends, while maintaining the middle ground. It is where the emulation, competition and perfection face their extremes and opposites in a peaceful manner, and where beauty and ugliness no longer appear attractive or repulsive, where good and bad are no longer distinctive.

Nature of the Tao 自然之道

In order to understand the nature of Tao we must first define nature itself since Tao takes its origin from Nature. Taoists define nature as: "I don't know why it is so, and I don't know why it is not so; I cannot make it such, and I cannot make it not such." The first part speaks of human comprehension and understanding while the second encompasses human ability and capability. An example would be that a human is neither completely human nor even human. In Jungian psychological interpretation, a male necessarily harbors the co-existence of the masculine persona and the shadow of anima. Similarly, a female inherits within her persona the feminine as well as the shadow of animus. This is the mutual existence and transformation of their yin and yang characteristics.

The second part of the definition places the human mind and its capacity in a very natural position. For example we can neither change a mountain into a river or a river into a mountain. We cannot prevent a mountain from expanding, as the Himalayas have done, nor can we renew the ravaging effects of wind and storm on its surface. In conclusion, in defining nature we can make known a changing connection with it, but we cannot actually change its true nature. Consequently, we can neither know nor name the ineffable Tao. Lao Tzu has explained succinctly that Tao is eternally nameless, is praised but is unnamable.

Tao: Beyond the Senses

Tao is formless and functions in empty harmony. This empty harmony cannot be grasped by the senses. Our human eyes and ears and hands are rendered helpless in this endeavor. Look into it, and there is nothing to be seen. Listen to it, and there is nothing to be heard. Use it, but its use is inexhaustible. When the Tao is spoken, it is very plain, with no excitement and no stimulation. It is close to silence and has no flavor at all. How can we become excited about silence or sense that which is beyond the senses?

Knowing of the Origin of the Tao: Thus

As Lao Tzu reluctantly chooses the word Tao to describe and share his great wisdom and insight, his direction leads him to an illumination of the origin of the Tao. From thus, as is explained in chapter 21, he knows the substance and the self-functioning Tao that inexhaustibly creates all things in their beginning, is the very ancestor of myriad things in the world. Although not knowing whose son it is, Lao Tzu is certain that it stands preceding the Heavenly Emperor. Rephrased in chapter 62, Lao Tzu realizes that by seating and entering thus, Tao is the conductor of all things: the treasure of the good and the protector of the bad. By not rejecting or judging what is good from what is bad, he is not desirous of being presented with jade in front of the team of four horses but rather of having without asking and forgiving the wrong doing.

What is "thus"? It is awareness of self and universe by being one with the creative force and seeing through what is limpid, after blunting the sharp edge, unraveling the tangles, husbanding into light and being as ordinary as dust. Seeing through that which is limpid is analogous to entering into the realm of the kingdom of light. Blunting the sharp edge means diminishing all the desires of heart. Unraveling the tangles is dissolving and clarifying the constant puzzles generated by mind.

When the body returns to its infantile stage and mind is completely cultivated, one is with the limpid light. In Taoist tradition this light embraces both universal light and bodily light through the transformation and purification within the trinity of Jing, Chi and Shen. According to modern quantum theory, photons or particles of light, have the ability to share their existence mutually. Electrons, on the other hand, have the ability to exclude each other from entering their territory. When sexual electrons and light photons are joined, their union is transformed into golden elixir. This is the meaning of husbanding into light. As the spirit enters its limpid state, the body returns to its original quality: dust.

Lao Tzu is aware that the substance of Tao seems boundless and unfathomable. Since the substance of Tao is not a concrete form, it cannot be perceived symbolically other than in the symbolic sense. As unfathomable and boundless as it seems, there is form in it. It can be said that its form is the form of the world: the image appears but is not yet apparent. Still this form seems boundless and unfathomable, there exists matter in it. The matter looks embryonic and dark, there is essence (Jing) within. The essence is very pure and complete, and there is trust in it. Because of this trust, from now to the days of old, its name never dies even though its name cannot be defined in human terms.

From substance to form, from form to matter, from matter to Jing, and from Jing to trust, it is as though we are viewing an object from a satellite or under a microscope. First, when we concentrate on the outer formation of the world (the substance of Tao), we picture a great body of land, our continent (form). From this continent, we focus on a country or region (matter). From the region, an object (essence), such as a license plate, can be pinpointed and projected. The object is pure and complete. As we examine this same object under a microscope, the space of its substance appears larger and larger. Its mass accumulates until it becomes the substance of Tao that forms the chaos of macro/micro-chaos. Being as large as it is and as small as it is, it remains pure and limpid, yet ineffable and immutable.

What more do we need other than the trust of the object itself? It is this very trust that connects Lao Tzu's heart with the origin, the substance and the self-functioning of the Tao. Lao Tzu foregoes human comfort in order to have a trusted connection with the Son of the Heavenly Emperor. He denies himself the comfortable life that can necessarily hold but one future: death. He gives up his mind—the real exhaustive device of life force and himself—the identity of ego and illusion of mind. What he ultimately receives is thus. Nothing more than thus and nothing other than thus. What an enormous, powerful and all-consuming thus this is!

Tao functions in its empty harmony. Harmony is where and how the matter of the Tao produces, promotes, regenerates and renews itself in its constantly full state. Since the action of the Tao is in its non-formed state, or emptiness, its best harmony is within itself where nothing is yet produced and nothing can be lost. It also remains in its constant fullness, wholeness and completion by preserving its unused and potential perfection. When used, it remains full. Even as the Tao is producing, promoting, preserving and regenerating at the same time, it utilizes both heaven and earth as its strawdogs (scarecrow) in order to conceive its formless state of oneness: nothingness. It functions in its weakness and infinity by preserving its fullness and perfection. This source is undoubtedly the very ancestor of the myriad things.

It is equally important to note that Tao moves by returning. As we know, all things under heaven are born of being. Being is born of non-being. Being forms the creatures that result from the process of the Tao to one, one to two, two to three, and three to all things. Therefore, the Tao of oneness is the very Tao of oneness, and the Tao of all things is the very Tao of all things. This is why we have the Tao of heaven, the Tao of earth, the Tao of human beings, the Tao of plants and animals, and the Tao of sand and rocks. This is why competition of any sort has no value or reality; it is nonexistent in the scheme of things.

In our modern society, we have evolved from animal-eating predators into self-striving competitors. The gains and losses conceal each other; master and slave thrive on each other; wandering souls and hungry ghosts abound between heaven and earth. Stress is the consequence of our society, anxiety is the tactic employed, and loss of self-esteem is the price we pay. Unless the awakened mind is re-centered, the soul restored, kindness (Te) enriched, the self, individually and collectively, will never survive.

Remember the word "return" reminded by the action of "returning": body to its destiny, mind to its creativity and spirit to its oneness. Humankind is returning to earth since humanity takes its origin from earth. Earth is returning herself to heaven since earth takes her origin from heaven. Heaven is returning itself to the Tao since heaven takes its origin from Tao. The Tao is returning itself to Nature since Tao takes its origin from Nature. This is the ultimate reality: returning is the cornerstone of being Taoist. Only through this practice can we find the way, the one direction, the means to returning to our youth, our birth, our source, becoming one with the Tao. This is the unwavering path leading to the door of mystery where we will join and be the son who is exceeding the Heavenly Emperor.

Returning

In Taoist inner alchemy, the empty harmony refers to the Cinnabar Field or Cauldron where elixir is refined. Cinnabar initially represents the raw reddish stone used by outer alchemists in the process of refining golden elixir. The cauldron is a cooking vessel used by the outer alchemists, while the inner alchemists define it as the empty center area in the abdomen. It contains the golden elixir crystallized from yin and yang Chi between the body/mind and universe. The yin Chi is in the valleys of the earth and kidneys in the human body, while yang Chi is in the entire cosmos and human mind. The yin (water) Chi in our body comes from the bladder, ovaries/testicles and prostate gland; whereas the yang (fire)

Chi in our consciousness and spirit arises from the heart and mental awareness. When these two kinds of Chi (called Kan and Li) are unified to form harmonious action, golden elixir is produced.

Fig. 1.2 Three Tan Tiens

The Taoist returning practice is that of fusing these two energies. The key to this is to empty the fullness of mind through emptying of the heart. To take this one step further, returning means not following any outward or worldly direction. This applies as well to sexual urges, common to us all. We need to practice returning sexual energy to the chest as selfless love, and to the brain as spiritual wisdom. For the male, no loss of such precious sexual energy means no regret and no violence. For the female, when the menstruation or the blood of sea is absent, the virgin state returns, the light returns, and power returns. This is what we refer to as returning to oneness: the original consciousness, the original love and original gut awareness as one. Without returning to this sacred-state, life is lost, the dream is lost and the spirit is lost.

There are Taoist practices for cultivating, conserving, recycling (inward and upward instead of down and out of the body), and refining sexual energy within the body.

Fig. 1.3 Learn to circulate your Chi in the Microcosmic Orbit to assist mastery of semen retention and transformation of sexual energy.

These practices enrich the quality of one's life and fuel the process of spiritual "returning." This can be achieved in the context of celibacy, sexual monogamy or multiple partners—depending on the individual and circumstances. The key is to merge sexual energy with loving compassion.

Bellows – Function of the Tao

Since the Tao is all-pervading, it operates on both the left and the right. It fuses into every corner at all times with full anticipation. Yet it occupies no space, holds no form. It is like the emptiness inside the hub that makes the vehicle useful even though it is connected with spokes. It is like the hollowness that makes the vessel useful even though the vessel is molded and colored. It is like the empty space that makes the room useful even though it is framed with windows, doors, and walls. This Tao is also like the water flowing in the river, creating both the river flow and its supporting bed. It embraces both the mountain breast and ocean valley. The flow of the river facilitates, energizes, operates all things existing on either side by providing the power of not-having, not-occupying, not-attaching and not-framing.

This form of spatial-energized operation is metaphorically described by Lao Tzu as a bellows. Whether the matter is leading or following, strengthening or weakening, enhancing or destroying, the bellows is the same regardless of what passes through its empty space. A bellows contains nothing. Its usefulness develops with the working relationship between what has been put in and what will then be expelled. Yet, if the input is slow and weak, nothing will be produced. When the force is too fast or too hard, it does not maximize the wind flow and could destroy the usefulness of the bellows. The secret to this practice is gentleness, steadiness and consistency. The bellows can accurately and clearly represent the flow of life: one side for the input of the Tao of life and its masculinity, and the other side for the output of the Te of love and its femininity. The two sides are constantly merging yet standing alone to generate their harmonious flow.

Fig. 1.4 We inhale the power of Tao into our life and return it with the virtue of Te.

Bellows-Like Meditation

Meditation is, in a sense, expanding our mental space into the vastness of the universe. Human life and its existence on this planet depend on creating and discovering the most useful space to occupy, then utilizing it fully and gratefully. When a person finds a suitable space, they will survive and live a long life. This space can be both physical and mental: a good physical space implies a good location, good living conditions and a good business opportunity while a good mental space must have the capacity for flexibility, allowance and acceptance. These two are equally important and often difficult to occupy, expand and preserve.

During our lifetime we are all granted a natural space in which to dwell and make our life meaningful, enabling us to realize a dream to make the heart joyful, and delight the spirit. Living in this environment we can exercise our kingship within our own precious kingdom.

In meditation practice we utilize the bellows—the three precious spaces—within our body. The first bellows is the function of lungs, the working breath of life. The second bellows is the perineum, the gate to all-sea-flow. The third bellows is the third eye, the opening gate to the reality of mystery. Conscious breathing is the proper means to effect this procedure.

1. Breath-Related Problems: An array of chronic problems existing in the chest area and brain—bronchitis, chest pain, tightness of shoulders, poor digestion, neck pain, sleep problem and more—are the result of poor or improper breathing. If you are experiencing a sleep disorder and desperately desire a good sleep, lie on your back, place one foot over the other, and cross your hands on your chest. Close your eyes and concentrate on your breath. As you listen to your breathing, you will soon drift into a deep and restful sleep. Before you realize it, it will be morning. You will generate more productivity within this creative environment with less time and effort.

Fig. 1.5 Breathing into the dream of healing and empowerment (The position of hands and feet are opposite to each other. If you are right handed, place the left foot on the top of right one, and vice versa.)

2. Perineum: If you have lower back problems, constipation, frequent urination, poor or irregular menstruation and urination, and other related problems you must pay attention to the perineum pressure point. It is the key to a happy, healthy and energetic life. Kneel down with toes in standing position. Bow forehead to the floor and place hands together flat on the floor in front of the brain. Take a deep breath and contract the perineum and muscles as firmly as possible. Hold the breath and retain the contracting position for as long as possible. Then release quickly. Relax for a few seconds allowing the breath to run smoothly. Then begin the second phase of breathing using the same technique. Practice this for at least fifteen minutes. This exercise can also be done whether standing, sitting or lying down.

Fig. 1.6 Connecting to the earth mother.

You may experience pain in all related muscles, joints or organs, as healing commences. Pain is the first step in healing.

When the lower part of the body is fully open and relaxed, the entire back, neck and brain will become open and relaxed. You are becoming your own best doctor. The benefit of this exercise is beyond measure. Your appreciation of yourself and your life will expand as you continue this practice.

Fig. 1.7 Drawing the energy into the body.
Inhale, hold breath, contract perineum area. Release and relax.

3. Third Eye: In order to open your third eye and expand your consciousness in both waking and dreaming states, practice the following. Kneel, bend your head forward with hands flat on the floor and tap the forehead on the floor in rapid momentum. You may experience temporary pain and dizziness. That is a prelude to the joy that will ensue. When you no longer experience pain when following this practice, the spiritual eye is ready to open.

   You then focus on the pituitary gland. Inhale and mentally gather the cosmic light into the pineal gland through the yang third eye in the middle of the forehead. As you exhale, visualize the energy being condensed and sent forth to the yin third eye at the crossing-point between the two eyes. You may visualize numbers flashing on your mental screen as you count your breaths. When you are able to see a white dot, the cosmic door is ready to open. This is the key tool in Taoist healing diagnoses. When you develop this ability, you will learn to see and read illness.

Fig. 1.8 Receiving the light from within.

The tranquility of the valley-spirit of the mystical female is the mother that creates the root of heaven and earth. Without tranquility, the source of Tao cannot be retained, the seed of pre-creative force cannot be nourished and the process of creation cannot be grounded. The Valley is the base upon which the land and mountains sleep. This valley of tranquility is the mystic gate that stimulates the dreaming wanderers and adventurous actors and actresses. It provides the echoing wall that responds and resonates honestly to original voices. It is the abyss that receives the power of penetration, and it is the graveyard that lays to rest the fallen bodies and returning spirits. Its spirit never dies but is always filled with endless vitality. The light cannot expand it, the darkness cannot exhaust it, no action can burden it and affairs cannot alter it. It is constant, indestructible, always there, ready to receive, respond, retrieve, refresh, regenerate and reenergize.

In the very beginning, Lao Tzu instructs us that the door of all wonders is the mystery within the mystery, the mother of the universe. He experiences this by engaging in simple practices such as closing the mouth and nose and taking sustenance from the mother source—not his biological mother but the mother of the world. He promises that although the body dies, there is no harm. He uses two analogies for mouth and door (nose): narrow and broad. The explanation of narrow suggests that when the mouth is closed, there can be no disclosure of information. When you know yourself, no explanation of your being is necessary. No one in this world understands yourself better than you do. Those who know don't speak and those who speak don't know.

The broader explanation is that there can be no outward flow of Chi. When the earthly door or sexual organ is withheld, when the heavenly gate—the mind's eye—is inwardly preserved, there is a conservation of spiritual force. By closing your mouth and shutting the door, there can be no wearing down of life. When opening the mouth and pursuing your affairs, life cannot be preserved. When the mouth (or mind's eye) is closed, and nose (or earthly door) is pinched closed, one sees what is small. Seeing what is small is discernment. Through discernment, one can preserve subtlety.

Preserving subtlety is having strength within. By utilizing this strength, one can draw on the light for discernment. When the center of the body is preserved, eternity becomes apparent.

Water: Symbol of the Tao

What is the model of being one with oneself; how does one lose his selfishness? Water is the answer. Water provides the life force for all creatures. It nurtures them, satisfies them, sacrifices itself, and once again purifies itself. Water, on earth, is life. Nothing can live nor complete its journey without water. This is the power and virtue of water. This is the material that resembles most closely the nature of the Tao.

Water is soft and gentle; nothing can compete with it. It occupies more area than anything on the face of the earth does. Water is weak and pliable, yet nothing can fight against its power since it remains proportionate as well as ageless. Water is clean and pure; nothing can contaminate it since it purifies other matter by purifying itself. Water is at peace with nature; nothing can surpass it as a tranquilizer, since its murky states are stilled by its inner tranquility. Water is inactive, yet nothing can be more active than water itself; it is everywhere, ceaseless in its wanderings. Water is noncompetitive, conquers all.

Water is always happy in its present dwelling place. Pouring as rain and drifting as snow, water travels endlessly through the seasons. Forming dews, storms and glaciers, existing as solid, fluid and steam, it continues its endless forms of processing. It washes away all toxic materials that harm living creatures. Being noncompetitive enables water to remain at peace at all times. Water joyfully speaks its true faith, but our poisonous understanding of it dispels its tranquil state. Water is content to follow its course, but our mismanagement of worldly affairs has diminished our course. Water acts in its own right time; we manipulate our affairs with an imaginative clock that destroys the natural rhythms of our bodies.

Water dwells within earthly creatures, and reveals itself as the largest substance on earth. There is no need to demonstrate, prove or dignify itself. The yielding strategy it employs enables it to be flexible, adaptable, and unattached by retaining its freedom. The ability with which it is endowed enables water to run along both sides of the stream or river, yet it remains unbiased in its singular mindset. It trickles or races on, embracing and returning to its destination with no need for refined strategy.

Lao Tzu concludes that nothing in the world is softer and suppler than water. When confronting strength and hardness nothing can overcome it. Using nothing simplifies. Using water overcomes strength. Using weakness overcomes strength. Everyone knows it, yet none can apply it. Following this, the sages' wisdom tells us: Whoever can bear the disgrace of the country is the ruler of the country. Whoever can bear the misfortune of the world is the ruler of the world.

Lao Tzu and the Tao 老子

On the Tao

Through the reverse process of regaining his youth by transforming his life force into spirit, Lao Tzu expresses that matter or existing material is formed from chaos, which precedes that of heaven and earth. Silently and formlessly, it stands alone, never changing. It is eternal, penetrating every area of the universe, never growing, never changing, and never dying. It enables itself the mother of heaven and earth. Lao Tzu said to himself*, I don't know what name it has. With reluctance, I pronounce it Tao and deem it to be great*. Great as it is, it remains at most a symbolic expression well beyond our mind's comprehension. Symbolically far-reaching, it penetrates the mind's spirit. Far-reaching becomes returning, like sky and ocean or earth merging seamlessly at the horizon, then returning to us. This Tao is truly great, and that of heaven is also great. That of earth is equally great. That of kingship is realistically great.

Lao Tzu is forming with great caution and meticulous care, the word Tao. Tao is Nature, which is wordless, nameless, formless and motionless. No one, not even Lao Tzu, can have a clear, concrete, precise and absolute definition of Tao. He is unable to summon up a portrayal because he believes that knowing that you don't know (everything) is superior. Not knowing that you don't know (ev- erything) is a sickness. He rationally states that the best he can do is to call it Tao. He is certain that it precedes the Heavenly Emperor even without knowing whose son it is. The word Tao is simply a sound uttered through Lao Tzu's mouth. He doesn't create it; he states it arbitrarily. Clearly, Lao Tzu must employ a sound or a word. When the right understanding appears, words disappear; they are no longer necessary. When the right spirit appears, understanding disappears. Which would you choose?

Lao Tzu defines himself by saying "people are calling me nature. "He is neither smaller nor greater than nature is. He furthers states that everyone in the world says I am great, great without parallel. Being without parallel is what enables greatness. If there is a long-standing parallel, it becomes small.

The following are other various self-defining descriptions from Lao Tzu:

1. I am desireless and without anticipation, like a baby who does not yet smile, gathering energy together, entering the abyss beyond the point of no return.
2. I am a fool at heart, as a water droplet is to the spring.
3. I am alone unintelligent.
4. I alone am dull and unsophisticated.
5. I alone maintain the living essence within. I alone stay with a unitary source, as if stubborn. I want to be wholly different from everyone else, by taking my sustenance from the mother source.

Discipline

I always have three treasures: first is compassion, second is frugality, third is to not act in front of the world. So compassion enables courage. Frugality enables abundance. Not daring to act in front of the world enables the mechanism to endure. Through compassion, fight and win; defend and be secure. When the heaven establishes itself, it relies upon compassion.

Teaching and Learning

Due to his heartfelt and wordless teaching method, Lao Tzu's words are easy to understand and simple to apply. They are easy and simple because they are plain, nothing further is to be seen or heard. Because this is so, his words are few and few people can understand them. He is precious and his teaching is precious; he wears shabby cloth but holds a treasure within.

Words have their origin and events have their master. By reaching the ultimate emptiness, concentrating on the central stillness, he found that all things work together. From this I observe their returning. He concludes that truthful speech seems paradoxical. Besides, being overly informed leads to exhaustion, and facile promises necessarily result in little trust. Because of the discrimination of this paradox, Lao Tzu comprehends the knowledge to walk in the great Tao and know there is no reason to be fearful. The only fear is what is other than that. This is the most profound paradox of life. It serves as a powerful spiritual awakening practice and self-realization practice as well.

Warning

Seeing what desire and ambition invite, Lao Tzu warns that I see clearly that those who want to take over the world and manipulate it do not succeed. No one can surpass the wonder of nature. The sacred mechanism of the world cannot be manipulated. Those who manipulate it will fail. Those who hold on to it will lose it. If Lao Tzu is right, the manipulation of scientific exploitation in its many various forms, including that of us, will necessarily bring about self-destruction. As the nuclear bombs and arsenals proliferate around the world, due to man's pursuit of profit and power, there could come a time of total self-destruction.

In regarding government, Lao Tzu asserts that the more prohibitions there are in the world, the poorer the people will be. The more and sharper the weapons the people have, the more chaotic the nation will become. The more know-how people have, the more bizarre things will appear. The more rules and demands that flourish, the more thefts there will be. Instead, just let people enjoy the food, appreciate the cloth, delight in customs, settle into their living conditions. The neighboring countries are in sight. The sounds of dogs and chickens are heard. People grow old and die without interference from each other. Spirits are calling, but bodies are at peace with nature.

The other warning sign Lao Tzu declares is that whenever people are afraid of death and are acting contrary, I will catch and kill them; who else can act so? People are generally not afraid. Whenever people are unafraid of death, how can killing be used as a threat?

If fear arises, it will be a great fear. As a result, nobody can kill the fear of a nation. People will protect themselves out of their own fear. As for himself, Lao Tzu is never fearful because he has no place to die.

Advice

To expand on the above paradox, Lao Tzu cautions using the right lawfulness to govern the country, using nonexpectancy to conduct the battle, using disengagement to take over the world. When I am inactive, people transform themselves. When I abide in stillness, people organize themselves lawfully. When I am disengaged, people enrich themselves. When I choose non-desire, people remain simple.

Chapter II
Sensory Perception

How We Perceive

To perceive is to be aware of our surroundings as stimuli by the means of senses. All living things from plants to insects and animals possess sensory abilities. Plant life carries the most simple form of perception, that of transforming water and light through minerals. All species of insects live on germs and viruses, whereas animals depend on their five sensory receptors to recognize, identify and utilize their needs. Plants and rocks are active inorganically or vegetatively. Deriving from their inherent abilities, animals have developed inter/intra-organic capacities in order to live actively and escape safely through their sensors. Their rudimentary abilities enable them to interact with the five sensors of eyes, nose, ears, tongue and skin. The human hands and feet as well as animals' claws and birds' wings, etc., are essential to their corresponding senses of sight, hearing, smell, taste and touch. Humans have also developed the ability to think and reason, to make and utilize tools. Although mankind is incapable of running as fast as jaguars, jumping as high as fleas, flying as high as birds or swimming as well as fish, we are the masters of sensory manipulation, making the most creative use of all things as well as the most destructive use.

Along with five senses, all animals possess souls or animal spirits of that intrinsic and independent power. Taoists call this form of spirit po, which is instinctive, vegetative, selfish and egoistic. Just as plant lives range from seasonal to perennial, animal spirits exist from cyclical to eternal. All animal spirits are cyclical, but the human spirits, being the most highly evolved, can reach the eternal. All animal spirits are self-protective since they must safeguard their own existence. Only human beings are consciously aware of their traits of selfishness and are willing to somehow extend this power beyond death. All animals are realistically selfish; only humans can sacrifice today for the benefit of tomorrow.

When a spirit/soul is regenerated into a physical body, it unifies its organic ability with the conscious ability to form ego: the master of the five senses. In the Taoist interpretation, ego, as a powerful and destructive sensory receptor, manipulates both the biological and instinctive awareness of po and the conscious and mental awareness of hun. The human conscious awareness perceives both the present reality (natural or cultural) and the projected reality (wished or planned). We define a natural presence (such as time) through a consciously perceived presence (such as a specific time of a day), and project it into a future outcome (such as predicting the weather).This is made possible through the interaction of the conscious spirit, the anticipating power, the make-believe of ego and the foreseeing and fear-controlling capability.

With spiritual discipline we become fully aware of the biological and receptive presence, the consciously perceived and planned presence, and the spiritually awakened and transcended presence. This is the presence of oneness, a composite of matter, force and the momentum of their interaction. This is the presence of spirit and its wisdom force. In spiritual manifestation, the world is not only perceived but perceivable as well. The perceived world is the realistic world we now inhabit. The perceivable world remains forever present and mystic. Therefore, in spiritual cultivation practice, the senses are organic and inorganic, biological and psychological, instinctive and conscious, egoistic and willful. Our sensory power represents the power of nature, mind, force, and matter.

Spiritual Sensitivity

Everything is perceivable as it is perceived; Nature in God's creation is perceivable and the Tao in life is a perceived journey. In spiritual discipline, everything has its intrinsic healing power. To perceive the power of each individual creature is exceedingly difficult because of its own sacred secrecy and interactive capacity. On the one hand, when the secrecy is open the sacred becomes manipulative. When an individual is isolated and becomes naked, plain is the presence and simplicity is the workstation. On the other hand, only when one is naked does one reveal its natural secrecy; only when there is no more magic visible does it conceal the true magic within: the gift of spirit. Between this paradox lies the nature of mind and faith, underlining the path of research and returning.

The mind steals as many natural things as possible by exploring their nakedness, disregarding each one's privacy, giving no credence to the nature of secrecy, and paying no respect to the beauty of simplicity. The scientific mind willfully and egoistically locks the door to any naked entrance through the possible reconstruction of elements and making the beautiful fruits of motherhood a profitable outcome. Equally alarming and tragic is the religious view of abandoning the body, the love and the flow for the sake of institutional practices, making the sacred power of church (body and son) deviate itself from its source, love and resource: the sacrificial power of mother.

The world begins with the mother as its source. When you have the mother, you know the son. The Mother is the undivided natural form of Maker, and her creative power is the mechanism of all creatures and their functions. Knowing this, the smallest and the subtlest particle of the seed and the son, the orphanage of your true self, is through your innate experience. This is the understanding of the science of each individual substance and its function, from images to ideas to structures and to numbers. This is the source of our mind's search, both realization and actualization, and our returning path.

Fig. 2.1 When the bodily parts work together, the spirit senses all.

So we must die, as the son and the sacred church, in order to return to the source. When you know the son, turn back to preserve the mother. Although the body dies, there is no harm. When you know your true self within, return to embrace your procreative mother, your divine source and your creativity. This is the meaningful duty of religious spiritual practice, returning to the original state by embracing the original undivided source. This is the spiritual discipline. Love lies within our receptive minds with our trembling sensations of oneness with God's love bestowed on each of us. Truth is not inside the monastery; it is inside our spirit. Faith is not within a teaching; it is the true magic of the world.

Together, the spiritual sensitivity will be established. There is no rejection of science before religious belief, and there is no denying spiritual faith before any experimentation. This is the message that Lao Zi has provided. This is the power of spiritual sensitivity.

Development of Five Senses

Fig. 2.2 Five Senses

Five senses are developed within the entire animal kingdom, coordinated through the primitive brain, or cerebral cortex. In humans, the term cerebral cortex describes the thick layer of gray matter encasing the cerebrum, just as fruit encircles its kernel. The cerebrum is the largest part of the brain, consisting of two hemispheres separated by a deep longitudinal fissure. It is the central authority for sensation as well as for all voluntary muscular activities. It is the seat of consciousness and the center of the higher mental faculties such as memory, learning, reasoning and emotions. It consists of four lobes: occipital lobe for visual association, parietal lobe for touch and taste, the temporal lobe for smell and hearing, and front lobe for the motor activities of thinking and reasoning.

All sensory activities governed by the cerebral cortex are centralized through the thalamus glands and executed through the limbic system—the name being derived from "limbus," the Latin word for "ring." This ringing system enables us to learn and to memorize. This ability is the conductor of sound and its vibrating frequencies, ensuring the person of the next breath, the next meal or opportunity. Prior to development of the limbic system, all species possessed a brainstem that encircled the top of the spinal cord and was poorly developed, particularly among fish and insects.

The brainstem, even more primitive than the limbic system, directs (as it is preprogrammed to do) the functions of breathing and metabolism. It controls our stereotyped reactions and movements as well. It is vital in maintaining our conscious wakefulness and alertness. The primary functions of life—heart rate, blood pressure, swallowing, coughing, breathing and unconsciousness—are charged by the brainstem. The alarm system in the brain, the reticulating activating system (RAS) consists of a reticular formation, subthalamus, hypothalamus, and medial thalamus—with hypothalamus serving the highest purpose of all. It contains many tiny clusters of nerve cells called nuclei monitors that regulate body temperature, food-intake, water balance, blood flow, sleep-wake cycle and the activity of the hormones secreted by the pituitary glands.

The brainstem, in Taoist practice, comprises the first storeroom of sexual energy as it rises through the spinal cord. It then further nourishes the pituitary gland and pineal gland in meditation practice at the second level: transforming Chi into Shen, then Shen into Emptiness and finally Emptiness into Tao. Its primary factor is its ability to regulate the hypothalamus gland. The meditators who fast long periods of time without sleeping are capable of unifying this gland by constantly drawing light into the brain and body through the pituitary gland.

By keeping the adrenal hormones at their lowest levels, the inner peace will remain undisturbed. In such a state, the sensory receptors that are controlled by the thalamus gland, with the exception of the olfactory, will consciously withdraw. Thus, breathing activity substitutes for the restfulness of visual and auditory function. In complete darkness, as is found within caves where the meditators engage in their highest form of practice, the visual and auditory abilities become ever more powerful. By drawing the unconscious light from the adrenal glands that are being charged by the primordial sexual energy, the mind sees the light and the inner ear hears the cosmic vibration within both the body/mind and the mother earth.

Mysteriously, the cave and the hollowness within the bones echo each other, making the cosmic vibration visibly meaningful through the conscious eye. The olfactory becomes the chief organ to supply the minimal energy needed for the body/mind. Thus the thalamus glands are actively shut down. The pituitary gland—the master gland for bodily hormones—becomes distilled by the exchange of energy in the body/mind needed for spiritual awakening power. The hypothalamus gland alternates peacefully, remaining in perfect balance between wakefulness and sleep. The pineal gland, secreting melatonin to control the subtle bodily rhythms, is alternated by the vibration of earth and the scanning light, no longer being driven by the instinctive drive from adrenal power and conscious awareness of the thalamus gland. In this state, wakefulness is a dreaming state and dreaming consciousness is awakening consciousness. They become the functions of spiritual stars and planet earth, rather than the rotating power of the earth, the sun and the moon. This state is the final stage of the returning process on earth.

With the development of the brainstem, the emotional or adaptive center emerges, enabling the body to function more actively both organically and emotionally. The root word for emotion is “motere”, the Latin verb “to move.” By adding prefix “e” to the word “motion,” we see the correlation of organic life in circulating and retreating from its very basic mechanical function.

The Taoists view emotional activities as energy diffusions. The seven emotional expressions of organic function with the passion of the heart are closely connected with the seven openings in the face expressing happiness, rage, sadness, joy, love, hatred and desirable action. The first six are the organic expressions of heart, liver, and spleen. The desirable action is the egoistic mental action. The primary organ for these emotional activities is coordinated through the function of the two amygdala (taken from the Greek word for “almond” because of its fanciful resemblance to almonds). In Taoist tradition, this is the crowning center where both the light and visual frames register, such as the image of sun or of a snake. As the sexual power engages with the light above the brain to form sweet dew, the light in the pituitary becomes gray-white. When it radiates, the two amygdala glands are activated, allowing the Chi to circulate on either side of the head above the ears and around the temples. As the light moves forward, the third eye—the essential tool for healing diagnosis—will be opened.

Fig. 2.4 Function of Amygdala

The overall functioning of the amygdala is related to the energy of the kidney Chi (among adrenal glands, kidneys, bladder and ovarian/prostate glands), particularly the will/fear expression. Fear is the oldest negative emotion. It is felt by all animals, and is even stronger among humans since they have so little power to protect themselves, especially the newborn. The longer history required for organic development makes fear the basis of the entire civilization process: to protect ourselves and achieve higher potential. Kidneys have their corresponding facial locations within the temples and ears. When your kidney Chi is vibrant and flows freely to the brain, there is no blockage in either temporal lobe or around the umbilical cord. The energy flows freely to create pure emotional vibration: compassion.

The temporal lobes govern all auditory, somatic, and motor sensitivities. The breath coming through the nostrils as well as light shining upon the amygdala charge these sensory activities. The adrenal glands, responsible for releasing dopamine, norepinephrine and epinephrine, become the seat for true inner stillness. This inner stillness is opposed to the extremely fearful reactions that manifest in response to life-threatening situations such as freezing, numbness and immobility. In this state, everything is in the harmless and loving present. Being neither fearful nor excited, the heart remains calm with no attachment to anything internal or external. The dopamine's main effect, increasing the pumping of the heart and blood flow, dissolves and transforms itself into healing power. The primary action of norepinephrine, primarily responsible for freezing the muscular and organic expansions, becomes chilled. These two catecholamines then coalesce with epinephrine. This phenomenon increases the production of glucose from glycogen that is produced in the liver. This results in increased energy to the eyes and temples, consequently diminishing or greatly reducing the activity of the gastrointestinal system. The energy coming through the liver adds additional power to the cerebrospinal fluid necessary for the cell function in the brain. The breath becomes deeper, longer and smoother, yet more subtle.

Revolutionarily speaking, when the meditator's breathing condition becomes as such, animals will retreat from this seemingly dead body. Rather, they choose to make friends with it rather than viewing it as a meal. The animals are curious to learn what had come over their food-supplier. In time they become inspired to enter a life of service to those few highly advanced people. This serves as one example of the earliest history of domesticating wild animals. In many cases, those animal friends took on the role of protectors who fought for their masters. For example, in ancient China there are many written descriptions of the highly skilled commanders and martial artists employing wild animals in battle. This is perhaps the earliest meditative power exerted by humans in dealing with their predators. Gradually, throughout the history, we have internalized this skill into a two-sided, built-in self-preservation technique: positive and negative.

The negativity freezes or numbs the body/mind subconsciously in its confrontation with danger. The positive side exercises the human willpower to swiftness and fearlessness as characterized by kingship, noble men and sages. Action (Te) in its profundity is like a newborn baby. Poisonous insects and venomous snakes do not sting it. Predatory birds and ferocious animals do not seize it. In ancient literature, stories were written about kings, noblemen and sages as examples of sovereignty, to be regarded by the commoners as spiritual or god-like creatures, worthy of worship. They needed leadership, guidance, a common hope and belief. Since the majority of the population was unable to survive due to rampant disease, lack of food or becoming the food-supply of the stronger wild animals, they were destined to die at a very early age. The few who survived honed their skills in order to transform their fear and reverse the prevailing life-threatening situations into a positive outcome.

According to pre-heaven theory in Taoist tradition, the abdomen is yang and brain is yin. In the beginning of its life within the womb, generally within three to five months, the body turns upside down with the water at the top and the fire at the bottom. This flow is the function between the North Star and the sun: tailbone and fontanels. The North Star provides the holy water and spiritual light, while the sun ensures the biological formative power and the conscious nutrients: blood and fire. The tailbone provides and directs the initial spinning, rotating or swinging power. It also provides flexibility for the pelvic structure to accommodate the birth process. The fontanels, serving as the cosmic urinary and defecating gates, channel the communication between the fetus and mother. As a fetus grows, the nutrients coming through umbilical cord and placenta shower through the sacral bones to the entire body. The spine becomes like a riverbed, allowing the water Chi to flow and nourish the organs, muscles, tissues, bones and other bodily parts, enabling the fetus to rotate, moving from side to side and up and down. The ears become as the mouth of this river flow, ready to receive the vibration between the fetus and mother, and communicate between the skin and the amniotic fluid. The umbilical arteries and veins within the cord provide the vital energetic circulation of blood. Unlike other species in the animal kingdom, human babies hang upside down in the mother's abdomen until the birth process begins. Animal mothers give birth while standing on their four legs; therefore there is no fear of darkness in baby animals. In contrast, the human baby's brain is always held vice-like in its mother's pelvis, looking down into darkness, causing the fear of darkness to become a built-in biological reaction.

Fig. 2.5 Pre-Heaven Life

In post-heaven life, the nine sacral and tailbones are fused into two, enabling the trunk of the body to stand upright. The resultant walking ability defines the natural difference between a human baby and an animal baby. It takes a period of six months or more for a human baby to develop the ability to stand on its feet and walk, while only a matter of minutes for a baby animal to do so. However, later on in adulthood—in cases where lifestyle effects have resulted in ossification-like conditions in connective cartilage and other connective tissue between the sacrum and bones in the pelvic area—the sacrum and the affected bones of the pelvic girdle become effectively fused together. The fused bones prevent independent movement of the sacrum, and flexibility of the sacral area is lost. In meditation practice, if the sacrum bones are not reopened, there can be no free flow of kundalini power for the total awakening experience. In higher stages of Taoist meditation practice, we are told that unless the sacrum and coccyx (tailbones) are reopened, it is not possible for the neck muscles, cervical spine and throat to operate freely. The Chi-energy body (fluid state) cannot be upgraded into the Shen-energy body (illuminating state) until this process is completed.

Meditative Perceptivity

Humanity has developed abilities through their evolution to distinguish the differences among colors, sounds and smells with the aid of the five senses. Possessing these facilities, we humans experience other more subtle senses. Some examples are pressure, temperature, weight, resistance and tension, pain, position, perceptional and visceral and sexual sensations, equilibrium, hunger and thirst. All these sensations arise from the interaction between internal organs and the external world. The primary role of the senses—to ensure our survival and avoid any dangerous and disastrous situation—enables us to discriminate what is good from that which is harmful, and what is valuable from what is useless. Upon optimizing these sensory abilities, we gradually become more artistic, instrumental and possessive. We continually strive to improve those abilities to discern or perceive the natural forms, to make life simpler and more peaceful, ever more meaningful and wonderful.

In spiritual practice two things are required. The first is to perceive something exactly as it is. This is the precision of accuracy. The other is selflessness. When the self is absent, the discrimination and judgment will be absent as well. There can be no space for duality when the true value of perception is apparent. Passing judgment is the real poison to our life, our health and our spiritual environment. True spiritual judgment is selfless: perceiving things as they are and responding accordingly. In life, all good things are transformative gifts and all bad things are valuable learning and transforming materials. Understanding this reality—the meaning of perception—is the beginning of Taoist awareness practice. It is being consciously aware that the perception of eyes, nose and ears functions to form the greatest portion of information. When we reach the point where what we perceive is ideal to what our consciousness is perceiving, life then presents its true meaning to us. At this point, the sensory organs are not only reliable tools but also valuable conscious and spiritual vehicles. Through this organic awareness, deeper emotional and spiritual nature will be awakened and comprehended. Only the true self is needed to achieve this.

With the aid of light, all things can be seen. To know the Tao, no special talent is needed and no perceivable knowledge is required. All things on earth are sacred, gifted and selfless. To know this is to know your true self and how to apply the skill of spiritual perception. With this device, we can know not only the worldly appearances we observe but also their hidden messages. Then oneness is achieved, making human perception a joint venture between our biological, emotional and spiritual world within as well as the external world negotiated by the mind and heart. The perception of the world, of the Tao and of God is then achieved as life flows on of its own accord.

Sensory Receptors

Do you know why all sensory receptors are located in the front of the body? It is to direct us to move always forward, using colors, sounds, tastes and pressure till our body finally dies. From its very beginning our life is lost until death returns to take us. During the day, we march forward. At night we return during sleep. However, when sleeping on our backs, we block our spiritual communication as dream-work replaces spirit-traveling.

Fig. 2.7 Sensory Receptors

When you learn to see things through the back part of your brain, listen to sound through the center of your brain and breathe through the navel, you become one with yourself and the universe. If you cannot do so now, following the techniques outlined here will show you the way. They will guide you through the outside world into your inner world, not through hopes gathered in the forefront of your imagination but with the dreams held back in your subconscious mind. That is the meaning of meditation: returning to oneness.

Vulnerable Sensory Organs

Mawangdui Text

Five colors blind the eyes. Racing and hunting madden the heart. Pursuing what is rare makes action deceitful. Five flavors dull the palate. Five tones deafen the ears. This is the content taken from chapter 12 in the Mawangdui texts, believed to be the original and least articulate copies now in existence. Mawangdui is the name of a village in South-Central China where the earliest known texts (two copies altogether) of Tao Te Ching were unearthed from a Han tomb by Chinese archaeologists in 1973. There are over sixty chapters in the standard version, which differ in words and phrases and sentence arrangements from the original Mawangdui texts. For example, the standard version lists the “three fives” first (five colors, five flavors and five tones), followed by Racing and pursuing madden the heart, and Pursuing what is rare makes the action deceitful. The standard version rigidly and forcefully places the "three fives" together through the "mental word processor" of logical reasoning. It disguises the tragedy of human interaction with simple calculation: compressing the human experience in a short summarization. The artistic demonstration in the standard version loses the most vital point: the position of heart and the center of action.

Compared to the standard version, the Mawangdui texts show more originality and are less wordy and polished. This expresses the nature of Tao, responding naturally by ignoring completion and perfection. Grand perfection seems lacking, yet its use is never exhausted. Grand fullness seems empty, yet its use never comes to an end. Grand straightforwardness seems bent. Grand skill seems clumsy. Grand surplus seems deficient. This is an honest reminder of how we should avoid becoming entrapped and being satisfied with momentary limitation. Hopefully, through this naturally inspired and personally experienced reminder, we will walk through this chapter and the entire book with grace, realization and liberation.

Most importantly, the Mawangdui's arrangement in chapter 12 has its own conscious sequence. It is not in the logical art of language but spoken to the natural conscious order: a combination of intuition and rationality. It explains the process of using our immediate senses of colors, heartbeat and excitement first, followed by sounds, smells and flavors. It concerns itself with the organic interaction of self with the world. It treats the mental reflection of the world's appearance and other qualities as an interactive and inseparable unity to be acquired from both biophysical experience and conscious understanding. This is the nature of all recorded wisdom traditions.

In Lao Tzu's spiritual conscious order, the sentence five colors blind the eyes reveals the eyes as one of the primary sensory receptors. Colors are the first visible objects in the universe and the most powerful natural stimuli. Their significance is so important to our life, both biological and artistic, that we dye our fabrics with colors, stain utensils with color, paint our rooms and houses with colors, and express ourselves through colors. And we are the consumers of colors. When colors, as the spectrums of light, enter the heart through eyes, the heart is fired and maddened, and the body is driven by the "go for it" message. Racing and hunting commence. Completion then comes into play since our survival depends on the colorful fruits of mother earth. The more rare an object is, the more intensely the body/mind pursues it. Pursuing what is rare makes action deceitful: the beginning of human sinfulness. The word "rare" is used in reference to the most sought after stimuli since that which is rare pleases the heart, satisfies the ego, escalates the position and increases the value. Cheating, fighting, disguising, lying, envying, admiring, appraising, degrading, denying, hiding, exaggerating, labeling, disregarding, abusing, humiliating, killing, on and on endlessly. All for the purpose of pursuing five flavors and enjoying the five tones: the rewards of racing and hunting. As the eyes are blinded, palate dulled, ears deafened, the body becomes toxic and the mind numb. In spiritual discipline, the body is the 'cycling' temple of the spirit. The mind is the directing wind of spirit. Their vital force or spiritual elixir should be used for two purposes only: to give birth to God's beloved and spiritually connected children, and to return us all to the true nature of self: the spiritual and Godhead self.

Five Elements – Sum of Stimuli

Since we are exposed to the stimulation of matters and forms of this world, their invitations can become inescapable. The colors, sounds, smells and motions of natural substances and their various forms constantly "invade" our micro-biological matter and form. When we follow the natural pattern of day and night, we awaken to the shadow part of the light produced by the sun at dawn (the darkest time) and again in the morning just before sunrise. It is a powerful alarm clock ringing in our unconsciousness. When the persona of the sun, bright and glaring in its light, is activated above the earth, the body hair of the earth—plants and flowers and trees—are holistically massaged by its soft, gentle yet subtle and penetrative invasion. And we are hopelessly vulnerable to its immense power; we revel in it.

It is this invitation from nature that allows us to go with the flow of the outside world. This ability is innate to us and there is no need to develop it. It is a given. Going with the flow is an optimistic response that deals with a notion of selfless anticipation and mindful engagement as expressed in Eastern philosophy and religion. The Chinese have summed up the world or universe as being comprised of the forms that are pictured or symbolized with five elements ("forms" or "appearances" or "phases"). These five elements are charged by the two opposite yet coexisting yin and yang forces.

All natural things, in the Chinese mind, are immersed in this "quantumized mechanical bang." For example, the five seasonal changes (spring, summer, late summer, fall and winter) produce five colors (green, red, yellow, white and black) and five flavors (sour, bitter, sweet, tart and salty). They activate five tones (call, laugh, sing, cry and moan) through the five facial organs (eyes, ears, nose, mouth and tongue) and five internal organs (liver, heart, spleen, lungs and kidneys) as well. In turn they are charged by the kidney Chi produced from five kidney organs (two inner kidneys, two outer kidneys and one sexual organ). All these fives are conceived within the bodily five elements (a body with two arms and two legs); expressed with five emotions (anger, joy, worry, sorrow and fear); and manifested with five fingers. The five fingers are the ultimate inspiration that completes the structure of theory-making practice: the yin-yang-five-element theory symbolizing the cosmological and mythological structure of the universe within ourselves.

Pressure upon Five Senses

Our life cycle is determined by the interaction of eternal and external stimuli. The initial excitement then emerges as competitive action that will reap the rewards of food, drink, sex, and being surrounded by possessions and values. They become our status symbols. The Chi is further consumed in dealing with dual reactions such as happiness and joy or anger and frustration. The war begins and the life grinds on to the end. This is what Lao Tzu has surmised as the reason people are not serious about death is because they seek the burdens of life.

The sensory organs gradually become vulnerable as they succumb to their burdens. During much of the time the organs can do nothing independently. They merely facilitate our means and the derived benefits. They are driven constantly by internal demands and external pressure. As the five receptors become jammed, the sixth sense—the bodily sense—is scorched by the fire, and the seventh sense—conscious awareness—is cluttered by the words and beliefs. Naturally, these things never entice us, please us or do harm to our sensory organs or us. We cannot be slaves to either materials or sensibilities. Since large or small, many or few, rewards or punishment, are all being done through Action, we must practice non-doing, engaging in non-affairs and savoring non-flavor. This action is the real product of the mind and heart. The mind pursues and the heart rewards. There is no need to hasten our own demise by driving ourselves to defeat.

In following this practice of non-doing, we must give attention to each and every stimulating agent, whether internal or external. Everything that exists exerts its neutral position, which is altered by how we utilize it. According to Taoist inner alchemy and Chinese medicine, colors, flavors and tones may cause an organic imbalance, which could then lead to emotional turmoil and spiritual distortion. The five colors, flavors and tones impart corresponding internal organic reactions, including biological, emotional and intellectual orgasm. When the pressures exerted by these stimuli become overwhelming, there will be a blockage to the sensory receptors of eyes, ears and mouth. The inner organs will then be harmed: anger frustrates the liver; hate causes rage in the heart; worry eats away at the spleen; sadness depresses the lungs; and fear distills itself in the kidneys. In like manner the high frequency brought on by shouting or blatant noise can inflict damage to the heart; drinking can poison the liver, pornography leeches away at the kidney Chi. Then much needed energy is required to detoxify and restore the body/mind to its normal state.

Speaking in further detail, the liver for example, has the emotional attributions of kindness and anger. When a person's liver Chi is pure and strong he is kind and passionate. Should the liver Chi be deficient, terror can be experienced. An over abundance of terror-Chi produces anger. As the anger backs up in the liver, the mind becomes deranged, losing its control and clarity. Muscles in the genitals contract and cramp. Constant expansions of the chest and rib cage area bring about the onset of palpitations, irritability, quick temper, obsessions and excessive dreams. Deadly consequences may loom on the horizon.

Stop Victimizing your Sensory Organs

We now understand the vulnerability of our sensory organs and the need to balance them. Rather than honoring and respecting them, we burden them mercilessly with self-abuse. When the eyes become tired, we continue to look. When the ears are jammed with excessive sound, we continue listening. When the stomach is full, we continue to eat. The eyes become shortsighted and the ears deafened. The body loses its sense of balance and one's health is at stake. As a result, the more you cling to, the more you lose. In the sense of Tao, this is said to be eating too much and acting too much. What should we do?

Away from Motivational Stimulus

We are easily bored and grow tired of our routine and surroundings. This motivates us to seek more stimulation. At times we are so highly motivated by the drive of our ego persuasion that we reach for perfection. Searching for answers to the purpose of our life journey is the highest form of motivation to be cultivated. We are what we are. Living through what we are is the answer, but we sometimes refuse to accept it. When Buddha became enlightened, his dream-come-true teaching attracted many followers and has continued to do so for generations. Yet, his teachings arouse dogmatic behavior in some and rejection in others. The dogmatic behavior fixates upon the word of realization; rejection pays no regard to suffering. Buddha is enlightened but his teachings are only partially there. How then can we search the way to enlightenment through Buddha or his teachings?

When we refuse to accept the truism that we are what we are—and in our momentary need, we are compelled to add colors, labels and meanings—the ego-mind believes that if we are highly determined we can be anything we want to be. This is how we dream and teach our children. We then empower our ego to demand and direct our actions instead of listening to the warning signals and devoting ourselves to virtuous action. Credentials, marriages and other artificial practices retard and destroy our sacred sensitivity, our going with flow. This is the exorbitant price extracted by our egoistic demands. If our minds are not constraining the living environment, they do not get bored by life. Because they do not get bored, there is no boredom.

Being Productive: Ego's Weapon

During the course of our continual forward march toward civilization, we become emotionally entrapped. We are intellectually encouraged to believe that being productive is of value and the reason to live. Since our productivity must be measured according to given standards, we look into all manners of what we consider to be desirable goals: positions in social, political and religious organizations. Upon achieving these positioned comfort levels, we feel justified for having paid such a high price.

As individuals we are always alone and bear no measurable traits. Within an individual life, the ego cannot attain inner satisfaction; it requires an "expanded" environment. This drive pushes the body/mind into an arena of activity within groups and organizations. Then ego devises endless lists of names and titles to decorate ego-defined body/mind. As these groups and organizations prove their existence, legislate and demonstrate their power dominance, the newcomers—young and old—struggle to become a part of them. The social organizations become fully established, firmly entrenching the future generations. This feeds their desire for more security, getting more education, and meeting higher standards of civilization: being more productive. At the same time schools, corporations, churches and many other establishments process this mentality of "being productive" passionately, forcefully and violently. In so doing they can attract each other, abuse each other, and ultimately destroy each other. The assumption of "being productive" implies that we must make a good impression, be young, smart, creative, hardworking and most importantly, obedient and pliable. The social organizations are anxious to "hire" these qualities and make full use of them. Their expectations are that we will improve, become more efficient and productive in order to set an even higher standard of success for others to follow. Those that follow us proceed to compete with us and eventually take over our own hard-won illustrious positions. What is happening? We have sold ourselves to the highest bidder.

Few people live with ease. Among the extremely talented and high-ranking professionals, their ego allows them to be used and exploited to the fullest as they consume the average and cast off the worthless. The extremely talented ones have achieved everlasting "social" status. Even though they are few, they fall into two distinct groups. Those in the first group purify themselves within and forget about the existence of the world because they are enlightened and have always been. They are themselves and not themselves: what they are as themselves is what others cannot know or don't want to know; what they are not as themselves is the way they are known. Plato, Lao Tzu, Shakespeare, Rumi, Beethoven, Einstein, Van Gogh, and others are among this select group.

Those in the other group sacrifice themselves and unify themselves with God and the hearts of people or individuals: Jesus Christ, Mohammed, Buddha, Genghis Khan, Napoleon, Washington, and Martin Luther King are examples. These individuals cannot exist by themselves, and their followers will live in the wilderness without their image and guidance. Who is the greater: you or someone in these two groups? Three makes the great.

Sickness of our Persuasion

Idea of Ownership

In the realm of ego life, there is no word strong enough to equal it. There is never enough of anything. Ego uses a great deal of physical and mental space to fill and store its ambitions and to preserve and expand its possessions. Consider the physical space it occupies as an explanation. There is no way to measure how big is big enough. An apartment may not be as good as a house, a house not as good as a mansion, a mansion not as good as a country, a country not as good as the kingdom of mind. Worse yet, the insatiable individual ego projects and transforms itself into a collective group ego.

The idea of ownership is no more than social approbation and culturalized ego possession. When a person owns a decent house, they proudly announces ownership. The papers are signed and legally approved. This person never realizes that the first master owner of the house is the earth mother herself. The present owner can trade the house, but cannot take the "ownership" away with them. From the dawn of early civilization, our ancestors realized that owning land means owning all the possessions on it, i.e., food and water. The pride and power of ownership have been and will always be marked in one way or another on the earth itself. All creatures living on earth will fight for food, sex, and shelter. Only humans have lost the beauty of flow by accumulating things and declaring ownership. This ownership then extends from the head of a family into a tribe and ultimately into a country. As the head of the family finally becomes the king, the president, or highest official, his personal rules become the far reaching rules of a country—called government—the second master.

The land of a country has been watered and washed down and will continue to be, by its patriotism. Yet, all the blood is directed by the third and the most powerful owner: the mind of the ruler. Owning the mind means owning the body, the land and richness of life. From the wisdom and intellectual mind, all is created and all others are manipulated. In our modern day society, intelligence and technology become the main source of the power structure to transform natural resources and raw materials into commercial goods. Many third world countries, while lacking in well-trained intellectuals and well-equipped technology, have more natural resources but are poor. There has never been a time in human history during which the mind is more precious and invaluable than it is today; mind is profit, especially an intelligent mind. There has never before been a time when man made materials are more valued than natural products. For example, a plane or a rocket is much more highly priced than a piece of jade or a diamond.

Similarly and exquisitely, the ultimate owner of our minds is the heavenly father: God. The lands of heart, mind and earth are all His creative belongings. God doesn't need a physical space, a piece of land. God resides in the land of the heart and within the ownership of faith. Heart is the vast land of mother, light is the most powerful mind of God, and Love is their product. We are all the slaves of our body/land, and our mind/master. Mother Goddess owns this land, and father God controls this master.

Tragically, for thousands of years, all three religious organizations in the West have declared themselves the ultimate owner of this Holy Land: Israel, the kingdom of heaven. This has no bearing on the land itself, but is the declaration of "mental seal" of ownership. The world of land is enormous, the world of God is everywhere, but the "mental seal," the true owner is here on earth, standing before you. Moses, Jesus Christ and Mohammed established themselves in this Holy Land. Their followers have been fighting for their own master and their own God. Their "mental seal" has become a mixed entity of religious ownership and national censorship. They fail to realize that they all worship the same God; their masters are children (within the same family lineage) of the same God. Are they fighting for their hearts or their egos? Are they worshiping their hearts or their faith?

Once ownership is established, business deals are made to enhance the growth and maintain ownership. The possessive ego never wants to "stop" since ego serves only its possessiveness. Therefore ego cannot distinguish between name and body, body and possession, or whether life or death holds more meaning. Which is more cherished, the name or the body? Which is worth more, the body or possessions? Which is more beneficial, to gain or to lose? Extreme fondness is necessarily very costly.

Name can be changed; the body will die. Neither is truly cherished. Since the body will necessarily die, what is the value of it? If the ego can be completely abandoned, how can it be possessed? Since gain and loss complement each other, how can we have one without the other? We come from nothing and we have nothing. We gather nothing on our journey to death other than our own energized deeds. What we gain is what we will lose. The more we gain, the more we will lose. The more you cling to, the more you lose. The hope and the loss are equally important and mutually proportional; each hope generates a loss and each loss is a loss of energy driven by/toward hope.

So in order to know the world, do not step outside the door. In order to know the Tao of heaven, do not peer through the window. The further out you go, the less you know. Door doesn't refer to the door of a house, church, temple, or an office. Structurally, door is the image of a space occupied by self. Behaviorally, door stands for the initial step toward action: a coordinator between head and feet, a reminder of the conscious eye. Spiritually, the door is a gateway through which the lost soul finds its way home, the wanderer's spirit embraces the mystic field, and the eye of wisdom interacts with the flesh of mystic creation. In Taoist tradition, the phrase "entering the door" is employed to express the initiation of a student. The last student is called the closing-door-disciple, permitting the master to transmit everything to him and then announce his retirement. Equally, when we go outside the house for food or adventure, we know we must return. The further we go, the further away we are from home.

The window represents the attractive beauty and sensational mystery. It is the pull of the wanderer, the intention of soul, the readiness of action, the patience of heart, the agitation of passion, and the defense of protection. A window cannot reveal God's image, but only projects our own reflection. It draws the connection but denies the action. It invites without permeating and accepts without releasing the information. It peers through curiosity, directs our anxiety, leads to suspicion, is examined by the untrustworthy and guided by the wanderer.

A wanderer never leaves his room: the border of his true nature. Yet he wonders about the usefulness of his room, the meaning of his border, and the value of his nature. A wanderer does not concern himself with his appearance; he is inside his image. He marches across the landscape of fresh-smelling soil. He never considers himself to be affectionate, but always loveable. His mind has stepped outside rationality and his heart is faithful to his spirituality. He does not search in his journey, but only measures within each step. He never stays inside his house, but is always at home. The window reflects his own being, and the door connects his spiritual consciousness with his overall behavior. He looks at the all but sees the one. He listens to the cosmic vibration but hears the silent wave. He rubs his fingertips for the sensational feelings of inner calling. He expresses his loving tenderness by crying for any peaceful solution.

The Door to All Wonders is wide open, whether the wanderers are at home or wander and dream breathlessly. The body is the door and the feet are the ensuring doorsteps. The mind is the window as spirit reflects its virtuous freedom within the dancing soul: the dreams of wonders.

Beyond Ego Persuasion

Our ego attempts to play its game between our body and mind, the cosmic body of memory. Ego is very conscious of this. During our life span we experience three kinds of memory: biological, psychological, and spiritual. Biological memory is our instinctive behavior.

Sensory perception is, mostly if not entirely, biologically determined. How to breathe, see, listen, sustain and procreate is all built into our biological memory. Psychological memory is the master game of ego. It stands between mind (soul) and heart (spirit), gliding back and forth, up and down. Due to this, ego does not need to be mortal or immortal. It is the transmission between beauty and ugliness, the "speaking man" between good and bad, and the "beneficial character" between justice and injustice. Ego occupies the largest space in our world, much larger than our biological self, and larger than our human soul can encompass. When something extraordinary occurs and the egoistic conscious effort can neither anticipate nor let it go, it will cause psychic conflict leading to a physical defensive reaction. This is because ego doesn't want the hun—the conscious soul—to anticipate; nor the po—the instinctive soul—to become reactive. Ego knows and controls the po very well but never trusts hun. Many chronic problems, some organic ailments, and all the psychosomatic symptoms are caused by this conflict.

When the psychic conflict becomes more intense, ego will go to any extreme to keep po's reality alive. This situation is similar to a person clutching something valuable, but having no ability or skill to make use of it. If the ego's tension is released, it will create a valuable spiritual journey, a deep realization, a total internal cleansing and a new freedom of life. Many traumatizing events become transformed to bliss for those who have mastered them. The mechanism is our conscience, love, compassion, kindness and faith. The conscience is one of the highest forms of activity that the soul can conduct. There is a connection between soul and spirit on the conscientious level, but spirit is free and permits hun to conduct most of activity with stillness of spirit, insight and swiftness. Love, compassion, kindness and faith are the greatest assets in spiritual practice. This capacity to express with strong energy is the qualified character of extraordinary leaders, both political and religious. Those with this kind of character serve as a magnetic field to draw people's hearts together. They are given a sense of belonging with a wish and hope for the future. Under the supervision of spirit, all realms of conflicts will be dissolved through virtuous acts, such as acceptance, forgiveness and inner trust.

The highest form of socially recognized self-identity is the full display of self and self-related knowledge guided by dignity. Preserving face, keeping face behind the ego and being fearful of losing face are the best qualities of dignity. The roles of manager, faithful follower and fundamental nationalist belong to this category. They find themselves in the combined role of self-identity and dignity and willingly sacrifice their lives for it. These kinds of people make excellent leaders because they have a sense of deep inner psychic connection as well as the ability to direct their spiritual power to their followers and energizing them. When they become deenergized, however, they can be like a hungry dog, a killer without mercy or shame. Dignity is next to spiritual willpower, but the latter has no need to prove and qualify itself. It has already been qualified by God and proven by spirit.

Chapter III
Walking the Way: Spiritual Cultivation

In the previous chapter, we dealt with the descending and suffusing order of the evolutionary process being undergone by our sensory receptors. These have since become characteristic to us. Our intent at this time is to explain how these characteristics merged from being different to being the same through the process of returning practice.

It commences with the simple practice of walking—a natural process—that follows the development of inner strength. As the legs gain enough strength to stand upright, the child begins the human way of walking, thereby abandoning the animal mode of crawling on all fours. Thus, the pilgrimage begins and cultivation begins. The art of walking the way does not apply to the physical act of walking, but centers on our drive to follow our dreams and achieve our goals: the journey of our soul. On this journey, although each step forward may prove difficult, it leads necessarily and naturally to the next: geared always toward the final restful eternity. To die but not be forgotten is to be immortal is the heart of Taoist pilgrimage.

Taoism has accumulated only a handful of documented teachings but provides endless practical and advisable suggestions. They contain few rules to be followed but offer rich and invaluable direction. There are no commandments to obey but only mindful heartfelt revelations to be explored. Many enlightened teachers are here, ready to guide your pilgrimage, to help you understand your body, and to teach you how to distill your mind. You will then awaken to the harmonious flow of universe where you will dwell within the procreative state.

The teaching focuses essentially on the purification of Jing-Chi-Shen into its final product: the elixir of pure-person. Jing is interpreted as the essence of our biophysical body. Chi manifests as psychopersonal energy between body and spirit. Shen represents the cosmic/wisdom spirit. The elixir is the particle that manifests as the true self. Pilgrimage then emerges as a Chi-gathering practice, or cai-Chi with "cai" meaning "collect, gather or pick up." Thus, the spiritual pilgrimage becomes the practice of plucking and gathering the Chi of dews, pollens and elixirs from flowers, mountains, spirits and stars, into the jing-body: the vessel of spirit.

Fig. 3.2 Larger Mystic Field (Dachu) of 26th Hexagram

In Chinese, this jing-body is called "chu," constructed with strokes of "xuan" meaning "mystic" and "tian" meaning "field." All living vessels are mystic fields. In I Ching, there are two mystic fields: Small Mystic Field (Xiaochu) of 9th hexagram and Larger Mystic Field (Dachu) of 26th hexagram. Xiaochu deals with the animal body and its spirit while Dachu refers specifically to the human body and its spirit. How to integrate these two fields into oneness of spirit with universal Chi is the essence of Taoist inner alchemy. Without earth mother's field, we would be unable to live on fruits and vegetables, corns and seeds. Yet, without liberating ourselves from our own animated field, we cannot sustain the source of mother, and our spirit would be unable to walk through the way of beauty, values, justice, longevity and immortality.

The complete Taoist pilgrimage consists of learning the process of planting a seed of pure-person in our two mystic fields: body and soul. This is accomplished through the practice of gathering, circulating and crystallizing the yin-yang Chi of the universe in our energy centers: cauldron, yellow court and crown. Through this practice of calming the desire of the heart, abandoning the minding mind, and tranquilizing the confused spirit, these three conscious realms will be unified into one-spirit within the cosmic void.

In order to merge three into one, we must be in harmony with two. Just as the book Tao Te Ching has two distinct sections, Tao and Te, our spiritual practice concerns the application of the seed of Tao—spirit self, and the kind action of Te—virtuous deeds. As the seed and love become one, we are our true spirit. This chapter is devoted to learning to purify the small/animal field so that the spiritual field can be retained. The exercises include:

1. How to reopen the Chi-blocked meridians, joints, muscles, organs and intra-organic functions;
2. How to gather and store Chi;
3. How to transform our body into the likeness of a mother's womb (a harmonious empty valley) where the son (seed) of oneness becomes unified in the cauldron (the stomach).

Our first approach will be devoted to the theoretical foundation of the cause of Chi-blockage as well as the purpose of cultivation.

Chinese Psychospiritual Somatology

Historical Picture

The heart of Chinese culture lies within the energetic connection and symbolic understanding of intuitive sensitivity as it manifests through mindless concentration and visual imagination. Rationality, however, serves as the primary mechanism to facilitate the intuitive picture of the energetic emptiness in the universe and its harmony. The minds of the Chinese cultural innovators were not programmed by rational creativity and speculation; they were screened with meditation awareness and awakening understanding. With such a mental function nothing logical or analytical can be withheld. It is within this realm that the early cultural formations, such as I Ching and prehistorical shamanistic Taoism, were construed upon cosmic dimension. They would first draw all the natural symbols such as sun, earth, mountains or lakes, into their viscera. Then they gathered the fluctuating and flattering energies of concrete symbols such as wind, thunderstorm and rain into the body/mind's energetic channels: meridians. Finally, they allowed the body/mind to permeate carnal organs within the body as well as ethereal organs within the universe.

Instead of passively attuning themselves to the mystic function of symbols, the cultural followers were empowered to devote their lives to producing “golden elixir”. This was carried out by utilizing earthly substances such as metals and minerals, or through internal Chi-practice. The first group, called outer alchemists were the first scientists to work as a group. Unfortunately their most triumphant productions turned deadly, poisoning dozens of emperors as well as many others. Their methods also advanced the hand-knife-arrow weapons into the devastating explosive weapon of gunpowder. In the meantime the second group, the inner alchemists, focused on inward Chi cultivation by gathering the worldly Chi field into the cauldron, thus producing the refined product: elixir of pure-person.

The Chinese have a clear and insightful theory concerning all natural beings on the face of the earth. This theory advocates that water/fire have Chi but no being. Grass/trees have Chi and being but no consciousness. Birds/animals have Chi, being and consciousness but no righteousness. Human beings have Chi, being, consciousness and righteousness. Sages/holy men can rise beyond the limits of human freedom. Non-beings (water and fire) are the invisible substances used to construct beings. Beings are the biomechanical formations between earth and heaven. Human beings or Homo sapiens stand firmly on two legs with feet planted on the ground, facing the sky. The body/mind is itself a cosmic body, a cosmic tree, and a mystic field. The five fingers on each hand represent the five elements of universal construction as well as underlying phenomena, thereby connecting the earthly kingdom of five (monera, protista, fungi, plantae and animalia).

The three concrete elements of water, fire and earth (dusts), coalesce with two other intermediate elements: wood and gold. Fire descends from heaven. Water rises from earth. Earth stands on top of water. Wood represents the soft, watery and murky element of evergreen. Gold forms a hard, dry crystal. All plants are devoid of the gold element, whereas animals have all five elements. All plants and most sea creatures are devoid of blood. Their bones, if any, are very soft. Only animals possess all five elements: bodily water, conscious fire, the governing element of muscles and glands (earth), the constructive element of blood (wood), and skeletal element of proteins and mineral (gold).

Between the process of asexual procreation and sexual reproduction of all earth creatures, human beings live in their own distinctive pattern. They are not influenced by temperature as alligators are, nor are they transsexual within the hetero-sex as are plants, nor from one to another as certain fish. Rather, human eggs are influenced by the moon and their aging process is expressed through transforming heavenly hair—brain hair—from whatever colors they may be (black, brown, reddish, etc.) into white. This is why we are not only psychosomatic but also psychospiritual. Animals possess an animated bodily spirit that manifests only on a somatic level such as the fluctuating cycle between waking and sleeping, consuming food and enjoying climax. Only human beings are capable of engaging with spiritual mates and marrying God/ Goddess.

Three Mystic Fields 三丹

In the human body there exist three mystic fields. They represent the flesh of Lower (xia) Tan Tien, the soul of Middle (zhong) Tan Tien and the spirit of Upper (shang) Tan Tien, all concerned with abdominal, chest and brain fields. The human voice carries three characteristics—individual, regional and linguistic—that originate from and return to the fourth: silence. Likewise, these three energetic fields are further connected with four other fields, two arms and two legs, open and closed through nine holes: seven in the face and two at the bottom of the trunk. All the fields are channeled by the energetic nerve lines in the body—meridians—for a total of twenty: eight for heaven and twelve for earth. These are the components representing the steps to be encountered and walked through. They are the given messages to be revealed along the pilgrimage.

There are three stages to be followed in the oriented practices of these energetic fields. The first stage is the gathering of Chi at the cauldron or the Lower Cinnabar Field inside the stomach. This Chi will produce a “Pearl,” vitalizing the stomach (with Chi) as Lao Tzu has expressed it. The exercise is xia ozhou tian or Microcosmic Orbit. Sexual organs in the Lower Cinnabar Field represent the power of biological production in concert with spiritual liberation. Although we are born with a mechanical and manipulative ability to design and produce many things, without the kidney Chi we could not exist. The energy center for spiritual life is in the abdominal area. The brain is but an empty storage space waiting to house all our thoughts and desires. To vitalize the stomach is to retain physical health and mental stability, while abundant kidney Chi furnishes the drive to make life meaningful and practicable socially, politically and spiritually.

In the second stage, through the fusion of five elements, the five psychosomatic Chi are unified into a single psychospiritual Chi: Love. Heaven and earth combine and allow sweet dew is the literal representation. This results from gathering yang Chi in the universe and bringing it into the Yellow Court at the Middle Cinnabar Field where it harmonizes the Chi lifted from cauldron into a Pearl. The color yellow refers to earth or golden season of spleen: the energy distribution center. Microcosmic Orbit and Six Healing Sounds are purposefully designed for this stage. In this psychosomatic center, nutritional materials (e.g. air, food and water) absorbed into the mouth and nose are generated into Chi-form, necessary to maintain bodily equilibrium. This manifests through corresponding organs as emotional attributions and supplementary personality characteristics. The challenge is how to transform the emotion into motionless, how to change personal into impersonal, and how to purify selfish love into selfless love. The practical solution is inner marriage between twin souls where negativity no longer exists, where no more karma needs to be met, where there is no more dual existence of male and female, where only the true selfless self of pure-person and oneness are apparent.

In the third stage, the sweet dew “invites,” “attracts” or “steals” God’s creative force of spirit in the Upper Cinnabar Field. The golden elixir or pure-self will result in preparation for flight. This stage is characterized as “the three flowers unify in the head and the five Chi return to the ethereal state,” the state of the Tao since Tao is beyond danger even when the body perishes. When a meditator reaches this state, they will literally “see” the three different flowers at these energetic centers: Buddha is seated on the lotus flower; Jesus Christ adorns the snow-flaked flower; and Lao Tzu embraces the star-shaped flower. In this psychospiritual center, shen is the residence and master of hun (the heavenly spirit submerged in human soul form) and po (the earthly animated soul form). It is where the secret of natural mechanism is disclosed and their mechanical copies (mental products) are researched.

The brain, of itself, does not produce energy. The so-called psychospiritual energy is essentially supplied through the biomechanical energy from the lower center, the psychosomatic energy from the middle center, and the light from above. The undeniable fact is that the brain is the most energy-consuming organ of the body, pleasing the desirable assistance of po—the animated spirit—through the dissolving of life force or libido for pleasure. The mind makes human beings the most sexually active animals on earth, engaging in sexualized fantasy, imitation and manipulation. During the mature stage of life, eyes fire the sexual desire; mouth transforms the sexual expression; and voice emits and expels the precious kidney Chi. All this is due to the powerful domination of po and the conscious anticipation of hun. Hun activates the kidney Chi through the power of the liver and the memory cells in the brain. Po controls the lungs that transmit the kidney Chi in conjunction with the heart.

The Taoist way of life is to direct the treasured life-force downwardly/outwardly only for the purpose of procreation. At all other times preserve it upwardly/inwardly to nourish the brain and rejuvenate the bone marrow. In this manner, by reversing the act of the Tao, you choose the road to restoration of the pure-self.

Two Openings

In Taoist tradition the inner marriage is the performance of the inner cosmic dance between virgin boy and virgin girl. This is made possible by closing the heavenly gate and the earthly door. The condition is pure love or Christ Love, the state is eternal, the substance is light, the seed is virtue, and the result is pure-person. Virgin girl is Mother: colors, creation, purification, yin, chromosome Y, snake, lake and mountain. Virgin boy is Father: light, power, transformation, penetration, yang, chromosome X, dragon, thunder and star. To experience the inner marriage is to know the cosmic marriage, to enjoy the eternal love, to act through selfless love, and to preserve the cosmic Chi.

The two openings in our body/mind are the heavenly gate—the third eye—existing at the top, and the earthly door—perineum pressure point—at the bottom. The bottom opening is locked before the pubic stage begins, and closed after menopause or with the absence of sperm, but opens fully in the productive stage and when sickness manifests.

Fig. 3.3 In spiritual practice, keep the earthly door locked by opening the heavenly one.

When the power of perineum is locked within, the energy will travel upward through the spine to the top part of the front lobe, which is open in its infantile state. Many people have the ability to lock up the lower opening in order to utilize their kidney Chi for higher purposes. Some examples could be rock stars, singers, politicians and priests. The top one can open occasionally during shen's pure states of consciousness, such as altered consciousness, profound religious experiences, peak meditative and creative states, or lucid dreaming states.

Fig. 3.4 Perineum in the Female and Male Bodies

These are the only occasions in our human life during which we experience a sense of living with God. In the history of human evolution (both evolution and involution), as well as in religious experience, scientific findings and the creative arts, all trace their origins to this mystic source.

Reactionistic Map

In Taoist mentality our entire life, troubled by its inevitable illnesses, is determined by the interactive results of Chi circulation of jing-chi-shen and hun-xin-po.

Jing-Chi-shen　　Hun-Xin-Po

Chi works between Jing and Shen just like xin (heart) balances the forces of hun and po. By applying Lao Tzu's Tao-Te-form-matter-jing-trust, this suffused model assures us that heaven (the nature of Tao) within us is Te, and the earth within us is Chi. When the Te flows forth and Chi pervades everywhere, being forms. The origin of being is jing. When two jing(s) are joined together, they become shen. What comes and goes with shen is hun, and what goes back and forth with jing is po. Jing, shen, hun, and po are the four names of the fundamental building blocks in the structure of Chinese biology, physiology, psychology and spirituality. Shen is the pure yang shen or spiritual form residing in the head, while hun is the yin shen or human soul. Jing is the biological substance of the body, and po is the animated soul of jing within the body. Aside from these four building blocks, Chi is the power source, and xin is the working mind. Everything operates through the Chi; anything that goes through the body must also go through the mind.

Looking at the concept of Chi in the traditional Chinese view as well as libido in modern psychology, we see the diversity of this energy manifested in two cultures. In Chinese, Chi is universal and organismic, collective and individual, biological and spiritual. In psychology, particularly Freudian psychology, libido is nothing other than self-directed sexual pleasure and its gratification. The misuse of Chi or libido contributes to both the Taoist idea of loss and Freudian psychoanalytical concept of neurosis. Yet, to the Taoists, Chi, especially concerning sexual energy or life force, is the most precious treasure in the world; any misuse of it causes irreparable damage to life. In Freud's opinion, this portion of Chi is gratified either by artistic and intellectual romance, or suppressed in daily life as a sickness. There is no middle ground. The Taoist approach can make a valuable contribution to modern psychology and spiritual practice, whereas Freudian pathological analysis offers little to enhance Taoist cultivation practice.

The only known psychologist with a sense of the Taoist flavor was C. G. Jung. He had the insight that Taoist practice would be a special science (1931), but he did not realize that the concept of hun and po was far greater than his symbolic terms logos and anima could imply. He didn't agree with Wilhelm's idea that hun is equivalent to his idea of animus, and was also unaware that hun never dies. Hun and po are not only distinguishable psychic factors, but are diversified organic dynamics. They represent the touchstone between the pure self and the egoistic self and are distinguishable in terms of psychosomatic functioning. It is very interesting to see that the character of hun consists of the strokes of "cloud" and "wraith," and that the character of po consists of the strokes of "white" and "wraith." The basic stroke "gui" for "wraith" or "dead ghost" in the characters hun and po is combined with the strokes of "white" and "heart." The "white heart" here indicates the image of a person before death, the white or pale face, symbolizing the death of spirit, or white horse.

According to Taoist interpretation, when spirit (shen) resides in the body after birth, it has its dualistic functioning of soul: the fire-Chi of hun and water-Chi of po. Hun is the spirit of Chi while po is the essence of body. Accordingly, all sensory activities, e.g. visual, auditory, and kinesthetic, are animated from po. Conscious activities, e.g. intuition, insight, and panoramic awareness, are generated by hun. Again, in Chapter 10 of Tao Te Ching, the word "spirit" in donning the spirit and soul and drawing them into Oneness is the translation of the Chinese character of yin, which is hun. Hun is the seed of endless reincarnation. It can be a person or a ghost, saint or sinner. It arises before the body exists and departs after the body ceases to breathe. Hun is independent: always moving and wandering, coming and going, cycling unceasingly, enduring without exhaustion. The headquarters of hun is the liver and it originates from shen in the brain, the base of the day-time-yang-Chi or manifested consciousness, and the source of desires from the organs emerging as emotions. Hun is the embodied soul or human spirit, the outward manifestation of heavenly yang Chi in the bodily caged yin form. When hun becomes the organic functioning inside the liver, it is grounded: creative, planning, and capable of changing and exerting action. It is also vigorous and penetrating, attractive, and at the same time, mistrusting, mysterious, and illusive.

The center for po is the lungs and it originates from both the kidney-Chi—the Water-Chi as the substance of bodily existence—and the energy supply through the umbilical cord. Water-Chi is bodily yin Chi Po is the receptive, productive and obsessive action of eating, sleeping, and sexual reunion of animated spirit. Lungs replace the umbilical cord in post life to channel the earthly yin breathing of air. Po is the center for "gross" bodily activity (food, sleep and sex) and the night-time-yin-Chi manifestation, namely, dreaming consciousness and other murkiness. When a person is controlled by po, metaphorically speaking, the po becomes a living ghost inside the body. The body sickens; the mind becomes callous, egoistic, possessive and obsessive. *Hun'*s bodily yang Chi, the conscious activation of warming, caring, kind and open-minded character, is replaced by po. The po person is greedy, rude, jealous and disguised.

Three Hun

Seven Po

The spirit, at the onset of its independent life, radiates in the form of three spiritual souls—(hun) on the left governed by Wuying, and seven vegetative souls—(po) on the right governed by Baiyuan. Hun forms a triad structure. The three spiritual souls are the tranquil spirit, embryonic light and dark essence. They exist as three corpses or three insects. The one hun in the head is obsessed with the pursuit of treasure: the pure and harmonious spirit. It drives the mind into darkness. The center spirit of the second hun is excited and enticed by the five flavors: the transformation of yin Chi of embryonic light. It is trapped by excitement and rage; lacking in kindness and clear consciousness. It makes one cunning and possessive and invites trouble and punishment. The third hun at the bottom is driven by sex, food and sleep: the essence of mixed yin Chi. It destroys the pure yang Chi and eventually exhausts the life force. Jing is infused into physical form where it collaborates with primordial Chi.

The seven po(s) are as follows: the first one is the dog cadaver; the second is the hiding arrow; the third is the black yin; the fourth is the gluttonous thief; the fifth is the strong poison; the sixth is the abandoned seduction; and the seventh is the diseased lungs. These seven po represent the seven emotional attributes, leading inexorably to possessive action and self-destruction. In biblical tradition they are the seven bowls or seven deadly sins. As Lao Tzu questioned which is more cherished, the name or the body? Which is worth more, the body or possessions? Which is more beneficial, to gain or to lose? This bespeaks of the desire and drive of egoistic heart.

By getting nutrition from the spleen and stomach (the energy center for digesting food), the light from sun, and the air from lungs, the psyche or xin has the necessary tool to produce blood: the kinetic energy supply for the body from the embryonic light. Xin is the origin of human desire (for the basic bodily existence) and action (mobility). The Chinese concept of xin for heart is "xin originates from matter and dies with matter." If there is no light outside the world, xin cannot be conscious of itself; if there is no biological form of bodily existence, xin has no need to live with *po'*s instinctive behavior of estimating things and being protective. Po or ego is a very powerful concept but is empty on its own merits. Its powerful nature goes to Western culture, which is active, demanding, dominant, pragmatic and controlling, whereas the Buddhism's empty view and Taoism's non-minded, non-egoistic action in the East stress the usefulness of emptiness. Since ego is directly linked with the subjective conscious self I, it surfaces through the consciousness of hun and subjectivity of po to manifest with *xin'*s passion and obsession. It is from this observation that we draw an equation that xin and nao (brain) are the Chinese equivalent of heart and mind.

Ming

Xing

Xin

Nao

When the biological memory for food and water is stimulated by light upon shen's tabula rasa, memory of xin becomes consciousness (yi). When the consciousness is preserved, it becomes will (zhi). The transformation of will is thought, or the thinking process (si). When thought is extended by the will, it becomes a plan (lu). When the plan is projected upon matter, it is the manifestation of intelligence (zhi). And intelligence is the source of longevity, which means dying but not be forgotten. This is how we function psychologically and why we exist beyond our biological life. This is the Chinese map of xin and nao, or "biopsychology" and "neuropsychology" as you may wish to call it. It is not a rational glittering; it is the flow of Chi, a combination of cosmic wind and breathing air.

The last two words concerning psychospiritual faculty are the destiny of life (ming) and the natural character of life (xing). These two words are the principal characters in the Taoist manner of walking into the spiritual terrace of cosmic mind. Xing is the character, the personality and the spiritual quality a person within ming, aside from ming and beyond ming. It is concrete, dynamic, essential, characteristic, penetrative, representative, symbolic, becoming and divining. The destiny of life ming is formative, structural, mechanical, realistic, accepting, obedient, surrendering and submissive. Xing is what a person exemplifies, and ming is the manner in which they embraces life. Xing is the essential construction of a person while ming is their potential activity during the course of life. Xing is the governing body of a society with ming operating as the social and cultural practice. Xing is the land and ming is what the land produces. Xing is the light and ming is its colors.

Two Orbits

The Chinese discovered the energetic channels—meridians—based on the practice of meditation, acupuncture, massage and spiritual healing. These meridians can be charged and recharged by the two internal orbits: xiaozhoutian (Microcosmic Orbit/Circle) and dazhoutian (Macrocosmic Orbit/Circle). Xiao means small or little; zhou is a 360-degree circle; tian indicates heaven or day, and da connotes big or large. The Medical Microcosmic Orbit circulates between the Governing and Protective Meridian. Its Medical Macrocosmic Orbit completes all the meridians which is Taoist Microcosmic Orbit. Taoist Macrocosmic Orbit is the oneness between the body/mind and the universe. They both exhibit two major techniques: “Waterwheel Irrigation” and “Building the Bridge.”

“Waterwheel Irrigation” is for the purpose of preserving the yin sexual Chi (from the sperm of ejaculation and the eggs of menstruation produced from the invisible yang sexual Chi) from being manifested outwardly. “Building the Bridge” in Taoism means to restore the Governing and Protective Meridians to its fetal state. When these two meridians are connected meditatively via the tongue, the bodily Chi circulates inwardly to receive the fresh Chi and outwardly to discharge the useless Chi. Balance is then restored and sickness disappears. The technique is to press the tip of the tongue against the harder palate (convex edge extended from the root of upper teeth) during breathing.

The detailed practice for Microcosmic Orbit requires that during inhalation, the meditator visualizes a white line moving from the Lower Cinnabar Fields down to the Sacral Pump, up to the Cranial and then contracts the muscles around the anus. As the Chi flows up to the pituitary gland in the head it activates the healing power, opening up the spontaneous knowing and interactive abilities as they form golden elixir. While exhaling, follow the line from where it has stopped in the pituitary gland and divide it into two lines. Then move them down in front of the ears to the joints between the upper and lower jaws. The two lines then meet inside the mouth at the tip of the tongue. Through the tongue, the merged line moves down to the lower jaw, throat, neck and chest into the Middle and Lower Cinnabar Fields. where it becomes an energetic drumming process.

Fig. 3.5 Circulation of Small Heaven

During inhalation with the Macrocosmic Orbit, the mental concentration begins at the Lower Cinnabar Field. As it travels up to the chest it divides the line in two in order to connect the armpits with the three hand-yin-meridians that run to the fingers. Round the fingers with the "line" from the small finger to the thumb in order to join the three hand-yang-meridians. Then move the lines up the outside of the arms, merging them together at the C-7 and up to the head. During exhalation, mentally draw the yang Chi from heaven to the crown point of the head, down through the spine to the tail bone. Then separate the line into two. Move each line down along the three leg-yang-meridians to the feet and around the toes. Then return the lines to join the three leg-yin-meridians up to the Sacral Pump. As they merge together as one, the white line travels up to the Lower Cinnabar Field.

Heart of Troubles

Carnal Body – Root of Trouble

Life is always troublesome, regardless of how the individual is bounded by it. Suffering is the central theme in Buddhist philosophy; sinfulness is overly emphasized in Christianity; Taoism values the trouble as you do the body. Why so? If I did not have a body, where would the trouble be? Body doesn't understand the meaning of suffering; it is the conscious mind that embraces all feelings, sensations and the meaning of suffering and sin. The egoistic mind deals with it as an intellectual concept. To the religious it is an effective inducement to the cause. This explains the reason that many religious followers actively blind-side their true selves in misinterpreting the nature of life. They are unable to cast off their negative memory, experience and attitude; they choose to retain it through fear of the unknown. They fail to understand the obvious sameness of both sides and equal ends: merging with extremes from black to white, carefully embracing virgin boy and virgin girl within.

Body is the structure of human physical existence, the foundation of mind and spirit, as well as the beauty of the form. Without the bodily form being taken there can be no communication with the growth of mind, spirit and culture. Without the body, materialistic and spiritual possessions would have no place to dwell. Without the body, the beauty of human life would be devalued into the state of dust blowing in the wind. Human life would cease to exist. It is without question, beyond any rationality, that the body is the most beautiful object in the world: the source of attraction for love, longing and marriage, biological and spiritual.

Body can also be regarded as the most valuable treasure in the world; when it is strong and healthy, we have the best of all worlds. When the body grows old and dies, it is no longer of this world. If we value the world as we do the body, we can be entrusted with the world. If we love the body as we love the beauty of the world, we can be responsible for the world. This means that body, in its image of the world, is the greatest treasure in the world. The price that mind assesses to the body is essentially the price the body has set for itself (Ask any movie star, top athlete, political candidate; what is their set price?). Through the practice of traditional and long-held beliefs, Taoists regard their bodies with the same equal and respectful attention they do the country. A country has a physical foundation (land, rivers and forests), emotional characters (culture and customs), and a spiritual origin (the founding fathers and mothers). The same truth applies to each and every individual. Body is the foundation for personality and emotional qualities that reflects the inner self. Faith is the heart of connection. Unfortunately, we often display beauty by masking the real source: ugliness. Communications may reach the point where ugliness reigns and sickness arises. Everyone recognizes beauty as beauty since the ugly is already there. Real beauty is the blending of good and bad, perfection and imperfection. This is the immeasurable power of human communication, the aggregate of all things good and bad, learned and experienced, realized and mysterious. It is the power predominately yet mysteriously exhibited in our most valuable art objects; they harbor not only their natural quality of “fine art” but both explicit and implicit ugliness and imperfection as well.

The theory and practice behind the six words formulas are that natural sounds can vibrate our inner organs by stimulating the organic receptors and their corresponding centers. The expressive sounds are then connected with the desire of the heart toward the objects that produce sound. For example, when the feeling is grief, due to either blockage of an inner organ or stimuli from the outside, the voice resonates between low frequency and low force. When the feeling is joyful, the voice resonates in tones from smooth and steady to noisy and excited. Extreme positive or negative creates disharmony within the organic system. The six words we discuss at this time are the six healing sounds being paired to either replenish or dispense with the inner blockage of Chi in the six paired organs.

Translated Traditional Chinese Text and Personalized Teaching for Westerners. The nature of the six sounds has to do with the five organic (vital organs) sounds, beginning with the lungs—plus the triple-warmer sound, like “Y” as the English vowel. Each organ has three sounds: the neutral where the organ generates its own purest expression and dual sounds where the Tao and Te, or inhalation and exhalation are used, or the mental sound/physical sound, or male/female sounds. That is why in the six healing sounds, there are two distinctive sounds.

The six healing sounds presented in the text herein are the direct translation from Hua-to, one of the greatest Taoist (and medical) doctors in China. And, in the beginning of his title, he used Lao Tzu’s spiritual name—tai-shang-lao-jun, “the Supreme Master Lao-Jung”—as the title, just like most of the writers of Buddhist literature do in honoring the teachings of Buddha. The six sounds are about twelve meridians connected to twelve organs. Consequently, the sixth [dual] sound presented in the text of this section refers to the relationship between the bladder and the gallbladder, which comes from a medical context. The other sixth healing sound, the triple warmer sound—used in the Universal Tao System—is not related to any particular organ; it is not included in the text discussion. It is hard to say whose system is authentic unless our organs are clean to produce their own authentic sounds. The five vital organs each are connected to an associated organ(s) as well as to a sense organ. For example: heart, small intestine and tongue.

In the chakra system, the first five sounds connect to the first five chakras, from sexual organ to vocal cord; the sixth is about the third eye sound, the awakening of the Goddess' sound within. Only when the five Chi-sounds are completely integrated and reach a perfect silence, can the sixth sound arise; it cannot manifest by itself.

Also, the first five sounds are about the five animal kingdoms, or the five senses within humans. The human sound, which is the spleen sound, connects the four animal deities—Green Dragon, Red Phoenix, White Tiger, and Black Tortoise—through the Yellow Court (spleen, pancreas and stomach). The spleen is the largest node of the lymphatic system, technically not an organ—but due to its importance in the immune system and, energetically, in Chinese medicine—it is regarded as a vital organ. As the triple-warmer is activated, the trinity of the hun is also activated, thus connecting the three Tan Tiens: the upper conscious, the middle emotional, and lower physical. When the hun connects the four animal deities, the seven is completed. The crown is awakened.

Since the translation is strictly literal, and Master Chia's teaching is personal, whether created by him or transmitted from another teacher, the six sounds he is teaching are the six neutral sounds. Master Chia has simplified the sounds by using the Inner Smile process for neutralizing negative energies in the respective organs before activating the appropriate sound and physical position. The processing of emotions is different from the descriptions in the translated text. Also, he has further streamlined the procedure by activating each vital organ and its associate organ—there is a recognizable interconnectedness—at the same time (i.e., lungs and large intestine). Each sound is then performed three to six times as needed for maximum benefit.

The sounds are always performed in the creative cycle of energy relationships of the five elemental phases of energy (which correlate to the characteristic energies of the organs). Thereby, the supportive relationship between the primary vital organs as well as their associate organs is maintained. Since the kidneys (bladder) support the liver (gall bladder) in this creative cycle sequence, the relationship between the bladder and the gall-bladder meridians is activated—as mentioned in the sixth sound (triple warmer) of the translation. In the Universal Tao teaching, the triple warmer sound is included as the sixth sound to provide the harmonizing and unifying benefit in the Three Tan Tiens. Thus, the sequence for performing the healing sounds in Master Chia's Universal Tao system is as follows: lungs, kidneys, liver, heart, spleen, and triple warmer.

The translated text of the traditional Chinese description of Six Healing Sounds is juxtaposed with the simple illustrated instructions for each vital organ sound and the triple warmer sound taught in the Universal Tao. There are apparent differences in the procedures and qualities involved in the translated text version and the Universal Tao presentation of the healing sounds. Therefore, for the graphics illustrations, the hexagrams shown correspond to the description in the translated text. Since the teaching of the sounds shown in the illustrations is based on the simple qualities of the five elements, we will identify the dominant quality of the chi for each sound by naming its element and the trigram that represents that element. Hence, lungs, metal (quality of the high mountain), ken (gen); kidneys, water; liver, wood; heart, fire; spleen, earth; and the triple warmer for the Three Tan Tiens is not associated with any specific element.

1. Map of the Lungs (si-sound is for replenishing and hu-sound is for dispensing): The lungs are the Chi of the Dui (lake) hexagram, the essence of gold and the color of white. The lungs master po (animal soul) by transforming themselves into a seven-inch-long jade infant. Their spirit is the white animal that protects the body. Lungs connect internally to the large intestine where they master the nose externally. Their emotional expression is that of saddness, emanating when they are losing their po. The lungs are thin and bright, and have little endurance against the cold. When they are white, there is no existing disease. A sound in the large intestine indicates a blockage of Chi. A frequent xu-sound (wheezing) signals a debilitation of the lungs. The lungs master the Seventh Palace: the Golden Gate. At 7:00 a.m. on the first day of the fall season, the meditator should sit facing west, perform the beating-heaven's-drum exercise seven times, and swallow the jade well's stew (saliva) three times. Then close the eyes and concentrate on the Tui Palace (mouth). Allow the white Chi to enter the mouth, and swallow three times. The infant spirit will be tranquil; the hundred demons will not invade the body, and the soldiers cannot use weapons.

2. Map of the Kidneys (chui-sound is for dispensing and si-sound is for replenishing): The kidneys control the essence, the Chi of the Kan (Water) hexagram, and their color is black. They are circles. One of their names is "ferment." Their spirit is a white deer, and it transforms into two foot-long jade infants. The myriad things are ruled by the essence, developed by the will, perfected by the purity, and harmonized by the tranquility. The kidneys are connected to the bones, and their facial organs are the ears. If the back cannot stretch, the kidneys are cold. At 7:00 a.m. on the first day of the winter season, sit facing North, clicking the golden roof five times, drinking with the jade-well three times, breathing in the black Chi of the Mystic Palace (ovaries/prostate), in order to nourish the jade infants. The spirit is harmonized and the body is at peace. This enhances longevity.

3. Map of the Liver (xu-sound is for dispensing and chui-sound is for replenishing): Liver is the Chi of the Chen (thunder) hexagram, the essence of wood, and the color of green. The liver controls hun. Its spirit is dragon-like, and it transforms into two seven-inch-long jade infants: the green one clings to the dragon and the yellow one holds jade-dew. One who wishes to age in peace must return to the eminent tranquility. The liver connects to the tissues and fibers that compose the muscles. The eyes are the liver's facial connection. When the eyes become hot and reddish, something is amiss in the liver. The liver controls the spring and manifests as the essential Chi of spring. The bloom of myriad things follows the Tao of yang Chi. At 3:00 a.m. on the first day of the spring season, sit facing the East and click the teeth three times. Inhale seven times. Hold the breath after each inhalation. Inhale the green Chi of the Chen Palace (liver) three times, then swallow it. This nourishes the two infants of the liver.

Fig. 3.12 Liver Sound and Exercise - Wood Element, Chen

4. Map of the Heart (ker-sound is for dispensing and xu-sound is for replenishing): The heart is the Chi of the Li (Fire) hexagram, the essence of fire, and the color of red. Its spirit is rosefinch and it transforms itself into an eight-inch-long jade maiden (the heart organ). To pacify the spirit and perfect the form (body), one must return to essential harmony. The heart connects to the small intestine, and controls the blood. The tongue is its corresponding facial organ. When blood circulation is obstructed, it shocks the tongue, which in turn is insensitive to the flavor. When the heart becomes disturbed, the xu-sound (panting) increases.

Fig. 3.13 Heart is the Chi of the Li (Fire) Hexagram

Fig. 3.14 Heart Sound and Exercise - Fire Element, Li

The heart controls the Ninth Palace, the alarming gate. When it is harmonious, the form is perfect. At 7:00 a.m. on the first day of the summer season, sit facing the South, clicking the golden roof (upper teeth) nine times, bubbling the mystic well (saliva), then swallowing it in three even portions. Concentrate steadily on inhaling the red Chi at the Li Palace (heart), then swallow the red Chi three times in order to nourish the jade-maiden in the spiritual Li mansion. When the spirit is pacified, the body is at peace. Though a hundred disasters may arise, they can bring no harm.

5. Map of the Spleen (hu-sound is for dispensing and ker-sound is for replenishing): The spleen is the Chi of Ken (Mountain) hexagram, the essence of earth, and the color of yellow. It is like the cover of a tub. Its spirit is phoenix-like, and it transforms itself into a six-inch-long jade maiden.

Fig. 3.16 Spleen Sound and Exercise - Earth Element, Kun

The spleen connects to the eminent yin, and its corresponding facial organ is the mouth. When its appearance is moist and soft, there is no problem. The spleen has no fixed position, as do the other inner organs. It changes within an eighteen-day period during each of the four seasons. At 5:00 a.m., sit at the Central Palace (triple warmer, thymus) and avoid breathing five times. Practice the beating-the-drum exercise seven times, and then imagine the yellow Chi of the Central Palace, and swallow it. Drink the jade-dew in order to reach a sublime state. Humans depend upon the Tao of heaven to regulate vital Chi. Preserving the essence of one's sexual Chi attains longevity. Concentrate on the pearl-pond (mouth) and drink the jade-juice (saliva), the harmonious Chi will then regulate all the meridians. Hold onto essential source, sustain purity, and eliminate aging. This process is called the secret formula for concentrating on purity and sustaining longevity.

6. Map of the Gall Bladder (xi-sound is for dispensing and xu-sound is for replenishing): The gallbladder is the essence of gold, the Chi of water, and the color of blue. Its spirit is tortoise-like, and it transforms into a foot-long jade maiden, who is very brave. The gall bladder connects to the bladder. When its color is dark blue, there is no problem. During the first month of every season, sit facing the Mystic North and inhale the black Chi into the mouth, swallowing the Chi of the jade-well nine times. Ecstasy and anger do harm to the personality; sorrow and joy damage the spirit. When the spirit is damaged, life is endangered and the innate personality is destroyed. Cultivate the personality in order to generate Chi. Preserve the spirit in order to rest the heart. When Chi is pacified, the body is balanced, the essence is perfected, and the heart is rested. This is the formula for cultivating purity, preserving spiritual essence, and enhancing longevity.

Triple Warmer

1. Lie down on your back.
2. Close the eyes and take a deep breath, expanding the stomach and chest without strain.
3. Exhale on the sound "Heeeeeee" made sub-vocally, as you picture and feel a large roller pressing out your breath.

Desiring Heart
The Owner of the Troubles 妄心

The desiring heart (wang xin) is a joint venture between soulful spirit hun and animated spirit po. Xin is the ruler of the body and the master of the human spirit. It is the foundation of self and the trajectory of egoistic mind. Xin exists with material things and dies as a result. The reversed situation would be "out of sight, out of mind." This is because of its device, the eyes. Eyes are the window of hun and po, and tears are the manifestation of joy and of loss. Xin's stimulus comes from the eyes and the eyes are the medium and connection between light and energy, and colors and passions. The heart reflects the materialistic world and the inner state of mind. Bio-somatically speaking, the blood, our main energy supply, comes from the nutritional Chi of spleen and stomach. Under the streaming of solar light that enters through the eyes as well as the body, the nutritional Chi changes its color into red and then distributes itself throughout the whole body.

In the eyes of Taoism and Chinese medical theory, the heart of the mind is the shen that is stored in the heart and governs all the activities of the body/mind. The pure function of shen, which is spiritual, suffuses into mentality and connects with the emotional organs. Intuitive knowing, complete anticipation and subtle understanding are the picture of shen. Conscious thinking or reasoning and moral conduct are the services of shen. The triangular organic connection of shen is heart, eyes and brain. Brain is the headquarters; heart is the energy supply; eyes are the expressive outlet.

The organic (biological) nature is that five zang (liver, heart, spleen, lungs and kidneys) and six fu (stomach, bladder, gall bladder, large intestine, small intestine and the triple warmer) are constantly vying for energy. As a result, there are six desires (color, sound, fragrance, texture, flavor, thought or reaction). Color is the desire for sex; sound is the desire for voice; fragrance is the desire for smell; texture is the desire for touching and skin connection; flavor is the desire for food; and thought or reaction is the desire for attention and understanding. According to Taoist practice, those biological behaviors are not instinctive. Breathing is the most instinctive behavior of the body. Meditators can gradually reduce the frequency of breathing to that of the earliest embryonic breathing stage. The following exercises are designed to achieve this purpose.

Frolics of Five Animals

Wu Chin Xi

As one of the most popular holistic exercises, Frolics of Five Animals (daiyin) has circulated among meditators, healers and martial arts practitioners for thousands of years. Modern bionics and animal research rely on the same resource from animals. By observing the natural behavior and activities of animals, the corresponding human organs and abilities will be awakened. The ancient sages could stretch their body and bend their necks like a bird, allowing the energy to circulate outside the skin and inside the body so that the sinews and joints remained smooth and flexible. Its purpose is to relax the body, eliminate bad Chi, strengthen physical power, and heal disease. This is the way to challenge disease and the aging process of life.

Tiger's Game: Drop to the ground with both palms and feet flat on the floor, rock forward and draw backward three times. Then stretch the back upward and forward as high as possible without allowing the palms and feet to leave the ground. Then raise the head up to face the sky, walk forward and backward seven times with both hands and feet on the floor.

Fig. 3.18 Tiger Form

Bear's Game: Lie down on your back holding the knees with both hands. Raise the head and lean over to the ground alternating both left and right side seven times each. Then squat on the ground with hands pushing down on the ground. Do seven times each, left and right.

Fig. 3.19 Bear's Form

Deer's Game: Stand on all fours, both hands and feet, stretch the neck up, move the head to the left three times and then to the right three times. Then, while moving the head to the left, stretch the right leg. While moving the head to the right, stretch the left leg. Following this, stretch the neck and tuck in the head three times.

Fig. 3.20 Deer's Form

Monkey's Game:* Hold onto a supportive object, raise and lower the body seven times. Then hook the feet around the supporting object and swing the body forward and backward seven times. Sit and hold both feet with hands, then touch them to the head seven times.

Fig. 3.21 Monkey Form*

Bird's Game: While standing, raise one leg and strenuously stretch both arms while raising the eyebrows fourteen times. Do the same with the other leg. Sit, stretch out the legs, hold the feet with hands, and move each foot forward and backward seven times.

Vitalizing the Body

The cultivation upon transformation marks the gradual process of walking the way of the Tao. It must necessarily begin with a healthy condition (physical, psychological and spiritual), self-awareness and self-trust. With inner trust, action will be willful, practice will be diligent, and learning will be the inevitable result. This walking process time and again reexamines, reevaluates and redirects the self: a scientific practice in its spiritual discipline. The fundamental requirement for this cultivation is developed with the aid of sensory and visual abilities. They will enable you to transform the negative perceptual reaction into a positive one.

In the Taoist view, the positive refers to the yang force, the masculine energy of heavenly light, while the negative is consigned to the yin force or earthly formative energy. A common misconception in Western society holds that the mind is programmed and reinforced by only that which is considered good, positive, productive and beneficial. The outcome between positive and negative forces becomes a rationalized expectation, a desire-driven aspiration, and a constant turmoil. While one side is seemingly so desirable, marketable, healthy and valuable, the positive itself becomes a negative and the other side is distanced, fearful of being troubled, suspiciously incomprehensible, frightened of acceptance. It menacingly approaches evil, the monster, the sickness, the loser, and death itself.

This situation should not be misconstrued as the manifestation of its dualistic nature. It is due largely to the absence of rational mentality from its physical sensibility and the mental visualization created by the mind. In Taoist practice, without physical sensitivity and mental visualization, cultivation is seen as nothing other than mechanistic movements and mental hallucinations. The body must learn to feel its various energetic patterns and their circulation, just as the mind must be “visible” in order to “imagine” the energetic patterns of colors, lights, organs, and cells. Therefore, cultivation becomes an artistic performance. The colors of the sun, moon, mountains, rivers, as well as organs and the meridians are the instrumental requirements. Mental concentration represents the canvas; energetic visualization and biological circulation are the tools, pens and brushes; and body/minded reaction is surrendered to the readers or audience. The entire cultivation forms the learning process of spontaneously knowing, readily evaluating, and timely readapting and reinforming the unpredictable certainty.

No one values us more than we ourselves do; no one knows us better than we ourselves do. Maintaining a strong and healthy body/mind prevents disease from establishing a foothold. The greatest mystery of disease lies in the fact that all negative conscious structures are causes of illnesses, not the cellular formations toward illness. Cells are not the root of the problem since cells derive from non-cells. Consciousness is the underlying root of all, both health and illness. Viruses are neutral, a bridge between health and sickness. Medicinal treatments cannot cope with them all. Cultivation provides the power. Mind over body is not only the most ancient formula but also the most powerful and practical.

Emotional Mood – Activation of Troubles

The weather condition of our life—the mood—is mostly organismic. The seasonal changes, colors, sounds and flavors in the outside world, are invasively stimulating to our seven facial openings. Through the five organic transmitters, the five mood stimuli connect with their internal organs (wuzang) by responding psychosomatically. In Chinese medicine, there is no single headquarters for mood and emotional characters; they are scattered through the area between the trunk and the brain. This differs from Western theories in the fields of phrenology, psychology and neuroscience that stress the mental connection, the power of brain. The energetic meridians in the body are multi-dimensional and create a functional interaction between the body/mind and the universe. These energetic patterns are the personality, character, mood, emotional attribution and vibrational love. Meridians have been subjectively experienced, transpersonally applied, and mechanically diversified depending on specific energy supplies (physical, mental and electronic). Historically, before herbs were meditatively tested and clinically prescribed, meridians were the main communication tools or symbols between the healers and their patients.

The Chinese understanding of mood and its emotional functioning is organically connected and holistically manifested. In the West it appears to be more biologically determined and psychologically interpreted. Stress, in terms of the Taoist explanation, is a mixed reaction between desire and mood. If there is no desire, the mood is stable. If the desire is high, strong and pervasive, there will be an overwhelming emotional reaction. When the organs can no longer regulate each other, the bad Chi alters the healthy bodily condition. Somatic disorders and psychosomatic symptoms appear as stressful characteristics in the body/mind.

Formula of Five Emotional Colors

The purpose of this exercise is to visualize, by drawing the universal energetic color forces. The negative, imbalanced or disharmonized Chi will be either exhaled or transformed, and the positive energetic forces are then restored. Emotional organs become harmonized and pure.

1. Kidneys: Visualize the bright blue light in the sky above; draw the light mentally into the kidneys; let this virtuous energy of gentleness permeate the kidneys. Form it into a virgin boy or virgin girl and let the virgin child breath out the blue-color-breath as a deer. Then form the water element force within the body into the image of a big, black or dark blue turtle (the Black Warrior) which will then capture the deer. Place the turtle on the back of the body as the protective animal.

Fig. 3.23 Kidneys: Shown projecting to the Back and attracting the Turtle Earth Force of the North.

2. Heart: Visualize the bright, red light above the head and in the sky and draw the color mentally into the heart. Feel the illuminating message, the virtuous love, joy, and happiness in the heart. Form it into a virgin child and let it breathe out the red-color-breath as a red pheasant. Then form the fire element force within the body and let the red pheasant embrace the force. Place the red pheasant at the front of the body to serve as the protective animal.

Fig. 3.24 Heart: Shown projecting to the Front and attracting the Pheasant Earth Force of the South.

3. Liver: Visualize the bright, green light above the head and in the sky and draw the color mentally into the liver; let this pure, virtuous energy of kindness penetrate the liver. Form a virgin child and let it breathe out the green-color-breath as a green dragon. Then form the evergreen wood element force within the body and let the green dragon embrace the force. Place the green dragon at the right side as the protective animal.

Fig. 3.25 Liver: Shown projecting to the Right and attracting the Dragon Earth Force of the East.

4. Lungs: Visualize the bright, white color above the head and in the sky and draw the light mentally into both lungs; let this virtuous energy of encouragement pervade the lungs. Form it into a virgin child and let it breath out the white-color-breath as a white tiger. Then form the universal creative force—white—within the body and let the white tiger embrace the force. Place the white tiger on the left side as the protective animal.

Fig. 3.26 Lungs: Shown projecting to the Left and attracting the Tiger Earth Force of the West.

5. Spleen: Visualize the bright, yellow color above the head and in the sky and draw the light mentally into the spleen; let this virtuous energy of fairness and openness vitalize the spleen. Form it into a virgin child and let it breathe out the yellow-color-breath as a yellow phoenix. Then form the earthly creative force—yellow—within the body, and let the yellow phoenix embrace the force. Place the yellow phoenix at the top center of the head as the protective animal.

Chapter IV
Embracing Oneness

抱一

As you begin walking the way of your pilgrimage, your body will be gradually detoxified and vitalized, the mind distilled and tranquil. Life history, whether at the present time or since the beginning of its ageless spiritual core, becomes a vibrating tool for the pilgrim to teach and people to follow. His preaching voice and welcoming arms draw the gathering crowds and clarify the confusion while his wordless teaching and inner discipline generate trust and elevate the spirit. The pilgrimage of spiritual walking is both a purification process and a liberating time, as well as an inner journey and an expressive path. As the pilgrimage continues its course, the body and mind begin their inner and ultimate marital relationship. Within this true spiritual family, the feminine role of realistic attendance harmonizes with the masculine role of self-disciplined guidance. The experiential journey and awakening path walk side by side, promote one another, and refine each other to produce the pure-self. All the personal, social and ancestral relationships are vehicles facilitating this inner sacred relationship. This is the undertaking of the real task of your own pilgrimage, walking with your own past within the confines of your own family.

Fig. 4.1 37th Hexagram (Family)

In I Ching, the 37th hexagram (Family) expresses this notion precisely, the family of two seeds: the conscious head and instinctive head of man within the family of sun, solar light above and solar wind below. In this hexagram, the wind constantly blows the fire at bottom, spreading nutrition to all the living creatures and serving as a guiding angel to the existing souls on earth. The function of wind in Family is obvious: to awake, guide, direct and discipline. As described in the Chinese dictionary, the character “wind” represents the driving force that gives birth to worms and parasites." A biological worm normally takes eight days to transform itself. An annual cycle takes eight wind-periods to blow from one Winter Solstice to the next. The eight wind periods within a year guide accordingly the eight moon phases within a month, with 45 degrees in each phase, manifesting together daily, with 45 days in each period. This all lies within the power of eight, the shao (young) yin, the sheep, and the separation after union. The Chinese character "ba" for eight indicates the separation of the union from six (liu) and the breakthrough of seven (Chi). Its structure depicts two persons sleeping back to back. This is also the power of eight hexagrams in I Ching, the trinity of the harmony of yin and yang, the inner and outer connection of the four corners of the world, and the manifestation of three. Tao gives rise to one. One gives rise to two. Two gives rise to three. Three gives rise to all things.

The meditative power of wind, representing upper trigram in Family hexagram, is located in a northeast direction: the trigram of Ken (mountain). It applies to the gentle, warm breezes of gentle spring wind. It represents conscious awakening, tender loving, peaceful awareness, and careful direction. Wind is the inhalation of cosmic breathing while light is that of exhalation. In our body, wind represents the respiration of lungs, the wheel of the thighs, the drumming of the ears, and the vibration of temples. The personal wind is the conscious sensation and reflection; physical wind is the psychic direction; family wind is the father's guiding role; social wind is the governing principle; inner wind is the holy fire/water, or the spiritual mind. In the worldly sense, wind represents the direction of physical sensation, the degree of cosmic vibration, and the intensity of interaction between light and its form: the void.

In contrast, the fire, being at the bottom position, represents the power for purification and transformation. Heat generated through fire must be in a condensed flowing form to allow its flame to purify all things along its awakening course: a combined task of inner consciousness and biological process. The inner consciousness, representing the spiritual wind and stillness, chills down or heats up the intensity of loving fire, thereby ensuring purification, completion, and transformation. Meanwhile, there must be a place to produce the heat.

Fig. 4.2 50th Hexagram (Cauldron)

This place is called cauldron (50th hexagram), the family kitchen within the body, an empty center in the abdomen. This center is neither an organ nor a gland, but the imaginary space in between. Cauldron is the invisible spiritual womb, the holy embryo. The holy water of biological fluid is contained within the cauldron with conscious fire of love boiling and cooking beneath it. The stillness guides the individual process with its relaxed posture and focused awareness. The internalized heat boils the biological water—sexual fluid—into elixir. Without this, self is lost, family is in turmoil and society becomes chaotic.

Walking the way in this lifetime can be likened to walking through the jungles, undergoing trials and puzzles of life by restoring your own child-like free-flowing nature. This is referred to as returning to childhood and becoming a "born-again," the process of embracing the Oneness, or knowing the son and holding onto the mother, or donning the hun and po and drawing them into Oneness. Oneness is the first and the oldest child of Tao, permitting all manifesting, total embracing, subtle penetrating and complete managing. This Oneness is the seed of whole, concord and integrity. It is the single, pure, primary, primordial and illuminating yang Chi of the Universe. It is also the hermaphroditic Godhead, or the androgynous womb of the world. The activity of embracing is a process of gathering energy through the concentration of mind: a psychospiritual process of unifying heavenly and earthly Chi. The purpose of preserving Chi is to unify both sides of the complete self, a biological process of returning to an undivided form of androgyny. This is the "pure matter" of Oneness: the necessary preparation to complete before entering the heavenly realm.

Perceptual Unification of the Oneness

The practice of unifying all perceptual faculties is a practice of unifying the feelings, sensations, inspirations and wisdom into one: one-sense, God-sense, true sense, and pure sense. It is a total and comprehensive body/minded awareness, complete and spontaneous interaction, subtle and penetrative knowing around. It is comparable to seeing one's entire history from birth to death, encompassing the known and unknown. In high stage meditation practice, the six senses (visual, auditory, smell, taste, touch and thinking) must be united. All aspects of a person, biological, emotional, intellectual and spiritual must be unified into one perception: the combination of original spiritual perception and actual realistic perception. The spiritual perception is the highest form of perceptivity as well as the guiding principle of knowing and understanding. The actual realistic perception we can aspire to is the most reliable and trustworthy perception. The underlying path is the experiential journey: the divine meaning of the wisdom tradition.

Taoist Approach

The gut feeling is the most instinctive common experience shared by all, whether it arises as doubt or misunderstanding, trust or mistrust. The information is immediately perceived with no time or opportunity for organic interaction and emotional counter-play. This is the cleansing, the formation and the flow of the world. In this perceptual and perceived environment, all the five sensory abilities and five organic functions are completely centralized. The three energy Fields are in one place, with no mental distraction and no spiritual wandering. As the opening at bottom is closed, the sexual Chi flows upwardly and inwardly. Lao Tzu has summarized this as thirty spokes joined at one hub, yet it is the emptiness inside the hub that makes the vehicle useful. Thirty spokes refer to the five facial organs (eyes, ears, nostril, mouth and tongue), five internal organs (liver, heart, spleen, lungs and kidneys), ten fingers and ten toes. The one hub is the one spinal column of vertebrate, particularly the tailbone, which connects to the empty center of heart. This is based precisely upon the numerical changes of universal orders appearing between the River Chart (He-tu) and the Luo Drawing (Luo-shu).*

Fig. 4.3 River Chart (Hetu)

Fig. 4.4 Luo River Graph (Luoshu)

When the cosmic completion of ten was eliminated because of corruptive creation, the three rings from the River Chart were combined as a single ring in the Luo Drawing. Thus, birth (inhalation), life (transformation) and death (exhalation) are integrated between the original creation of ten (1 + 2 + 3 + 4) and the outer ring of thirty (6 + 7 + 8 + 9). The outer ring of thirty is the meaning of thirty spokes.

Mystic Chart of I Ching, Hetu, or the River Chart

The only difference between Eastern mysticism and that of the West lies in the difference that in the east the numerical construction is 55 while in the west it is 76 or 78.

The total number presented in Hetu is 55, and it has four rings. In the center is the cosmic five elements. Surrounding the five is the completion of ten, in all realms. Then, outside the ten is the company of another ten, the sum of one to four, as the four corners of the universe and internal construction of universe within. The outer layer is thirty, six to nine, which is what Lao Tzu referred to as thirty spokes in chapter eleven.

The original God's completion changed from Hetu to Luoshu, the Luo-drawing. The ten in the second ring are destroyed, due to the cosmic corruption. The three outer rings are blended into one ring as a result of the change of direction. Three in the left and seven in the right becomes the 37 seven chapters in the Tao Te Ching. This is due to the change of the center—the seed in the middle accompanied by the four numbers around. So only 45 is left in the Luo-drawing, which is the magic box of nine, the arrangements are: 2-9-4 are in the top role, 7-5-3 are in the middle role, and 6-1-8 are in the bottom role. As for this order, any of the combination is 15, or three-fives, which are the Confucian's teaching of three disciplines and five orders.

Also, mystic power of eight extra meridians are arranged as follows: First, there are four or eight in the lower dantian (Tan Tien), two adrenal glands work together with two ovarian/testicle glands, two kidneys working together with small/large intestines. The center is bladder, the fifth or eleventh one. This is the original map of eight meridians, depending on the thrusting power, the power of will and sexual expression, going either upward/inward, or downward or outward. If it is the internal power, it is the spiritual procreation; if the second, it is the offspring.

As these eight meridians move up, there are two other sets of eight circulating in the brain. Among them the thalamus, hypothalamus and pituitary glands are the triad of three in the brain. If they are controlled by the amygdala, it is the emotional, intuitive and psychic awareness. These four glands work together with the four ventricles inside the brain.

Words have their origin, numbers have their meanings, and events have their leader. Lao Tzu seldom used numbers in his teaching, but all the numbers he did choose to use in Tao Te Ching have precise meanings. For example, the phrase “ten and three” represents a genetically coded and cosmically numbered journey of life within the completion of ten and trial function of birth, life and death. Ten in Chinese culture represents the completion of numerical functioning coming after nine, which is the biggest and highest cardinal number. Ten and three represent the numerical order of universal manifestation. All matter lives within the cycle of birth, growth, death and rebirth, within the cyclical manifestation of ten and three. Without ten, there will be no complete and perfect presence of matter with its myriad forms and motions. Each stage and every state is perfect in itself, but hardly permanent because stage and state are ever in constant flux. Yet all the perfection as well as the shifting variations are within the mechanism of the universal secret coding system: three from one. This is the way the universal matters transform themselves from the cyclical and incarnating process of production into the recycling and reincarnating process of repetition. On and on, over and over, ceaselessly, there is never a resolution. This is the nature of the heavenly product, the completion of ten. This is also due to the universal cyclical number of three that contains the mechanisms of yin and yang and their harmonious flow: the representation of multiplicity. Acts upon/within good timing is an accurate characterization of the flow.

If the three glands are controlled by the pineal gland, it is spiritual, wisdom and intellectual power. The four lobes surrounding the brain are the illuminating, echoing coming through these four glands. So now we have two interactive maps of eight extra meridians, between emotion and body or between wisdom and body. The two sets of four in the brain are the mystic functioning of 44, the volume of Te.

This is the nature of transforming seven emotions and six desires in our Taoist tradition. As the positive emotions are transformed, they become the wisdom illumination. As for the negative emotions, they become the virtuous and mystic awareness practice. So, Tao and Te are unified, and body and mind reach their final marriage.

Scientific Manipulation

The historical development of science is based upon the rational mind, dogmatic institution and religious practice of Western culture. When the rational mind becomes the defining line between yes and no, when dogmatic institution separates man from God, when the religious practice condemns human beings as sinful by nature, institutional religious worship is transformed into personal scientific devotion. Rational dogma becomes scientific law. Mental products replace natural products. The position that the rational mentality takes is that "yes" is absolutely "yes" and "no" is absolutely "no," having no connecting link. This mentality of separation and isolation gradually arrives at its dominant position in the history of human evolution. Its fine line becomes the lineal notion of universal law; its method and technical device become the social justice. Consequently, communication in our complex society thrives on the usage of scientific vocabularies, rational hypotheses and statistical lies. Those who are unfamiliar with the terms are often classified as uneducated and alienated indigenous beings.

In our present time, the power of science can often supply instant gratification. Yesterday's scientific fact may be disproved by tomorrow's new theory derived from a different calculation through a more advanced technology. It is a merciless pronouncement, a dream-catching imagination, and an ultimate self-rejection. The scientific measurement is based upon the repetition of research and recycling between the two as well as the statistical calculation and evaluation of one and three: one is the discovery stage; three is the marketing practice; two is the marriage between subjectivity and objectivity. This is the abstract point, the rational law, and the fine line of scientific view as it results in a distortion of our natural rhythm. Harmony is diversified into classification and categorization, and flow is the commercial advertisement and stock fluctuation at the expense of a natural cycle. Lao Tzu's statement of acting upon/within good timing becomes an old-fashioned concept, one that is easily discarded. We have locked ourselves into a pattern of self-destruction, forgetting that our advancement relies on going with the flow, on adapting and coping with changing circumstances. When an unexpected turn of events occurs, we are woefully unprepared to accept the changes. As the situations become more chaotic and beyond our control, the boss blames the employees,

When science discovered the growth hormone, its potential appeared to be unequaled but quickly went awry in experimentation, having developed as a malignancy in the stomach. Those affected could choose to either live with their condition or take drastic measures, including surgical removal of the resultant tumor.

With the invention of the digital satellite cable communication system we could watch TV (our own image) in our home. Yet this advanced technology is hardly more than the small mirror carried in a woman's purse. When scientific knowledge led to the invention of machines such as automobiles, the poisoned air of the exhaust system leached into our lungs. It then escalated further, developing into our present smog-filled polluted atmosphere that in turn led to an array of disabling diseases.

When the scientists buried their nuclear waste in the ground, it seeped into our drinking water and contaminated the soil that grows our food and the home where we reside. With the invention of bottled formula, babies were deprived of nature's perfect nutrition that would enable them to develop a strong immune system.

Finally, organic receptors are extended by technological equipment; organic malfunctions are replaced with transplants. Satellites replace the welcoming open invitation of God in His heavenly realm; telemarketing becomes the biophysiological gratification; technological reinvestment and advancement become the ultimate psychospiritual gurus. All the mechanical techniques we have accumulated throughout our civilization, especially from the modern scientific revolution, are at the very least partially removed from the natural phenomena of change.

Directed by the mind's anticipation, natural reaction evolves into mental projection. The world shrinks, dominated by competition, verging on the catastrophic. As science progresses and matures, its natural limitation will invite a backlash, the ultimate punishment for manipulating the sacred mechanism of nature.

Belly – Energetic Bank of Oneness

Lao Tzu ascertains that belly is the method of being. Belly is where God's tombs—sacral and tailbones—rest, how the Chi of life is directed, and why we exist and continue to be. Through the navel or the Old Gate in Biblical tradition, life is given. Cosmic knowledge of corruption becomes a biological mechanism, eternal life evolves into the two worlds—living reality and dream reality—charged by the changing modality of presence.

When the energy gathered from above the head (the universal Chi) and below the feet (the earthly Chi) is stored at the Lower Cinnabar Field, it becomes a process of unifying all into Oneness. This is the only purpose as well as the habitual activity of Lao Tzu's daily life practice to sustain from the mother source; experiencing the meaning and usefulness of Oneness. In daily life, the Lower Cinnabar Field becomes an energetic bank that generates the body and mind to act in a harmonious pattern rather than a reproductive device to discharge the vital force. In this "field," the kidney "water" provides the basic nutrition for the body and mind by circulating its Chi up and down along the Microcosmic Orbit in the same manner as well water or a mountain spring.

Fungi – Food of Oneness

In Taoist tradition, a fast is a discipline used to cleanse the body. It has been applied since early times to abstain from grain consumption, to enable the body to return to its nomadic diet of herbs, fungi and mushrooms. This ancient practice of abstinence is called "Bigu," with "bi" defined as "be away from" or "cut off", and "gu" for "valley" or "grain." Grain in meditation practice is considered a solid food. To consume this heavy food hinders the practice of advancement, making it more difficult or even impossible.

Each herb is a natural plant with its own energy quality of color, flavor and energy substance. By taking natural herbs and mushrooms, the body will return to its light condition allowing the Chi of air and light to easily enter and flow through. When water combines with air and light, the body receives the average adult requirement. The minerals in the body do not fluctuate at the same speed as vegetative elements. They are the basic substances and building blocks of the body, and fungi are most beneficial because they belong to the earliest family of biological formation on earth. By consuming this, the physical body, the most highly developed organism on earth, will revert to its original fungus state. You will come to rely more directly on the Chi of heaven and earth—oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen and different particles that constitute heat and light—to replace the ordinary food consumption. This is the practice of hibernation (as some animals do during winter season) and metamorphoses (transforming worm-state bodies into flying beings). Taoists follow this path. Meditating in caves, they will directly absorb cosmic yang Chi as well as air, water molecules and minerals. Meditation becomes the sum of all life activities.

Gehong, a famous Taoist Master of the second century, wrote the first summary on the Taoist fasting practice of using natural elements such as fungi and herbs. He stated that those who consume plants are good at walking but dumb. Those who consume meat are more powerful but tend to be aggressive. Those who eat grain are intelligent but do not live long. Those who eat fungi become spiritual and will not die, because the spirit never dies.

Vision of Oneness

Lao Tzu realized that when he centered himself, sensory receptors became useless before the "eye" of the Tao. Look for it and not see it, it is called invisible; listen for it and not hear it, it is called inaudible; reach for it and not touch it, it is called intangible. The invisible, inaudible and intangible is the manifestation of the Tao. Our bodily mechanical tools for seeing, hearing and touching are limited to the formal and materialistic environment. They manifest only through the appearance of the Form, the multiplicity of One, and the creation of Non-being. The nature of Oneness, at any level and any time, is beyond our bodily communicable capacity. The invisible is the fine color that eyes cannot see. The inaudible is the subtle vibration that ears cannot hear. The intangible is the pure appearance that the hands and bodily skin cannot touch.

Pure color is beyond reckoning even if our eyes were endowed with the maximum capacity for sight to visualize as clearly as a microscope or a telescope. Our ears may be equipped with digital audio devices to enhance sound, yet subtle vibration is beyond our detection. Our hands reach beyond the tangible appearance of matter, yet we cannot grasp pure appearance. These three are beyond reckoning since Nature's true state is beyond any mechanical calculation employed by our human mentality. Yet, when these three are merging together, they are One. As for this One, there is nothing above it remaining to be accounted for, there is nothing below it that has been excluded. Ever searching for it, it is beyond naming. It returns to no-thing. Its state is described as no state, its form is described as formless. It is called the vision beyond focus. Follow after it, and it proves endless. Go before it, and no beginning can be found.

By employing the Tao of today, we can manage today's affairs and know the ancient past. Nothing is old and nothing is new. Everyday is the same day, and every year is the same year. Everything is here now and completely present before us. We have no need to study history to know the past, to live the present, and to predict the future. Whether yesterday was inaudible, or today is intangible, or tomorrow will be invisible matters not at all. This is the power of knowing around and the spiritual presence practice.

Psycho-Spiritual Unification

The Taoist cultivation practice is psycho-spiritual in its nature. Willpower—the best weapon of mind—is essential for the transformation of the spiritual upon the biophysiological. Without psychological unification, the energy cannot be centered and crystallized. For example, the endocrine and immune systems, so essential to our existence, would dissolve into nothing more than superstitious institutional practice. The Oneness of yin and yang cannot possibly be reunited. Therefore, psychological transformation is a means and a must. Through this transformation, the process of drawing the spirit and soul into Oneness has its necessary outcome. The biophysiological nature of yin (female) and yang (male) will inevitably return to their complete and unified Oneness: androgynous unity.

Biophysical Oneness – the Androgynous Self

In theology and spiritual practice, sacred water has been an inescapable topic. Primarily, it is used to purify the body and cleanse the spirit, which is accomplished through various religious ceremonies. There is a similarity in the conventional practice of Taoism in the aspect of healing. It defines the sacred water as the combination of bone marrow and hormonal fluid. In the depths of esoteric cultivation,sacred water or essential Jing from the Lower Cinnabar Field (cauldron) responds to the challenge of the sacred spirit. The pure person or androgynous self is then stored at the Middle Cinnabar Field (thymus/heart) through the fusion of five organic Chi.

By understanding the male and holding onto the female, we see that heaven and earth combine and allow sweet dew. When the essential Jing of kidney Chi along the spine reaches the cerebrum in the brain it will invite the conscious fire by gathering the ethereal breath: the pure light. The mixed yin essence and the ethereal breath unify to produce a material we call nectar, sweet dew or sacred water. As this nectar flows down into the mouth, it is no longer saliva but jade-fluid, prepared to assimilate with thyroid and parathyroid glands for the purpose of purifying the five organic Chi in the chest.

The most effective times to purify sacred water and produce sweet dew are: eleven p.m. to one a.m., three to five a.m., and the emerging state of sexual arousal, what ever time that might be. From eleven p.m. to one a.m., the earthly yin Chi is replaced by the solar yang Chi. From three to five a.m., the kidney meridian activates kidney Chi, releasing both the essential sexual Chi produced and the leftover materials (urine and bowel activity). It is the time when the spirit power overtakes the ghost power. Yet, the sexual arousal state, called “huo-zi-shi” or live-eleven-one period, is the most precious time to practice the sacred water gathering.

Exercises:

1. For the male, place the thumb and middle finger of both hands together, then visualize the “head” of the standing penis. When the penis is relaxed, visualize your two testes with two eyes. After this, rest the conscious mind at the level of the cerebrum. The sexual Chi will then be reabsorbed.
2. For the female, massage the breasts as you visualize the clitoris and follow your breath. Then draw the sexual Chi from the clitoris upward following a line (the white line) to the central point between the breasts. Following this, connect this portion of Chi with the thyroid and parathyroid glands. Store the final Chi—mixed at the center between the second and third ribs—behind the sternum, that is the center of lungs and thymus gland.

   This crystallized Chi will cleanse the psychosomatic problems caged in the chest, reduce the amount of flow during the period, and invite the virgin boy (spiritual light) into the flower to produce the spiritual seed: golden elixir.

As Lao Tzu has illustrated, understanding the male and holding on to the female refers to biological construction of yin and yang. Understanding the pure and holding on to the impure refers to the state of yin and yang. And understanding the white and holding on to the black refers to the appearance of yin and yang. The flow of the world, the cleansing of the world and the formation of the world are the three natural characters of yin and yang. Yin is female: the impure and black; yang is male: pure and white. The flow is the combination of pure and impure: the formation of black and white. The childhood is the unification of yin and yang: a simple state of cleansing and having an ongoing sufficed action that does not stray. This state is also an infinite state of the returning act of Tao; the mechanism is to simplify the action of pure yang and impure yin. From within the murky comes the stillness. The feminine enlivens with her milk. The seed of stillness is alive within the murky matter, the mother. In turn, the life force—milk—is produced to nourish the growth of a life: the transformation of seed. The mother has the murky body, draws the stillness, and produces the substances of the Tao: sacred water and milk. Keeping such a Tao, excess is undesirable. Desiring no excess, work is completed without exhaustion. From this, Lao Tzu says that the sage makes it the head ruler. By doing so, the great ruling never divides.

Psycho-Spiritual Oneness – the God like Self

The religious notion of marrying God is described by Lao Tzu as donning the spirit and soul and drawing them into Oneness. Then the true self will never depart. This translates as: through reserving the action of flowing energy, the desire is reduced; through the process of gathering heavenly Chi, the conduct of po will be controlled. When there is a peaceful mind, hun's mental conscious activity will return to shen's pure conscious state: the ability of knowing and the capacity of anticipating within and without. This returning is the act of Tao.

The psychospiritual Oneness is based upon the combination of biophysical Oneness and the heavenly yang Chi. It is pure light or the unified three states of color: the formal state (constructive state) of the golden spiritual light, the cleansing state (creative state) of the white evergreen blue, and the mechanical state (returning state) of the procreative universal white force. The psycho-spiritual Oneness is an energy manipulation process based upon the quality of virtue and its deeds produced. The person who works according to Tao unites with Tao. In the same ways he unites with Te. In the same ways he unites with loss. Uniting with Te, the Tao becomes Te. Uniting with loss, the Tao becomes loss. Tao never loses but is transmitted into either Action (Te) or loss. If your purpose in life is the acquisition of material things, especially the prominent name and possessions accumulated, you will inevitably end up with loss. If you want to unite with the Action of Tao, you will lose everything but not the Action of Tao. If you want to be united with Tao, you will lose everything but not the Tao.

We can disregard our mental projections and appraisals to concentrate on making a right judgment of the reality of nature, embracing and uniting with it. There is little difference between a patriot and a killer, a party and a gang or a saint and a sinner. Since each depends upon the other for its existence, all that matters is the "fine line" where one is standing. This "fine line" is the intention of mind guarded by soul, heart and spirit, and the action of the body/mind process. If the intention is selfless, there is no cause for concern. Just be who you are and do what you must. You can save someone's life through kindness or destroy a relationship by misusing the kindness. You can save someone's life through justice or kill him by restoring the established justice. If an action requires you to step with the right foot, then action with the left foot will bring trouble.

Mystical Female 素女

The body is a mystic field, whether male or female. There are three areas representing the mystic female. The first area is that of the perineum where the biological seed of love that gives birth to new life is received. The second area is in the thymus gland for receiving the love of light and the lost self. The third one is the pituitary gland that receives the cosmic power and spiritual understanding.

Fig.4.5 Well Valley, Thymus and Pituitary Glands are the Mystic Triad.

The first area exemplifies the oceanic, unconscious and life-death state. When a practitioner concentrates on the perineum pressure point and muscles, they will experience the union between a vagina and its partner penis. For the female practitioner, when the energy runs directly from perineum to vulva and to clitoris, the heat generated from contraction will naturally run into the ovaries to internally transform the eggs into useful substances to sustain her body.

In regard to the male, all the muscles around the perineum pressure point should be open and in a relaxed state. Restrained and tightened muscles signal all chronic conditions, e.g. lower back pain, sciatica, premature ejaculation, impotence, fear, low self-esteem and poor mental performance. Most importantly, lower sexual energy results in poor mental function and vice versa.

The second area, for opening the gate of unconditional and selfless love, lies in the thymus gland. When the thymus gland lacks resource of itself, it reveals the traits of selfishness and discrimination and egotism. While unifying with the lost love, this gland becomes the sacred vessel in which to manifest a consciously selfless and blissful love. Anyone who has not unified with the lost love within, will become the loser in a love relationship regardless of past history. Any long-term relationship requires constant sacrifice that in turn provides the opportunity for liberation and growth. Marriage, both biological and soulful, is a false promise underlying a karmic blockage between the two, and an opportunity to transform it. Neither participant can live what the other must and neither promising soul can satisfy the other lost soul. Terminating a relationship before transforming the karmic blockage will bring disaster to both the self and the ongoing relationship. A promise, in itself, demonstrates a precise lack of self-esteem and trust. Spirit has no reason to promise anything. The ultimate union—spirit and love—cannot live up to the high standard of self-promise and sworn vows.

In the third area, the most rewarding experience is awakening the unconscious that is stored in the abdominal area and the emotional love residing in the chest. This can occur when the active mind is stilled and the pituitary gland is calm as its hormone-directing functions are balanced and minimal. In sustained conditions of darkness meditation (such as in a mountain cave), this desirable subtle effect is especially profound when the pineal gland becomes the energy center—the entire biological process of life is altered. The triad relationship among spirit, love and pineal gland will create the finest marriage on earth and in heaven: oneness.

Nature and Culture of Psychospiritual Oneness

The time of year doesn't matter as long as we can gather energy from the outside world. If we are capable of knowing, we have no need to protect ourselves. When we are united with Oneness, it is not necessary to name it. If we call it God, Brahma, Allah, Nirvana, the Ultimate, Tao, or "whatever" is immaterial. This is the nature of psychospiritual Oneness as experienced and embraced by all enlightened individuals, from the time of the earliest religious founders into the far-reaches of the unknown future. They have no need to be embraced or revered. They care only about their potential to be one with the Tao, not of our expectations, beliefs and values. They examine us with subtle understanding, offering no response to our demanding minds and adorned bodies. They are so immersed in remaining in this state that they value it more highly than they do their own lives. All they require from us is our readiness.

What we must first know and understand is the prerequisite demand of total commitment to the connection between them and us. The enlightened ones are the images, the pictures and the lights seen by our envisioned spirits. They can transform a certain power within us, but cannot maintain our physical bodies. Neither can we depend entirely on them. We must feed ourselves, which involves gathering the Chi and cultivating ourselves. Never think that because we believe them, they will supply us with everything we need. Know that our ego mind will not please them. There has been no evidence that any religious founder or a spiritually enlightened person did not need to first experience his biophysiological process from birth to death. What we are struggling to learn today is how to integrate their life experiences and fundamental teachings within our daily practice. A sage, a true spiritual doctor, can help us open the door to the wondrous core of our longings, but to do so we must surrender to our true nature—our complete self—to absolute freedom and creative spontaneity.

Religious practice is partly cultural ramification; religious beliefs are culturally defined ideas. In Taoist terms the goal of entering the Tao is to be One with Tao. Certain useful cultural practices are shamanistic healing and I Ching counseling. The most powerful of these cultural aids are the Tao and yin/yang, but they are neither culturally concluded nor limited within their own cultural framework. Living beyond culture and self is the ideal model of Taoist cultivation towards psychospiritual Oneness.

Historically, our ancestor(s) lived with only one connection, one faith and one belief. The connection is between the self and universe, the faith is between the self and God, and the belief is the pure spiritual knowing and the mental conscious practice. Since we have the connection between our biological parents and spiritual parent, we have more detailed beliefs than faith and more mechanical techniques than beliefs. We have moved from the river banks to the ocean beaches, and have shifted from a spiritual connection to scientific imagination. Our spring water is now a mixed drink, the spiritual belief becomes a scientific paradigm, and the mental connection develops into a mechanical operation. There is more pollution than there is untouched nature. There are more activities—a mixture of good and bad—than pure conscious acts and virtuous deeds.

The greatest task in cultivation is the restoration of this. It can be accomplished by focusing inwardly where intention and perceptual awareness become totally interactive guiding steps. When the organic functions are centralized, and their organic appearances merge with universal light, the “eyes” will see naturally the internal organic colors, their metabolic functioning, the past experiences and future events. The “ears” will hear the vibratory activities of natural phenomena. The mind regains its shen’s ability of knowing by unifying hun and po as well as reducing xin’s demands and po’s desire. Working hard for continuing existence will be replaced by active meditation practice. The daily conscious state and nightly dreaming state will merge into one. Sex life will be internally balanced and neutralized. Name and fame will be expanded into the image of universal activity. Possession and obsession transform into kindness, caring and giving. Out-of-body experience, near-death experience, extrasensory perceptions, being one with the universe, stoppage of time, and finally being One with God will be the accumulating grand experiences.

Three Oneness

There are three types of reunions in life experience. They are namely: biophysical marriage, ideal connection, and spiritual reunion commonly called “marrying to God.” The biophysical marriage is the connection of the yin and yang kidney Chi. Climax is its peak experience, followed by the products of offspring. The ideal connection is the mental communication between yin type of humanly hun and yang type of universal mechanism. The peak experience is the insightfulness and thorough mental clarity. The products are the ideas, thoughts and all the manifested products dealing with understanding of nature and the evolution of civilization. Spiritual marriage is the connection of bodily pure yang force and heavenly yang force. The peak experience is bliss. The products are pure persons or God’s children.

Among these three, the first reunion is the earthly one of a couple. Though they enjoy the process and experience Oneness, the act is a simultaneous exchange between death and birth. The Oneness is the reunion of the two suffused, separated and manifested entities of yin and yang, of male and female, of anima and animus. It is originally, in itself, the complete Oneness, which is also three.

As for the ideal connection, the subjective side is the pure internal connection between mental flash and light, self and thought, insightfulness and experience, hun’s soulful consciousness and shen's pure consciousness, idea and reality, and reality and eternity. After these subjects are transformed into letters and numbers, tools and machines, their end result is totally unlike its original form. The process is ongoing from individual identity to professional practice, from self-discovery to social justification, from internal understanding to culturalization. Their duality exists between voice and order, conscience and justice, convenience and practice.

It is this individual action and the cultural process that gives rise to inventions, which become highly prized and valuable, but serve only to make our lives more miserable. In life, we have innumerable choices but they are all based on the parents we chose. In society, we can enjoy freedom but perhaps not its cultural practice. In government, we speak out with conviction concerning our personal views but have little to say about its political structures. In worship, we can be entranced with esoteric experiences but cannot openly challenge any religious belief. We could blame our parents for our imperfections just as we could blame society for imposing its standard but limited cultural practices, which are based upon the mental creativity, discovery, legislature and sanction of a limited few.

This is why the Taoist cultivation opens still another door, a new road for those who are unhappy with restraints inherited from their parents and their society, for those who long to be themselves. To be a Taoist is to have the smallest mind, make the least number of choices and enjoy the most freedom. The only choice to be made is to follow in the footsteps of the sage, going backward and being One with the Tao. It is not another mandatory rule; it is reverting to the original unified nature where we are meant to be. The life of a sage creates no social ramification since he lives beyond social qualification and cultural limitation. This is why being One with Tao means abandoning the egoistic mind and self-inhibited culture.

To move forward is to have the actual experience of psycho-spiritual transformation. Without this valuable experience the transformation will appear to be a fictitious writing. It will be interpreted from the standpoint of liberal arts, and the writings will be treated as the writer's creative thoughts rather than a truthful and earthly experience. Of course, one could still maintain that visualization is a tool for both creative writing and meditation practice. Without any hands-on experience, it would be a difficult task to differentiate between the scripture of the phenomenological results of meditation and the literature viewed as fictitious scenarios. Generally speaking, most people enjoy reading fiction rather than religious or meditative material.

The main difference between meditators and writers is that meditators have no need to record the experience as has been done traditionally by all the esoteric religions. Jesus, one of the best meditators in the history of the world, wrote nothing himself. The purpose of writing is not the importance of the material itself as much as the preservation and passing on of the tradition. To those who do so, writing is their livelihood. If their writings are not published, staged, or screened into TV or movies, they have no profession.

Another consideration is that some meditators may be writers, and some writers may be meditators. However, not all meditators are writers and not all writers are meditators. A good meditator has no need to write, since meditation is not based upon linguistic ability and writing skills. All that is needed is a good heart and a selfless faith followed by diligent practice. Heart carries the faith into diligent practice. By contrast, a good writer should be a good meditator. It is in the practice of meditation that thought surfaces, quality is ensured and the mind can express the meaning of words. Meditation experiences are based solely upon the careful preservation of retained Oneness.

Fig. 4.6 Wu Chi - The Universe

Oneness is the first and oldest child to which the Tao gives birth. Existing within this oneness are the co-dependent, co-existent and co-supportive forces of two. This two is the harmony of yin and yang. When yin and yang unite, combining their opposite forces, three—the son of all sons, the copy of all copies, and the seed of myriad things in the world—is produced. This is the evolutionary process defined as Tao gives rise to one; one gives rise to two; two gives rise to three; three gives rise to all things.

When Tao enlivens, it fuses, suffuses and diffuses into the form of matters. The function of the Tao is the fusion within harmonious emptiness. The role of the Tao is taken over by the Action (or the virtuous Te) since Tao is lost into the harmonious existence of yin and yang. Through the goodness, kindness and nourishment of action by the Mystic Female or Divine Mother, matter enters into existence. This matter is the seed of all matters. It is the mechanism that generates and regenerates all existing matters. Matter is the form of the world, while mechanism is the operation of the world. In our everyday existence language is the mechanism of mind; cooking is the mechanism of the stomach; books are the mechanism of the scholar. Words and ideas are the mechanism of intelligence, machines are the mechanism of science, the surgeon is the mechanism of bodily reconstruction, nonattachment is the mechanism of a healthy mind, and illumination is the mechanism of spiritual enlightenment. Most importantly, sex is the mechanism of life and death.

From the earliest beginnings of our human form, the original mechanism has been the single, pure, primary, primordial and illuminating yang Chi: the seed with the potential of suffusing into two. This seed carries the potential of the co-existence of Father-Mother or Progenitor-Progenitrix as well. The loving force of Chi draws them together into a temporal union, thus giving birth to the three: the origin of our biological self. Chinese mythology tells us that human beings have existed since the earthly Mother received Chi, God's sexual energy of illuminating light and cosmic orgasm. She felt suddenly a complete orgasm (sexual, emotional, intellectual and spiritual) within herself. Her two children, brother/husband Fuxi and sister/wife Nuwa, became the common ancestors. Nuwa established the first law in China to abandon the practice of marriage between siblings as a result of their tragic experience. Fuxi went on to devise the practices of worship and accounting, as well as the understanding of the Eight Diagrams. He taught his children how to fish and hunt.

The incestuous taboo between siblings is the most forbidding disclosure of our common secret: we are all brothers and sisters. Our parents as well as our grandparents were brothers and sisters. For this reason any sexual activity is religiously sinful. It sheds light on why, generation after generation, we have been constantly and continuously searching, trying to unify yet constantly and sadly failing. The separated and lost Self opens its arms, always inviting us into its embrace, always elusive, finally rejected. We cannot grasp it. The sacred mechanism of the world cannot be manipulated. Those who manipulate fail, those who hold on to it lose.

The hidden truth is that we all have the male and female selves within us: the brotherhood and sisterhood of our biological ancestor. We are as lonely as widow and orphan without support. Widow is our Great Mother, and orphan is her child who is not being supported and cared for by its heavenly Father. But Lords and rulers name themselves these. Any individual who is crowned becomes the ultimate orphan on earth and in that country, since no one else can sit in his chair and no other person can speak for him: only God. He speaks to the people on behalf of our creator God. This chair is the ultimate prison on earth, more solitary than spirit. Sage will never occupy the palace; he could never be happy nor even exist in such a self-restrained position.

Outcome of Cultivation

Lao Tzu has written with detailed and poetic expression about the nature and the history of attaining and preserving the Oneness. He summarizes the lives of those in the past who have attained Oneness through natural phenomena of human experience. His defining words are: by attaining Oneness, heaven is clear. By attaining Oneness, earth is at peace. By attaining Oneness, the spirit is quickened. By attaining Oneness, the valley is filled. By attaining Oneness, the king puts order in the whole world. All these result from Oneness. Without its clarity, heaven is liable to explode. Without its peace, earth is liable to erupt. Without its quickening, the spirit is liable to die out. Without its fullness, valleys are liable to dry out. Without proper esteem, the king is liable to fall. Esteem is rooted in the humble. The high is founded upon the low. This is why the lords and rulers call themselves widows and orphans without support. Is this not the root of being humble? Much praise amounts to no praise. Without preference, being is as resonant as Jade and as gravelly as stone. Yield, and retain integrity. In the depths there is stillness. The hollow enables the plentiful. The old gives way to the new. The small allows for increase. Excess breeds confusion. Therefore the sage holds oneness as the shepherd of the world.

The quality and meaning of life is all contained in the One. As the Chinese have philosophically defined it: one is all and all is one. We have one life to live on earth at this time, regardless of the history of our past or the hope for the future. If we waste it or destroy it, there is no more chance at this life. Life is regarded as a very serious matter. If we do not open ourselves to this solemn truth, we will lose our spirit-self in our downward spiral to our ultimate destination: death. Lao Tzu has wisely concluded that the reason people are not serious about death is because they seek the burdens of life.

Chapter V
World of the Sage

What is a Sage?

Historically, the sage has occupied the highest intellectual position known to man, being possessed of the deepest moral responsibility while harboring the least material objection. A lonely figure, he holds the position between Truth and knowledge, transforms from wise to holy, evolves from the cyclical life to the eternal void. He is regarded as a legendary male figure, concerned only with sustaining purity and the completion of yang Chi: celestial energy. He disdains the firmly embedded and gender-biased view taken by the masses. We view the sage as the culmination of wisdom and immortality. Through his understanding being passed down to us, we are able to judge between the decisive acts of human beings and that of God. We are made aware, in our earthly existence, of the defining line between heavenly spirits and earthly souls. Because of him, we can rise above our circumstances in this human life; they are nothing, superceded by the dream of a heavenly life.

In this context the Chinese mind regards the sage as the most revered individual between heaven and earth, the Ideal Model for a human being to emulate. Taoist inner alchemy cannot teach us "what" a Taoist is, but opens the mind to many "ways" in which to become a Taoist, as transmitted to us by the sages themselves. From the legendary stories of the birth of the first human beings to that of the highest position in the country—the first emperor (Chin-Shi-Huang-Di 259—210 B.C.)—there has never been another individual source. The sage speaks from God's exalted tone, acts on behalf of God's will, and represents God's most favored child. Taoism is, at most, a native religion but not a national one. From the ideal connection between man and heaven to the realistic practice between the power of ego and the freedom of mind, there has never been a national, dogmatic and institutional religion in Chinese culture. Being controlled by political power and the Confucian ethical practice, the Chinese people have been denied freedom of action but have always employed freedom of the spiritual mind.

In the book of Tao Te Ching, the term sage is the most frequently used, appearing in twenty-one chapters. In those chapters, Lao Tzu depicts the sage walking through his human life within sagehood. He places a greater emphasis on the importance of being a sage than he does on the meaning of hearing of Tao. A sage is a meditator who has mastered the cultivation practice of body/mind into that of a newborn baby. He is a carrier of kindness whose moral nutrition is utilized in the people's hearts but not clearly understood in their minds. He is a ruler in the world whose conduct imparts a state of being, whose position is lowly, and whose method is utter simplicity. The mechanism of the intellect is elevated into a mechanism of universal manifestation. The intellect is wise when there is no desire in the mind; while captured by demands, it becomes crafty. The act itself is kind when there is no competition; while searching for perfection, it becomes possessive. Thus, when Lao Tzu is describing a sage, he employs the qualities of "wise," "kind" and "Wu Wei," which are interchangeable definitions in their depiction of sage.

Lao Tzu calls himself a sage. For example, the method of his cultivation practice outlined as emptying the mind, vitalizing the stomach, softening the will and strengthening the character, is labeled as the sage's governing method. The following expressions are further examples:

1. Sage is for the belly not the eyes.
2. The sage wears shabby cloth but holds a treasure within.
3. The sage holds Oneness as the shepherd of the world.

4. Therefore the sage says: When I am in-active, people transform themselves. When I abide in stillness, people organize themselves lawfully. When I am disengaged, people enrich themselves. When I choose non-desire, people remain simple.

To be a sage and to live a sage's life is neither easy nor impossible. It is a life devoid of desire, ambition, name, competition, wealth, and possessions. The sage bears a wonderful name called immortality, a quality that cannot be defined socially and culturally. To reach immortality is to become self-effacing. Exercising only the right conduct of speech and action, doing no more and no less than what is required. It is acting at the right time with the right person within the right space, expressing no self-explanation and no self-advertising. Voice is the complementary vehicle of action; Tao is transformed into the virtuous Te of kindness. The term Taoism can be construed as "obscure," "abstract," "ethical" and "forceful," but a sage's behavior illuminates the Tao as alive, active, and achievable.

Sage's Physical Condition

Sage is the individual, collective and universal persona under which the trilogy of Tao, the meaning of Action. and the role of human being are uniformly embodied and characterized. Upon examination of the practical result of cultivation, we see that a sage's body is an androgynous Chi body. With this invisible capability, a sage's body is in unity with the mind, not a burden of perceptual and energetic limitation. Because of this total infusion, a sage's body is a friend of life, not an object to be displayed. With its unique ability to rejuvenate, a sage's body is a womb for producing a self-like baby, not a treasure to be preserved. Its completion and singularity serve as a cinnabar field to cultivate God-like self, but not a golden elixir to be held and treasured. As Lao Tzu continues to expound: Relaxing the body, the body comes to the fore. Beyond the body, the body comes to the fore. Beyond the body, the body exists of itself. Not even relying on selflessness enables the self to be fulfilled.

The definition of relaxation is comparable to the Buddhist idea of readiness: no sickness, no frustration, no restraint, and no expectation. It is the overall meaning of presence. "Coming to the fore" doesn't mean that the caretaker's role is removed from the mind, allowing the body to wander without direction, racing headlong to the edge of a cliff, nor is it expecting the body to confront risk with no assistance. "Coming to the fore" is permitting the body to by-pass mental calculation and expectation, being free to move with its own rhythm, at its own pace, measured with its own strength, and in its own time. Thus, the mind reaches beyond the body, yet, the stillness within holds it at bay.

When the body comes to the fore on its own, poisonous insects and venomous snakes do not sting it. Predatory birds and ferocious animals do not seize it. Its bones are soft and its sinews supple, yet its grasp is firm; without knowing the union of male and female, its organs become aroused. Its vital essence comes to the point; crying all day, its voice never becomes hoarse. Its harmony comes to the point. The central and essential location arrives in the right environment at the right time, engaged in the right bodily conduct. This is why the mind must be *r*emoved, *r*elaxed and *r*eturned. The arousal of organs supplies the power of willful penetration to grasp the central attention, and to voice the harmonious organic vibration. Softness creates the space of firmness, grounding generates the pointing power, and homesick crying is the voice of sobering souls.

Because the sage values the world as he does the body, he can be entrusted with the world. Because he loves his body as he loves the beauty of the world, he can be responsible for the world. As strength, will and harmony is achieved, the value of body is displayed; the meaning of the country is revealed in its beauty: the treasure of sacred vessel. The sage, with his quiet strength and intrinsic value, bears the disgrace of the country and becomes the ruler of the country. With grace and beauty, sage bears the misfortune of the world and is the ruler of the world.

On Water 水

Four meridians in the Chinese system are related only with water flow in and out of the body/mind. They are: bladder meridian, belt meridian, yin chiao and yin wei meridians. Ren, kidney and thrust meridians are also closely related to the water function.

In Taoist healing practice, the first step is to reopen and rejuvenate the thrust and belt meridians. They are the first set of Kan (water) and Li (fire): without water, without kidney fluid and bodily stream; without fire, without adrenal power and intellectual capacity.

The next step is to open the yin chiao and yin wei meridians. The Chinese character chiao means “leap” or “jump”or “jiggle,” while wei means “surround” or “circle” or “gather.” These two meridians are engaged with the water function of life from plants, fruits and trees to animals, humans, and cosmic spirits on earth. In plants and trees they start at the root. Then they rise internally through the trunk to manifest as flowers and fruits. In the human body these two meridians are set in motion from the inner ankle and shin, traveling upward inside the legs and at the front of the body. Through the neck, wei remains within the thyroid and parathyroid glands while chiao travels to the eyes. Each side of the body contains one complete set of these meridians.

Fig. 5.1 Meditating to activate the wei meridians (inside lines) and the chiao meridians (outside lines).

Exercises dealing with Four Meridians:

1. Place both hands, palms facing and connecting with the navel. Visualize a small white dot in the middle of abdominal area.
2. Mentally roll this small white dot forward and down, then backward and up with the rhythm of the breath. Inhale, visualize this dot moving forward and down, exhale backward and up to form the minutest circle. Continue this practice allowing the circle to become a bit larger each time. It will literally draw the testes Chi and ovaries Chi up to the chest when the count reaches 49.
3. Stay for a while to experience the warmth and heat in both the abdominal and chest areas.
4. Work backward from the previous exercise. Inhale, visualize the energy set in motion from the largest realm and moving down. Exhale and move up. After 49 times, it returns to the original white dot.

A: Beginning Level B: Advanced Level

Fig. 5.2 Circulating the oceanic water within.

5. Now, feel the energetic change occurring in the body. Then inhale, press the hands flat against the front part of the abdominal area. Feel the connection of the front and back joining.
6. Hold the breath and feel the intensity of the air pressure or heat or warmth or whatever sensation appears.
7. When you can no longer hold the breath, exhale and let the pressure inside the abdomen escape.

8. Practice 5, 6 and 7 until you can feel the heat and steam literally fusing in the body.

Fig. 5.3 Condensing the Chi with hands.

9. Open the hands. Inhale, gently moving the heat around the belt meridian crossing the pelvic bone. Exhale and place the thumbs touching the tip of the pelvic bones (ilium) on either side. Join the hands together with four fingers from either side.
10. Feel the energy circulate for awhile before returning the hands to the navel area. Begin this practice again until you feel the energy circulating evenly in the entire abdominal area.

11. Open the hands with palms facing the ground. Send the Chi from the palms down to the feet. Inhale, gather the energy up and into the belt meridian area. Exhale, feel the circulation within.
12. When you have sufficient energy surging up across the belt meridian, it will naturally move further to the chest and brain area. The highest point where the hands meet should be parallel with the eyes.

13. By the time the body is literally cooked, place the palms face up to the sky. This will cool everything down at once.
14. Massage any desirable areas in the body/mind.

Sage's Mental Condition

The description of the mentality of a sage can become extremely wordy. A small sample could be: simple, clean and pure, penetrating, adaptive, flexible, careful, serious, kind, faithful, witty, experienced, nonjudgmental, non-competitive, self-fulfilled, self-realized, self-actualized and self-effacing. He also has the benefit of being aged and is physically withdrawn from desirable action. This can be summarized in Chinese, as encapsulated in four clusters—Wu Wei, Wu Zheng, shan and xian—translated as "non-desire" or "non-action," "non-competition," "kindness" and "wise." We will review these one by one.

Wu Wei 無為

Wu Wei has been an ideal phrase in Taoist philosophy, very close to the notion of "being" in Western philosophy. Combined with the character wu for "no" or "not" and character wei for "act" or "become," the phrase can be translated as "inaction," "non-action," "in-active," "not acting," "non-doing" or "actionless," depending on the most suitable for the situation. Wu Wei doesn't suggest "stay put," "motionless," "numb" and "without doing anything." Nor does it mean "not to engage action" or "not to be mindful." The essential meaning is "not to act desirably," "not to engage egoistically," and "not to become possessive." Its thrust is the use of psychological action over philosophical speculation; leaning more toward mindful engagement than rational projection; reflecting spontaneous acting rather than mechanistic involving.

Through living in actionless engagement and preaching wordless doctrine, Lao Tzu discovered that the myriad creatures act without inquiring, nourish without possessing, accomplish without claiming credit. In ordinary life, we are educated and trained to project a possible outcome before taking action, to foresee a planned result through action from ego-guided emotional sacrifice. We expect the acceptance of social values for an accomplishment before it is achieved. But when the ego is in remission the mind does non-doing, engages in non-affairs and savors non-flavor. Not even relying on selflessness enables the self to be fulfilled. When the self is active, the work is done, the body withdraws; this is the Tao of heaven. As the Tao is all-pervading, it operates on both the left and the right. Success is consequent to all affairs. It does not proclaim its own existence. All things return, yet there is no claim of ownership, so it is forever desireless. This can be called small. This is because mind can seek what is difficult with ease and effect what is great while it is small. From natural observation Lao Tzu realized that the most difficult things in the world are done while they are easy. The greatest things in the world are done while they are small, since what is easy necessarily entails difficulty. Thus the sage, through extreme trials, ends up with no difficulty.

All things return, yet there is no claim of ownership, this can be called great. It is accomplishment without claiming credit that makes the outcome self-sustaining. The idea is essentially to become aware of the undeniable difference between an accomplished affair called success and a desirable result named success. The sage accomplishes greatness in not planning a great thing and not acting great; as it turns out, he accomplishes what is great. Through non-action, the sage does not fail. Not clinging, he does not lose.

The cultivation outcome experienced by Lao Tzu is when I am 'in-active,' people transform themselves. When I abide in stillness, people organize themselves lawfully. When I am disengaged, people enrich themselves. When I choose non-desire, people remain simple. The word "I" represents the pure spiritual entity and the word "people" encompasses the combined act of *po'*s bodily need and *hun'*s conscious activity. Lao Tzu's statement can be interpreted thus: when the self is in-active, the body transforms itself; when the self abides in stillness, the body organizes itself; when the self is disengaged, the body enriches itself; when the self chooses non-desire, the body remains simple. Because he has rid his mind of murkiness, hun is prevented from playing its role. Shen regains self-awareness, self-clarity and self-expressiveness; po is no longer obligated to possessively supply the energy demand for the "whiteness" of bodily bones and fat. Desire and demand disappear naturally.

Wu Zheng

The character zheng means far more than to "strive" or "compete" as demanded from the ego. It further represents mental confusion and intellectual challenge as in "disputing," "arguing" or "debating." The meaning of wu zheng is "not to strive for what is beyond self and not to pursue what does not belong to self." People are inclined to project a negative attitude toward the transliteral meaning of "non-competition." The term "non-competition" represents a person torn between two extremes: being magnanimous, overly generous and too accommodating, or conversely being too capitulating, withdrawn, vulnerable, soft, and feeble. The person could also be someone lacking confidence, self-respect, having no self protecting qualities and exercising no reservations. This is the ideal of quietism and passivism but unlike the nature of Tao. It is not the act of water, nor the complete expression of wu zheng: no giving in and no giving up. Everything deserves what it gets in return and everything should receive its due naturally, without manipulation.

Equally, when the sage abandons extremes, extravagance, multiplicity. He desires not to desire and does not value goods that are hard to get. He learns not to learn, and restores the common people's losses. He is able to support the nature of all things and not daring to impose action. Then what is the point of competing and what is the purpose of competition?

In Mawangdui texts, the standard phrase of Wu Zheng in chapter 8 Text A is youjing. In Text B it is youzheng. You means "have" and jing is "tranquil." Whether the second character is either "tranquil" or "competition," the first character means, "has" and not "has not." The full sentence in Mawangdui texts can be translated as water is good at benefiting all things, yet it actively competes. Who can prove that water doesn't compete; who is to say that water is not active? In human history people try desperately but unsuccessfully to control floods: the madness of rushing water. Untold numbers of lives, human and animal, have drowned and been obliterated by the fury of flooding. Water is the most active and powerful matter on earth, the very reason it can retain its inactive state. The special application is that when water retires to undesirable places, the stillness within the water embraces and balances all the competitive measures, leaving nothing undone. Thus, it is near the Tao.

As the cultivation goes through the last loss, there is no negativity remaining as the desire and danger of mind is transformed into subtle awareness. The final competition will not be about gains, success, name and possessions, but the death of them all. Whoever overcomes death overcomes life, whoever lives beyond death lives beyond life. Sustaining the source of mother, the sage realizes that as soon as he exists for others, he has more. As soon as he gives to others, he has more. So the Tao of heaven benefits and does not harm. The Tao of humankind exists and does not compete. At this level, the sage is able to manage the loss that causes all losses; he uses all negative influence as the treasure of teaching. Thus, being a good warrior does not entail power. A good fighter is not angry. One who is good at overcoming the enemy does not contact him. One who is good at leading people acts humbly. This is called the Action of non-competition. This is called leading people. This is called the Ultimate as old as heaven.

Shan

In the text of Tao Te Ching, the character shan is equated to "kind," "good" or "compassion," even though its original meaning in Chinese is simply "kind." There are characters depicting "good" and "compassion" in the Chinese language, yet Lao Tzu strives to illustrate fully the meaning of shan. He emphasizes that kindness is the virtue of action: the sage is kind to those who are kind, he is also kind to those who are not kind. It is the kindness of Action itself. In this regard, the kindness of Action is not judged by the hun's conscious activity, nor is it preferred or disregarded by po's ego anticipation. The performance of kindness should not be enhanced for the purpose of personal gain, nor should it be withdrawn if personal or social recognition is not forthcoming. Kindness is the representation of the grand master Tao.

By employing kindness the sage has the ability to perform goodness. Consequently, no one is left out and no talent is wasted. Those who are slow or weak are encouraged and supported by kindness, whereas those who show talent and are quick-thinking will unfold and explore their full potential through kindness. Lao Tzu calls this being in the tow of enlightenment. For everything that is good is the teacher of the good person. Everything that is bad becomes a resource for the good person. No need to honor the teachers. No need to love the resources. This is because both yin and yang are emerging from and being generated by this action. The body and mind are the double mirror; the inner consciousness and outer behavior view themselves; love and insight are the dual action of oneness. As a result, t*he sage dwells in good places, draws from good sources, supplies from good nature, speaks with good trust, governs with good rules, conducts with good ability, and acts within good time. For this reason, there is no competition, there is no concern*.

By employing kindness, the sage acts with compassion (shan). Through compassion: fight and win; defend and be secure. When the heaven establishes, it always relies upon compassion. Clearly he is saying that if the sage must fight, he has nothing to fear, no concern. He must make a careful and complete judgment of his surroundings when confronted with danger. He must defend himself and others; there can be no miscalculation, nothing can be neglected. All that should be protected is secured.

Xian
The term Xian in Chinese is equivalent to sage (holy man) in English. Among all the existing languages, the Chinese character xian is perhaps the clearest visual description for the life of the sage. It is composed with strokes of "human" (ren) and "mountain" (shan). In the ancient structure of language, the human stroke appears at the top and the mountain stroke at the bottom. It translates as "human stands on the top of a mountain." Mountain is the ideal location for man, whether sleeping, meditating or for viewing. Nothing on earth is higher than a mountain. Only the wind, clouds, and the standing tower of a human form can loom above the mountain peak. When the character was later rearranged, the "human" stroke was placed at the left side, and the "mountain" stroke was set at the right side. Perhaps the change was made because it symbolized cold, dry, windswept, and lonely. Or perhaps the emperor resented a human form other than his own occupying the highest position on earth. He ordered the linguists to reconstruct the character, placing a prone sage sleeping side by side with the mountain. In this position there was no one standing at the top to threaten his image. His prestige and unequaled power were restored. The emperor could then fully enjoy his family life and resume conducting his business affairs within his palace, reigning supreme.

The soul seeker, the wandering pilgrim, anyone on the spiritual quest prefers to dwell in a mountain cave rather than a warm house or grand palace. Mountains are the symbols of life on earth. The earth without mountains could be compared to a mother without nourishing breasts. Mountains contain a vast amount of nutrition for the survival of all earthly creatures. The flow of nature enables the natural formation of rain and snow, the activity of clouds and winds, the circulation of dry air and exuding moisture. They are formed in the range and scope of latitude, the degree of warmth and cold, the condition of light and shadow. In the exchange of bright and darkness, the lanterns of sun and moon, and the cycles from summer and winter, we continue to exist.

The generating, developing and transforming power of earth lies in the vastness of mountains. In contrast, valleys are their resting ground, echoing place, and rejuvenating resource. The image between a mountain and a valley is similar to the images between life and death: male and female, heaven and earth, being and nonbeing. Because of mountains, the gravitational force generates the winds and clouds, rain and snow, plateau and plain, sufficing the needs of all creatures. Thus, they are the most sacred places on earth. In their nurturing atmosphere consciousness is expanded and sickness is detoxified. Walking the way becomes the returning journey; external search becomes internal embracing.

Fig. 5.6 24th Hexagram (Act of Harmony)

The son returns home as expressed through the 24th hexagram. This returning process is a unification process, an act of harmony, a restoration of totality, and a combination of heaven and earth. The unified oneness need never return to its separated state—the polarized structure—but remains with the harmonious act. It demonstrates the action of selflessness, never that of selfishness. It does not extend only to the nearest points within the dimension, but merges with the circle of oneness.

The nature of xian in Tao Te Ching concerns wisdom and holiness. The inner ability of a sage is that he is wise by nature. His outer intellectual manifestation is the wisdom he produces. Being wise is a virtue while generating wisdom is a mental capacity. To be wise is to have the innate ability, to have the wisdom is to acquire the ability to act, judge, express, demonstrate, and produce the holiness and intellectual work. Only those who are not slaves to life are wise to the value of life defines the true wisdom power. It is thus that the sage exists without ownership, accomplishes without holding on. It is thus, without desire, that the wise see, and holiness returns.

Holiness is the unified Oneness of shen: the union of spirit and ghost. Spirit gives and ghost takes; spirit benefits and ghost harms. Lao Tzu illustrates the wisdom and kindness that the sage holds and embraces by saying that: Governing a large country is like cooking a small fish. If Tao is used to manage society, its ghost will not become spirit. Not that ghost is not spirit, but that the spirit will not harm the people. Not only does the spirit not harm the people, but neither does the sage harm the people. As those two do not cause harm, so they are united in Action.

This is the single chapter in which Lao Tzu discusses the difference between the spirit and ghost. Powerfully illustrated, it sorts out the most complicated meanings. The first sentence explains that cultivating the whole body is like smelting the watery jing. Its literal meaning is how to heat up and crystallize the fishy-smelling sperm and eggs. When the Tao is used to govern the mind, hun and po cannot take over the power of shen. Because of the eternal fire, ghost can not steal the passionate love; and due to the inner stillness, spirit cannot destroy the innocent virtue. The body will not be hungry for the fire of love and the mind will not chase away the inner stillness. Thus, the wise see.

Calming the Mind

Pursuing the Tao

Pursuing the Tao is an act of spiritual cultivation. Without the Tao, it is impossible to walk the way. Without the Tao, cultivation has no source, no root, no power and no meaning. To pursue the Tao is to become centered within speech and conduct, to be grounded with a foundation, to be resourceful with Mother Nature, and to be harmoniously balanced between subjective action and worldly affairs. This is what Lao Tzu has experienced and explained to us: hearing the Tao brings a loss day by day. Losing more and more until inaction results. Inaction results, yet everything is done. Managing the world always involves non-engagement. As soon as there is engagement, there is not enough of it to manage the world.

Why has Lao Tzu experienced a total loss while listening to the silent Tao? He uses the eminent way of pursuing the Tao as a model in order to illustrate the meaning behind the Tao. When an eminent person hears of the Tao, they practices it faithfully. This practice brings a big loss, because knowing the Tao seems costly, entering Tao seems like returning, and becoming equal with Tao gives birth to paradoxes. It takes living life to know the Tao. Entering the Tao is consuming the life force you have been given; becoming equal with the Tao sits with two legs, grabs with two hands, views with two eyes, grounds with two feet, dances with two hearts, and sleeps with two worlds. All that is the paradoxical nature of body and mind.

Heaven is eternal, and earth is long-lasting. But gusty winds do not last all morning, cloudbursts do not last all day. What makes this so? Heaven and earth will not last forever, how could a human being last! Existing with the eternal Tao of the self and the temporary breathing of the Tao within us is the true duality, true paradox.

With each breath the sound and meaning of the Tao is exercised, thus one hears the Tao. By hearing and entering the Tao through its returning process, the thirst for knowledge is quenched by the light emitted through the gate of heaven. This ensures a complete "knowing around," a literal phrase used by Lao Tzu. Worldly others are known to us, enabling the self to become rich with what the world suffices. When one no longer feels compelled to be a knower, the sickness is over; enlightenment is achieved. Yet, knowing remains constant: a spontaneous interaction between the self and the environment. It cannot be taught, repeated or recorded. There is no need to attempt to explain the inexplicable and to search for invisible. This is why Lao Tzu concludes simply that to know oneself is enlightenment.

Knowledge that is shared, taught, repeated and recorded, is no longer that of self-knowing. It is simply a learning process; not alive, present, spontaneously interconnected with the mutual-action of self-knowing around. To know others is to be knowledgeable, albeit limited, bounded, restrained. Our limited knowledge is never sufficient to explore the comprehension and understanding of others. Shared knowledge merely promotes further searching, reaching out to grasp the power of mastering and endless control. In this manner, pursuing knowledge becomes a consuming desire, a fixation, and a possessive action. It is upon this mental persuasion that Lao Tzu kindly advises that to know what is sufficient is to be rich. He also distinguishes the actual knowledge the mind has acquired from the mental appraisal we form on being knowledgeable. He states that knowing that you don't know (everything) is superior and not knowing that you don't know (everything) is a sickness. Only hearing and entering the Tao can be known.

Our ability to obtain everything now and know that anything that is returned to us is the manifestation of true paradox. Eminent action is like a valley, complete understanding resembles being disgraced, vast action seems yielding, action that builds up seems remiss, pure integrity seems perverse, the great square has no angles, the great talent matures late, the great voice sounds faint, the great image has no form. The Tao is praised but is unnamable.

Embracing the Simplicity

Observe the plain and embrace the simple. This is the way of hearing and entering the Tao. Plain is the foundation of diversity, complexity, uncertainty, and unpredictability. Simplicity is the initial stage for growth, expansion, development, and completion. The thought process of causality and the desire for results are cast out when these two are embraced. Learning based upon the meaning of nature will be simplified with total, mindful engagement. Lao Tzu clarifies this as: It is easy to sustain what is at rest. It is easy to plan for that of which there is not even a sign. Total awareness, mindful cautiousness and complete anticipation can be applied to sustaining the planning and minding with mind. Prevention becomes proactive before the fragile breaks and the minute disperses. One should act upon it before it exists and regulate it before it becomes chaos. From this, a little sprout grows into a massive tree, a clod of earth is constructed into the rising of a nine-story building, and a single step is accumulated into the climbing of a thousand-fathoms.

Knowing the above, Lao Tzu warns that though simplicity is small, the world cannot treat it as subservient. If lords and rulers can hold on to it, everything becomes self-sufficient. Heaven and earth combine and allow sweet dew. Without rules, people will naturally become equal. At the outset, the rule must be expressed. Once it exists, stop speaking of it. The result of not speaking of it is to be eliminating danger. In a manner of speaking, Tao is to the world as the rivers are to oceans and seas.

However, those who impose action upon it will fail. Those who cling to it lose it. So the sage, through non-action, does not fail. Not clinging, he does not lose. The common people's engagement in affairs fails prior to success. They project proactive results from the outcome forcing the action to become burdensome and painstaking. They have been so accustomed to this process that all activity strives only to meet the standards that society has set. We are admonished to g*ive as much careful attention to the end as to the beginning, then the affairs will not fail. It is on that account that the sage desires not to desire and does not value goods that are hard to get. He learns not to learn and restores the common people's losses. He is able to support the nature of all things and, not daring, to impose action*.

Also, simplicity allows proactive measurement. As Lao Tzu has envisioned: Seeking what is difficult with ease and effecting what is great while it is small, since the most difficult things in the world are done while they are easy. The greatest things in the world are done while they are small. Because of this, the sage never plans to do a great thing. Thus, he accomplishes what is great. Facile promises necessarily result in little trust. What is easy necessarily entails difficulty. Thus the sage, through extreme trials, encounters no difficulty.

Richness of Frugality

With plain as the vision and simplicity as the measurement, frugality becomes the single most useful device. Since frugality is the most direct and effective calculation of energy consumption, waste would be eliminated, and there would be no debt, no recycling, no regret, and no punishment. This is why "loss" is very necessary from Lao Tzu's point of view. When the cost of ego is reduced to zero and when bodily metabolism functions at its provisionary state, energy is consumed for the benefit and goodness of others. Thus, frugality ensures the simple way of life and simplicity can be fully exerted.

Frugality has no connection to the selfish strategy of meanness or greed. Meanness and greed transform a person's mental obsession into reality. Meanness has its source in fear and obsession; obsession feeds on meanness and greed to occupy the space of selfishness. The entire world then becomes an endless source to satisfy the lust of selfishness, abounding in worldly manifestation. Frugality is the direct opposite. There is no energy waste derived from selflessness. The negative "loss" transforms into positive "gain," the pure gain. Lao Tzu applies this to the construction of a society by saying that: For governing people and affairs, nothing is better than frugality. Only frugality enables the pre-empty measures. Pre-empty measures mean a great accumulation of Action. A great accumulation of Action leaves nothing to be conquered. When nothing needs to be conquered, no-boundary is known. When no-boundary is known, it allows the country to exist. The country, existing from its source, can endure. This is the Tao of having a deep root, a strong stem, a long life and an enduring vision.

When frugality is maintained at home, one is perfectly grounded with the source and heaviness that are rooted within the manifestation of light. One quietly preserves the tranquility that masters the restless life. One is steadfastly reaching the ultimate emptiness, and absolute in concentrating on central stillness. It is only through such qualities that all things work together. There is no bad luck, no backfire, no punishment, because one has no expectations, has done nothing wrong and wasted nothing. One has no need to gain anything or fear losing anything. The harmony of the world becomes a true friend, the real knowing-around, and the indisputable resource.

Non-Dualistic Mentality

Emerging through the "door" of the mysterious action is the co-dependence of the dualistic aspect as well as the process of both mutual construction and mutual destruction. Do not be victimized by either of these. It is a mystic attraction, the highest and purest quality of human perfection—love—shapes life's destiny. Beauty becomes the primal attraction for human desire, and good is the finest fixation for the activation of this desire.

When one searches only for this beauty, one stigmatizes the ugly, and when one's conduct is guided by goodness only, one acts within the behavior of prejudice. When people see beauty as pure beauty, they view the ugly disparagingly. In valuing the good as purely good, their judgment is based upon their idea of bad. When the universal manifests through the division of two from one, each side should live upon the opposite as well. The interaction of connecting and separating from these two sides of oneness makes one truly individual. This in turn makes an individual a non-individual. Beautiful or ugly is but two sides of the same coin. How much difference is there between beautiful and ugly? It is a fine line. Oh, that unstoppable glory of heart and the disgust of mind!

Based on these paradoxes, Lao Tzu proposed that being and non-being give birth to each other, difficulty and ease complete each other, long and short measure each other, high and low overflow into each other, voice and sound harmonize with each other, and before and after follow each other. Yet, we need individual character as a measuring ground between individuality and totality. Since disaster is what fortune depends upon, fortune is what disaster subdues. Who knows a final outcome? There is no right lawful- ness. Government tends towards the extreme. Kindness tends towards evil. People have been familiar with this for a long time. Because of such changes and transformations, mindful action should be rounded without cutting, be compatible without puncturing, be straightforward without trapping, be bright without dazzling.

This does not indicate that there is no heavenly "justice." The net of heaven is broad and loose, yet nothing slips through. Large or small, many or few, reward or punishment, are all done through Action. This is the measure of virtue and right judgment. Because of virtue, internal conscious intention and external physical performance are integrated, and nothing is left behind. A good traveler leaves no tracks. A good speaker is without flaw. A good planner does not calculate. A good doorkeeper does not lock the door, yet it cannot be opened. A good knottier does not use binding, yet it cannot be undone. What this means is that we need to know how to interact without imposing ourselves or being locked in by our mental projection. There should be no mental imprinting left behind; thus, no sickness results. This differs from the common sense approach of doing something and then letting it go. It is a matter of clearing off the steps before one slips and falls. In order to reach this state of being we can only be what we are, and know—be aware of—what is around us. This is all that we can do.

Since hanging on to it will cause overflow; better to let go. Forced consent does not endure. He who boasts of himself loses his stance. He who displays himself is not seen. He who justifies himself is not understood. He who lashes out does not succeed. He who builds himself up does not endure. The natural outcome is: He who does not display himself is seen. He who does not justify himself is understood. He who does not lash out succeeds. He who does not build himself up endures. Therefore, only the spirit of non-competition makes things non-competitive. So the old saying, "Yield, and retain integrity." is but a few words, but when rightly understood, integrity returns.

Quality of Sage's Life

Capacity of Natural Rejuvenation

In the world, the sage inhales. This sentence characterizes the manner in which the sage lives his life. In order to live in the world, he gathers the energy through inhalation, not from any other source. This inhalation is not the shallow and surface breathing done through the nostrils. It is the embryonic and total body breathing. This breath of life is the nutrition, breath, information, and the wisdom. This is why the sage knows the world without stepping out of the door (the gate of life), knows the Tao without peering through the window (eyes), and smiles like a child. This is called unifying the world of in and out. The world of in is the source and the world of out is the mechanism. They exist between matter and energy, structure and motion, process and procedure. Source is the breath of life, the nutrition of vitality, and the energy of light. Breath is the state of vapor, vitality is the state of fluid, and light is the state of solid. Light is the central focal point, vitality is the generating force, and air is the inclusive space. By inhaling in this embryonic way, the vast space and minute presence are instilled in the flesh, the awareness, and interaction. The world is known, Self is charged, and action is pure and simple in itself.

Suffusion of Self

For his worldly presence, the sage keeps the mind simple and is always without mind. Simple mind is the heart of kindness and not the intellect of mind. Simple mind is no-mind—the largest expansion of mind—and the highest clarity of mind. No-mind means no ego-mind. The expansion is the fusion and expanse of mind spreading over and around all angles and trajectories in its image, whereas the clarity of mind refers to the purity of spiritual quality. This is the practical side of cultivation: how the sage lives for the world and not for himself.

How? First of all, the sage keeps the mind simple: no distraction of attention, no waste of energy, and no confusion of mind. Secondly, by keeping the mind simple, he projects his mind into people's minds and lives, their minds become as his mind. To clarify this matter, Lao Tzu comments: Nature has no benevolence, it treats all things like strawdogs; the sage has no benevolence, he treats his people like strawdogs. Thus, since the sage wants to elevate the people, his speech is down to earth. Since the sage wants to advance the people, he positions himself at the back. When he is at the front, people do not harm him; when he stands above, people do not feel pressure. The whole world supports him without tiring. Since he does not rely on competition, the world has nothing with which to compete.

Thirdly, there is no restraint and no fixation of the mind or for the mind. When mind is fixed and constrained, boredom follows. Mind is then constantly changing, shifting, questioning and demanding. This is the power of ego and the karma of restraint. Not constraining the living environment, they do not get bored by life. Because we do not get bored, there is no boredom. Therefore the sage is self-aware but not introspective, he has self-respect but does not price himself. He rejects one and takes the other. Because of this, when the sage lives for the people of the world, his mind is as open and adaptive, as are the people's minds. The hope of people is his encouragement and their sorrow is his misfortune. When people want him, the sage is already there, waiting; when people need him, the sage is the pillar that braces them. How could the people live without him and how could they distance themselves from him?

Wisdom of an Old Boy

The ancient sages of Tao are subtle and mysteriously penetrating. Their depth is beyond the power of will. Because it is beyond the power of will, the most we can do is describe it. Thus, full of care, as one crossing the wintry stream; attentive, as one cautious of the total environment; reserved, as one who is a guest; spread open, as when confronting a marsh; simple, like uncarved wood; opaque, like mud; magnificent, like a valley. From within the murky comes the stillness. The feminine enlivens with her milk. Keeping such a Tao, excess is undesirable. Desiring no excess, work is completed without exhaustion.

In this chapter, Lao Tzu vividly illustrates the psychospiritual quality and biological balance that the sage retains. Even though the sage returns to his infantile spiritual tranquility and lives within a refreshed bodily condition, he is vastly different than when he has in his childhood state. The similarity lies only within the descriptive nature. There is no other developmental stage available or suitable to categorize sagehood other than childhood.

In his Memories, Dreams, Reflections (1965), Jung commented that: "Lao Tzu is the example of a man with superior insight who has seen and experienced worth and worthlessness, and who at the end of his life desires to return into his own being, into the eternal unknown meaning. The archetype of the old man who has seen enough is eternally true. At every level of intelligence this type appears, and its lineaments are always the same, whether it be an old peasant or a great philosopher like Lao Tzu. This is old age, and a limitation." From his own experience, Jung also experienced the transformation from the "alienation" that separated him from the world into his inner world where he experienced an "unexpected unfamiliarity."

The word "old" in this context refers to the nearly completed state of biological manifestation, to the psychological memory, and to the personal and social experience. It traces the quality and enrichment of life's journey. It is also the last stage before death. The life ahead is a "limitation" itself as Jung has so succinctly characterized, but an old boy has lived through death mentally and spiritually. Without fear, the world being viewed before the old boy's eyes differs greatly from that of a newborn boy. The old boy is not sickened about the world, but simply withdrawn; separating from the attraction of the eyes to become that of the heart. What attracts the eyes are the state, change and manifestation of forms, while the attraction of the heart is the formless, changeless, and unfathomable eternity.

At this point, the unexpected unfamiliarity experienced by Jung is replicated by Lao Tzu's description. The main difference between an old boy and a newborn boy is the life experience. Being cautious while crossing the winter stream is a pre-measured conscious awareness. Being attentive means being aware of and focused at the same time, while being reserved means being humble and acknowledging. Spreading open is the unrestrained mental space, simplicity is the ability to remain refreshed and energized, opaque is the quality of being Oneness within and without, and magnificent is the ability of retaining, recycling and rejuvenating the oneness within.

Being cautious while crossing the winter stream implies two meanings. One is to be cautious about unionhood of oneness between light and water, male and female. The other is to be more cautious before the success. If there is failure, the entire effort will be in ruins, the entire cultivation practice becomes fruitless. Who laughs last laughs best! In I Ching, these two cautions are vividly expressed between 63rd hexagram Ji Ji and 64th hexagram Weiji. The first caution is expressed in the top line of 63rd hexagram. “He (the fox) gets his head in water. Danger.” The unionhood between fire and water is a cautious and dangerous action. This is the sacred mechanism of nature.

Fig. 5.7 63rd Hexagram (First Caution)

The second caution is illustrated in the definition of 64th hexagram, where the little fox gets his tail in the water while crossing the winter stream. Symbolically, the tail and sacral bones (“the waterwheel”) hold the sexual energy that is to be completely transformed into spiritual elixir or the pure-person.

Fig. 5.8 64th Hexagram (Second Caution)

The wise is old and new, experienced and refreshed, knowledgeable and humble, ready to die and ready to fly. He has a memory of life but is not restrained by memory; he has the richness of life but is unbounded by the meaning of life; he values the quality of life but is far removed from the unity of life. He is a teacher and friend, guide and companion, destroyer of the old and protector of the new, a battery for generating anything and recharging or rejuvenating everything. He is a body of soul and a heart of spirit, an attorney-at-law and a justice for the situation, a speaker for the nation and a symbol for the human race. He speaks in a voice without language; is native to a country without nationality; occupies a body without mortality; possesses a mind without mentality.

Chapter VI
Uplifting Te

To arrive at Te (de) or "Action" comprising the second section of the Tao Te Ching, can well prove to be a long yet fruitful journey. In the book of Tao Te Ching, the sections of Tao and that of Te (Action) are interchangeable. The Te section in the Mawangdui texts appears in the first part of the book, followed by the Tao.

This division holds true in several other translations. From the Taoist point of view, they differ only in terms of the order in which they are approached first: that of meditation or cultivation. Tao is based on meditation; Te is rooted in cultivation. Meditation is for the body/mind whereas cultivation is a treatise on virtue and conscious mind. To meditate is to gather and circulate Chi; to cultivate is to abandon the ego and to purify the consciousness.

In Taoist inner alchemy, they are equally important. To manage both simultaneously would be challenging indeed, rendering the practice unrealistic and the meaning of inner alchemy dogmatic. The practice of distilling the mind can appear daunting when the body is truly hungry. It would be equally unmanageable to purify the body if the mind was not fully prepared to offer the proper environment.

During meditation and cultivation practice, both Tao and Te tread the same path during inhalation since Te has not yet been suffused. The Tao suffuses above the sky and inside nothing. Once the Tao of eternal seed is born, the descending order is complete and the action of Te takes place. It is the arrival of the ascending order of returning; exalting and honoring one's own action that rises above physical and mental attachment. Lingering in this action is the Chi: energy of love and breath.

In this context, Tao is invisible and Te is visible; Tao is intangible and Te is tangible; Tao is inhumane and Te is humane; Tao is motionless and Te is lovable; Tao inhales and Te smiles. Because of this esoteric transition, matter is visible, form is tangible, substance is manageable, and trust is reliable. They are all the virtuous expression of the Te resulting from the emerging power of the Tao.

The exhalation of Te is the sum of all human activities that have been conducted with moral judgment and supervised by the spirit. Therefore, in concert with the kind action of Te, all are inspired, encouraged and uplifted; every action is honorable, respectable, and powerful. In the last exhalation in life, the purified shen gathers the elixir or remaining relics lingering in the body, and guided by an enlightened master or an angel, expels this refuse through the top of the head instead of the mouth or nose. This transpires only after kind action has been completed and all debts have been paid. Unless these conditions are met, the person will die as either a hungry ghost (if po dominates hun), or a wandering ghost (when hun overtakes po).

This task can be endeavored by cultivation as well as meditation. When the seven *po*s are energized by the power of the Big Dipper and the three *hun*s are unified into Oneness, the egoistic self and dualistic existence of body and mind are united into *shen'*s spontaneous interacting and knowing with nature. The meditation of love, which is the energy of self-preservation, will be transformed into the cultivation of kind action, qualified by kindness, goodness, harmony, impartiality, integrity and the holiness of Te (Action). Love will no longer be a mental projection of biological and ideal connection to social habits, but a true and honest self-love. As the power of meditation and the outcome of cultivation generate kind action, the sage integrates and embraces nature's act and human action.

Now we will explore the definition of Te, or kind action.

What is Kind Action?

Use of Language

Unlike the word Tao whose original transliteration remains the same in English, the character Te was handled in another manner. In 1864 Chalmers presented the first English meaning of Te as virtue. Since then, Te has been interpreted as character (Lin Yutang, 1948), intelligence (Balm, 1950), or integrity (Mair, 1990), as well as the transliteration Teh (Shrine of Wisdom, Manual No. 8, 1924). But what is Te? From the Taoist point of view, Te is what Tao "drops,"

"descends" and "falls upon." After several years of meditating on Te, I still failed to derive a true understanding. Then one summer night in 1995 a dream message was revealed to me.Two Chinese characters appeared in my mind's screen—Tao drops. That conforms perfectly in the content of Lao Tzu's description: When Tao is lost, it becomes Action. The word "lost" represents the complete dissolution and transformation of evolving from one state of being into the next. The original Chinese definition of "loss" is "to lose from hand," meaning to "discharge" or "abandon." When the infinite Tao is surrendered into active Te, it then becomes corrupted and visible. Te represents the highest state of the transformation of Tao into matter and substance, retaining the highest honor from the essence of Tao.

This descending process is quite similar to the English meaning of virtue: a supernatural power or influence exerted by a divine being. It is further verified by Lao Tzu's interpretation of Te as "mystic action" (xuan te). This is how it was originally defined. Whether supernatural or mystical, it is only a matter of mental cognition. The essential meanings are the same. The discrepancy encountered is that, in English a divine being, by its nature, is a totally different being than a human. There is a clear-cut distinction between being holy or divine and being human and ordinary. The "literal sense" is that a human being could never possess supernatural status in this life. Only a divine being can be classified as supernatural.

Contrary to this, Taoism doesn't specify this power (according to nature), or supernatural power (according to human beings), as the patent symbol of a divine being. What matters is your desire according to your mind's intention. What is natural to nature is supernatural to man; what is natural to adults is supernatural to children; and what is natural to a billionaire is supernatural to a street beggar. It is clearly the projection of mind and the persuasion of mental desire.

The mind discriminates first whether or not there is a clear-cut demarcation. Lao Tzu explains that the person who works according to Tao unites with Tao. In the same way he unites with action (Te). In the same way he unites with loss. The power of Tao becomes the seed of life, emerging as the elixir of virtue or evaporating into nothing. Thus Tao saves the spirit or loses the earthly life. Returning home with virtue is saving the spirit; marching forward toward the grave is loss.

The original linguistic meaning of Te in Chinese is to "ascend," to "rise" and to "elevate," indicating "the uplifting of the human spirit rising from earthly carnal body into pure spiritual action without conscious influence and egoistic obsession." In English, it is a "moral practice or action; conformity to the standard of right; moral excellence; integrity of character, upright of conduct; rectitude, morality." (Webster's New International Dictionary of English Language). Though the English definition and explanation of virtue fits the linguistic meaning of Te, virtue is not something simple, plain and present that can be adapted to human action. Action, to the Taoist, is a simple, spontaneous and interactive engagement between body and mind, vision and actual performance; it is the judgment of good and bad, and the conduct of divine and ordinary. Nature acts, humans perform; nature presents, humans exhibit; nature reveals, humans display; nature manifests, humans conduct; nature shows, humans behave; nature embraces, humans value; nature integrates, humans dissolve; nature unifies, humans separate.

It is from this point that we choose, as best we can, the word "action" for Te in our translation. Within this reasoning, virtue, to the ordinary mind, is something remote, pure, and out of reach. It is a completion of goodness over and above human action, an ideal of sacred purity unseen by the colored eye. It is a moral quality suited only to a divine being. Virtue is something that we can think about and strive for, but cannot perform. Visualize it but cannot perceive it; comprehend mentally but cannot engage physically; magnify it but cannot jump into it.

This ascending order and returning process deal precisely with the transition from "small mystic field" into "large mystic field." The small mystic field is that of the carnal world and animal kingdom. The large mystic field encompasses the spiritual world and cosmic universe. Obviously, small mystic field deals with small mind, the selfish, egoistic and cultural mind. The large mystic field houses the individual, conscious, selfless and cosmic mind. Energetically, the small mystic field deals with biological instinctive actions of self-preservation and survival. It has no concern for the world other than what the desirable eye seeks, the hungry stomach craves, and the gross sensation pulsates. In the large mystic field there is no self-sustenance or self-minded view, no self-conscious action; self is everywhere and in every action.

Fig. 6.2 Larger Mystic Field (Dachu) of 26th Hexagram

These two fields are fully explained in I Ching between 9th and 26th hexagrams which contain an identical lower trigram: the creative power of Cosmo and the invisible light of heaven. In the 9th hexagram, the upper trigram is wind representing the heavenly order, conscious awareness, and instinctive behavior. Mobility, agitation, unsteadiness and unreliability are its characteristics. Cloudiness, murkiness, rigidity and scattering are its tendencies. Mind is windy with no clear mental picture. There are clouds but no rain, wandering but no awakening, only confusion with no self-understanding. The external character is refined but there is no awakening of the inner character.

In contrast, the 26th hexagram shows us that wind is replaced by mountain, agitation by stillness, mobility by self-action, unsteadiness by steadfastness, unreliability by trust. When the mountain grounds the spirit and nourishes the soul, the mind is clarified, the body purified, the attitude made flexible, and the result completed. This is accomplished by the establishment of grounding upon mother earth's fruitful breasts, relinquishing reliance on manmade products.

The self is never lost, the energy is never exhausted, and spirit is never dead. As the last line indicates: "one attains the way of heaven." "Not eating at home" and "crossing the great river" are the most accurate depiction of the 26th hexagram. Its translation is that a sage is never bounded by the food prepared in the house. He sustains himself from the mother resource. He does not rely upon family in order to continue his existence but is everywhere in the world. He has no need to be protected and comforted by the sheltering house, he is clothed with the light, he breathes the vital force, and settles down in the universe. This exemplifies the highest meditation state: the fasting state.

Fig. 6.3 Chinese Character Te

In the construction of Te, the right side of the character is composed of four characters, “hand,” “vessel,” “one” and “heart.” This part of the character can be expressed as: “The single heart supports and directs the vessel of the body carried by hand.” Truly, the body is the most sacred vessel, and the hands are the most powerful and useful tools. Yet, without heart there is no foundation; without the single-minded heart, there is no transformation. The right part is a meditative state in which hands are unified with the bodily vessel and guided by the single devoted heart. This action is accompanied by the careful steps of walking, executed by the thighs—not legs, as represented by the left side of the character Te. Therefore, the activity of hands—picking and gathering food and putting it into mouth—is freed from being responsible for the bodily vessel. The one Chi of heaven is then the procreative force in the cauldron sustaining the vessel and satisfying the heart. Hands are held together as in a meditative state. The five elemental Chi is charged by the mountain dew. The action of conscious vibration is donned with the cosmic light. The changeable are viewed, the unchangeable are reflected. The world is in its perfect order and the body/mind is in its perfect harmony.

There is one remaining Chinese character that expresses the meaning of the Te. Its composition is “straightforward” and “heart.” The character “straightforward” for “zhi” is composed with “ten,” “eye” and “bend/curl,” meaning “looking and examining with gazing eyes and intensified back.” Ten is the visual image that covers eyes and extends from the nose to the eyebrows, or the Y portion of the eye. This implies that, “The eyes are inside the heart, and the heart is inside the spiritual consciousness, the spiritual conscious is inside the character of nature.” Everything is there and nothing is there. All the lines, angles, joints and points are penetrated, vaporized, purified and transformed by the fire of light. Husbanding into light is what Lao Tzu has experienced, a matching fire between consciousness and light. This is the magic play of a sage within the good fortune of returning to the Tao and the power of the Te.

Uplifting Te

According to the descending order, even if nature's act is inhumane, impersonal and impartial, there must be kindness granted into human souls via spirits. This enables human beings to perform "texing" or "the character of Te," as well as to exercise "falu" or "law" and "justice." If one fails to obey the fa, there will be punishment from government. If one does not have the "texing," the punishment will be the bad luck and bad karma carried out by one's inner conscious decision as judged by the law of heaven. Even though you cannot describe the texing, you can sense it. You cannot verify the texing but you can wait the result of it. You cannot exalt the texing but you can follow your heart-consciousness. You cannot find a rule to validate the texing but your gut sensation knows it all. This is because the marks of profound action follow only from the Tao. This is why sage accumulates nothing other than kind action: cultivating and uniting through kind action, honoring and being rewarded or punished only by kind action.

In the ascending order, spirit unifies with action, preparing to rise and be elevated. The path has been cleared. Consciousness is no longer a series of single-minded dots and flashes. Ego fails in it role as ruling monster of life. A person's action is kindness itself. The mentally fixed projection of searching for truth is replaced by kind action: the truth of experience and expression. Spontaneous and interactive action between humans and nature is the reality of truth. Lao Tzu's meditations have been revealed as: Being at peace, one can see into the subtle. Engaging with passion, one can see into the manifest.

In practicing kind action, love is no longer a conscious game played by ego. It no longer functions as an obsessive mental longing, an uncontrolled emotional outburst, or in continual soul-searching. Prejudice is overcome by the human freedom to act: the vulnerability of ego and the interaction of shen. The more valuable ego deems itself to be, the more spontaneously will shen act out. When they work smoothly together, empathy will be the mutual outcome. Sympathy becomes mutual encouragement. Pity reverses itself to merge as the fearless act of loving. Negative emotions do not hurt people and positive emotions cannot drag them down. Since all these emotional attributes are purified into compassion, there is no burning sensation manifested through compassion, and no compression found within the compassion. Kind action is: present and not firing, remote and not distancing, timing and not expecting, precious and priceless, generous and not selfish, sincere and not accusing, plain and not degrading.

Accumulation of Te

Nature of Kind Action

When the nature of selflessness is restored through the meditation of Love, the output of action is in itself kind and trustworthy, beyond what the rational mind has defined. The *re*liability of truth is to follow the mental configuration of truth and to trust the reality of possible change of truth. The process is kind and the inner quality is trustworthy due to the transformation of Love and the total respect of Inner-Love. When the universal loving energy is gathered within, the biological need and psychological satisfaction are fulfilled, thereby leaving no room within the body and mind for desire and demand created by ego. Self-trust is established and conscious fear is relinquished.

When the sage (pure-person) uses the universal loving energy, his action is both kind and trustworthy as Lao Tzu has stated. He is kind to those who are kind and he is also kind to those who are not kind. It is the kindness of Action itself. He is trustworthy to those who are trustworthy and he is also trustworthy to those who are not trustworthy. It is the trust of Action itself. There is no need to demonstrate (itself) or to prove Action for the sake of Action (you). People will say “yes” or “no” but it makes no difference to Action. Through kind action, both kind and unkind people are unified. Those who are kind transform those who are not kind; there is no separation between what a kind person is and the kindness itself. Those who are not kind benefit from those who are kind, and kindness itself is then underway. Through kind action, people, trustworthy and untrustworthy, become centralized. Those who are trustworthy improve themselves and know there is more trust in the future. Those who are not trustworthy disprove themselves, yet trust welcomes them along the way.

Capacity of Kind Action

Through Love, kind action becomes endless, inexhaustible and unfathomable. Lao Tzu emphasized that eminent Te is like a valley, since valley-spirit is deathless. Kind action is the very nature of Mother's power of creative nourishment: a combination of selfless love and self-sacrifice. Lao Tzu has experienced that complete understanding (of it) resembles being disgraced: a state of smallness, simplicity, integrity, peace, non-competition and non-action: the ways of the Tao. Being small allows for growth, expansion, and development. It is the most effective way to conserve energy since the small itself consumes minimal energy. Once the humbleness of honest heart steps in, the opportunism of egoistic mind is cast out, and the desire for achievement and appraisal becomes illusory.

Simplicity is the way to direct your life; it is always apparent and clearly directed. There is no confusion to deal with, no mind juggling, and no disguise. With no attachment, each minute detail and quality of smallness will manifest. Meanwhile, just as with a newborn baby, smallness requires your full attention, the finest care, and the highest precautionary measures. Any slight of mindfulness or unintentional carelessness could cause an immediate unforeseeable disaster.

Realizing this, everything manifests by itself; even the method of simplicity is absent. Any prerequisite such as knowledge, calculation, and intellect is eliminated. Thus, suffusing without simplicity is eliminating humiliation. Without humiliation, peace arises. Through peace, one observes that vast action seems yielding, because it never acts within a straight line, but twists, rotates with the activation of a whirlpool. Action that builds up seems remiss, since it is neither dutiful nor deceitful. Idleness and stupidity are evident in its natural makeup. Pure integrity seems perverse. It invariably results from the co-independence and inter-contradiction of yin and yang.

From the understanding of these experiential descriptions, Lao Tzu further concludes that: The great square has no angles; the great talent matures late; the great voice sounds faint; the great image has no form. Such is called mystic Te. For that reason, all things worship Tao and exalt Te. The worship of Tao and exaltation of Te are not conferred, but always arise naturally.

Humiliation 忍辱

Humiliation is one of the most devastating emotions one can face. Lao Tzu describes that “Favor and disgrace surprise the most.” The word disgrace is synonymous with humiliation, a reaction no one wishes to experience. When humiliation occurs, the conscious mind is completely darkened and filled with despair, placing the recipient into a despicable state with no opportunity to hide or escape. Personalized words and fruits of God are completely stripped away. They render one valueless, seemingly non-existent. On the other hand, it evolves into the most valuable time to examine oneself objectively, to face the situation with grace and understanding, to become like a child, and glorify God once again. The recipient owes thanks to the person invoking the humiliation.

The essence of getting in touch with humiliation is to purify oneself from all the distorted aspects of life, discovering that the true meaning of life, both simplistic and mysterious, will run its course. Following is the meditative passage to engage.

1. Mentally picture the scene that precipitated your humiliation. Feel the presence of that energy vibration.
2. Stay with the pain and suffering. Hold as long as possible. Then release it and be liberated.
3. Do not be angry and frustrated about your humiliation. Look into it objectively. What does this humiliation mean? What was its purpose?
4. Handle the humiliation just as you do the wind blowing or the daily events that are long forgotten. They are nothing and should never be pondered as anything special. It does not suggest that blowing wind and daily events are nothing, but that all things existing in life are normal and nothing about them is special.
5. Then consider why someone chose to humiliate you. Draw an equation between the two of you, destroying the rigidity within you that disables you to be open to new and unexpected things.
6. Position yourself as President Clinton in his most grievous position. Think of yourself personally and not professionally. You will find more truthful traits in human nature than in professional individuals.
7. Then observe which of you has received the greatest benefit from the situation. You will find that in being humiliated is attached to expectations, a certain knowledge that underlies a lack of self-esteem and freedom.

8. Allow your humiliation and your mind to be painstakingly purified in the same way that your body could be objectively examined and the source of its illness surgically removed. The full realization of this humiliation process has the same connotation as having your identity, position, esteem and self-worth excised.
9. Decide if you will allow your body/mind to heal itself, or do you prefer to cling to the pain for reasons you may not be fully aware of?
10. The lesson is to free yourself from burdensome situations. Be aware that further humiliations may be in store, but now you are better prepared to deal with it should it arise.
11. Once the decision is made, take immediate action to clean and purify the body/mind.

Accumulation of Kind Action

To many people, the word "accumulation" is associated with wealth, knowledge, possession, and personal power. This association is established for the mistaken purpose of self-protection by the demands made to forego gratification. They are borne of the nature of fear, the emotion that ultimately consumes one's life-force. Accumulation becomes ever more burdensome—obsessive, single-minded, prejudiced, evil, stressed, burned-out. As they expand, so too, will the problems inflicted on the body/mind. Gradually, living becomes only more difficult, and looming death is even more problematic.

Lao Tzu asserts that accumulation, literally, means frugality. He has pointed out that for governing people and following the heaven, nothing is better than frugality. Only frugality enables the pre-empty measures. Pre-empty measures mean a great accumulation of Te. A great accumulation of Te leaves nothing to be conquered. When nothing needs to be conquered, No-boundary is known.

Clearly, when frugality is the measure of daily life, one neither indulges in extravagance, nor allows selfishness to control. There should be no pollution in energy consumption; no ego anticipation in action; no contamination of heart; no confusion of mind; and no negativity arising through action. Then the pre-empty measures, can become the conductors of life. The literal interpretation of the pre-empty measures is "gathering (eating) Chi ahead of time." To realistically apply this concept is to fill the stomach with Chi before food is absorbed, and to restore the tranquility of spirit in the mind before ego pounces. There will be no elements of time limitation, competitive environment, or other pressures that forge a person to pursue with most gains ahead of others. The mentality of precaution and proactivation destroys the environment of selfness. The pre-empty measures embrace selflessness, existing before the matter, through kind action, and within the Tao.

Through frugality, the mind occupies itself with the material of universal energy. The mentality of universal space and the action of universal timing are uppermost in the mind before self-identity takes place. Self-identity is tied to self-esteem. With self-esteem comes self-dignity. Self-identity ensures the growth of self-esteem which then elevates itself to the position of self-dignity.

Self-dignity is totally opposite to ego-dignity. It is the self-center and self-interest. We all need these attributes to center ourselves. No one can do this for us. We must like ourselves if we expect others to like us. The conscious center of self-dignity is none other than conscious awareness. It exists for the sole purpose of abiding by the nature of kindness. Self-dignity is viewed as awareness, not an attained position. It is a state of openness with no self-restraint. It has no dignity in itself, but functions as an energetic circulation.

It is not surprising that dignity releases us from our last imprisonment before opening the spiritual door. Dignity has greater power than ego. By clinging desperately to dignity, ego maintains its staying power behind selfishness, ethnic identity, and belief patterns. When dignity occupies the crown of mind, the spiritual mentality of forgiveness, acceptance, generosity, kindness and compassion is lost. In abiding by the rules of administrative orders meted out by dignity, the entire world is under mechanical control.

In a world of me-first, above all others, how can we begin to contemplate the accumulation of kind action! With selfness at the helm, the standard definition of moral deeds is nevertheless based on the possession of a few immortal and divine beings. This application has no bearing on the unconditional, selfless, and universal Love that is already stored within the deepest layer of pure is-ness. Universal love is attained as the final destination of selfness existing by itself, having been released from its last stronghold. This is the real nature of Mother's mystic action, the Reality of Mind's realization, the Truthfulness of Nature's act.

Ji Te

The phrase ji te is used to represent the homework for spiritual practitioners: the blissful suffering of cultivation practices, and the objective measurement of any meditation outcome. The word "ji" means "accumulate." Ji Te is accumulating Te, the most challenging homework in all spiritual practice, more demanding than meditation and more difficult than sharing and giving. It is a constant purification process based upon the discipline of frugality as described above. Te is an objective energy entity but not a concrete object to be identified and possessed. It is the accumulation of kindness, loving energy and self-sacrifice. Ji Te is the transformation of the biophysical body into the loving Chi body. It is instrumental in elevating sexual and emotional Chi into loving and liberating Chi. It is a lesson in building an invisible energy world based upon deep conscious understanding and spiritual penetration.

In Chinese, Ji Te is the process of establishing the quality of Texing or Te-character. Without an accumulation of Te, there is no objective quality to be perceived by others. It is this accumulative practice, day after day, event following event and trial after trial, that dissolves the ego, purifies the body, and distills the mind. Whether one is spiritual or religious, an ethnic Chinese or foreign born, Ji Te exists as the objective reaction to one's actual being in all things. The highest concentration of material in both Buddhist and Taoist literature is devoted to Ji Te and Texing. In Taoism, it is said that 36,000 works of ji-ing the Te must be performed before one can think about transforming Shen into Xu. That appears to be an inordinate amount of homework, but is a necessary discipline. It is not insurmountable.

In our society there are many meditation techniques to learn, many skills to master, many opportunities for status seekers. Ji Te can be taught but not learned since once something is taught it is already secondary. You cannot process Ji Te; you simply sacrifice your life to its practice. It is more painful than any sickness, more degrading than humiliation. It entails more suffering than the nature of suffering itself. Yet, any one wishing to overcome oneself must first overcome these "blockages." Are you ready to begin?

The accumulated Te of a master will be applied to her/his spiritual name. It belongs to the master. Nobody can give someone else Texing, even though they may be the recipient of its loving kindness and hospitable generosity. Texing is very selfish; it honors only the one who honors it. That is the nature of spiritual energetic circulation. Any student desiring to build a good reputation in the practice of Texing will quickly learn that it cannot be mastered by learning from others. It must be a process of self-mastering. Ji Te and Texing belong only to the spiritual world. They are the feng shui of cosmic kindness, representing the mystic Te in kind action.

Equilibrium of Kind Action

Lao Tzu uses two words—eminent and inferior—to identify the chasm between non-minded, non-ego-anticipated natural action and self-minded, ego-persuaded and task-oriented action. Therefore, eminent Te is inaction and disengaged. For that reason it is constantly and eternally active, and nothing is left unfulfilled. Inferior Te never stops acting. For that reason it is inactive. It is the action of self-mindedness and illusion of ego-mind.

When eminent action descends into inferior action, that which is cemented in self-engagement rather than spontaneous action and eminent righteousness, it then reverts to the mind's engagement. When eminent righteousness engages, judgment steps into the picture, r*educing the results of engagements*. Once righteousness is dispersed, eminent justice engages but does not respond adequately to situations. For that reason it is frustrated. When Tao is lost, it becomes Action; when Action is lost, it becomes benevolence; when benevolence is lost, it becomes justice; when justice is lost, it becomes propriety. Propriety is the veneer of faith and loyalty, and the forefront of troubles. Foresight is the vain display of Tao and the forefront of foolishness.

Justice indulges in self-justification and cultural protection in social life. It bears no resemblance to kind action. It is based upon self-aggression and the counteraction of that aggression. Fairness, in the practice of justice, no longer exists as fairness. The more effective, protective and intelligent measures and calculations are established by the stronger sources of justice. Before the strong arm of justice, the fearless are in jeopardy and may lose their lives, but later, the karma of reaction surfaces. In the face of justice, the fearful can survive before final judgment is pronounced. Their physical bodies are temporarily protected, but their hearts cry out. As justice employs more and more procedures, society becomes more chaotic and disordered. That is not the nature of Tao; that is not kind action.

There is a clear-cut difference between moral discipline and social justice. Moral discipline is the conscientious measure of virtuous deeds carried out through love and kindness that has been balanced by the sacred mechanism. When love and kindness are remiss, the mind reacts unconsciously. Killing, stealing, lying, and all manner of "wrongful" behaviors arise. They serve the purpose of taking advantage of others (and ultimately the self) in a failed effort to compensate for their deficiency of love and kindness.

From this comes righteousness, the standard judgment of moral conduct. When righteousness is lost in ego's dominance and aggression, religious/political rules flourish, shaping social behavior by its own standard of righteousness. Righteousness then becomes the priority of social justice, the measurement of specific action. Kind action is transposed into dogmatic rules and social prejudice. When moral discipline falls into the category of social justice, moral conduct is replaced by social conduct: a set of collective activities initiated by certain individuals. A selective group has been approved to positions of authority by the collective mind. Moral discipline becomes a rational principle. The unconditional and selfless love descends into the conditional connection of selfish love. Kindness is the tool for attraction and compassion is the guise for ego gratification. Everything is lost in the maze of crude, ruthless, dehumanizing and rationalized rules being gratified and protected by the ego. In the midst of kind action and justice, saint and sinner exercise the extremes of good and bad: one saves as the other destroys.

People must understand that the quality of inactive kind action must be restored before love can pervade unconditionally. Then there will be no wrongdoing, no "moral" excuses, and no more social justice. The mind is lost and judgmental mind is lost. That, in itself, is kind action.

Cultivation upon Kind Action

Nature of Cultivation

From the perspective of the mind, cultivation begins in the self and ends with no-self. It is the transformation from mental engagement to full mindful awareness. The Taoist's perspective is that cultivation begins with no-self and culminates in universal-self: the golden elixir. No-self refers to the pure self that is not colored by the rational and intellectual mind, nor is it distracted by the desirable and egoistic heart. It is the power of wisdom mind as well as the space of pure heart.

When intelligence arises, there is great deal of manipulation. The very act of the canny, obsessive and hallucinative mind of this intellectual proliferation makes individuals unhappy, people calculating and society chaotic. Lao Tzu's statement was verified by C. G. Jung's professional experience as described in his biographical literature, Memories, Dreams, and Reflections. He related that "In my experience, therefore, the most difficult as well as the most ungrateful patients, apart from being habitual liars, are the so-called intellectuals. With them, one hand never knows what the other hand is doing. They cultivate a 'compartment psychology.' Anything can be settled by an intellect that is not subject to the control of feeling—and yet the intellectual still suffers from a neurosis if feeling is undeveloped." (1961, p. 145) The intellectuals can never bring in harmony what they think with what they feel. They cannot internalize their thoughts through conscientious Te before acting analytically. They walk through a narrow tunnel—the logical process—that is the neurosis of Western intellectualization or civilization in general.

It is only when the intellectual capacity can still itself that the desirable heart is suppressed. Only when the egoistic mind is dispelled can the true self take its rightful place. Peace and tranquility are the structure of mind's illumination, whereas originality and wisdom are the content of the mind's true intelligence. This intelligence is far beyond what cultivation and persuasion can reach. It is linked with every individual's pure and uncarved innate ability. When this ability connects to its source, it becomes the universal-self.

In order to achieve this, one must master the self, the seed of the Tao. Cultivate the self, treat the self by the standard of self, and the action is pure. Self is such an entity that it subjectifies the form of body/mind. It objectifies subjective images and visions with rationalized meanings and linguistic expressions. It further takes in images that body/mind receives and expresses through action that body/mind has internalized. It focuses on awareness, listens to the heart, speaks through the mouth, projects through mentality, and battles with non-self and false-selves. It is demonstrated by the body, conducted by mind, valued by justice, protected by selfhood, and greatly admired by the ego. When all these bits and pieces of selves are unified and crystallized through the nature of Tao, there is no difference between individual selves and others' selves; there is no separation between inner self and outer self; there is no space between pure self and no self.

Selfhood is such that individuality cannot exist where self-awareness does not exist. When the self is not understood, the true-being bears no specific meaning. But when awareness is self-bounded, the selfish comes to the fore. If the meaning of awareness is held only subjectively, there is no interaction or communication, only the constrained, isolated and frozen body. Should such a self be open to the public, it would be viewed as a disposable self, an unwanted blowing wind, a contaminated virus. If such a self should be desired by the public, it is deemed an ideal object, a mental connection or a wishful longing. Staying in this mode becomes boring, lonesome, and suspended. Moving outwardly with it is troublesome, exhausting, and boundless. Identifying with it is a fixation and letting-it-go becomes directionless. This is the poor selfless self, the self-bounded selfhood.

One way to treat the self is by understanding it according to the standard of self. Treat it as an objective entity, with no physical, emotional and mental attachment, whether as a carnal body, a conscious being or God's given specialty. Once this is out of the way, there will be a clear and thorough understanding of the color, texture, quality and usefulness of that self. Since Tao is suffused and blended within that self, it must be acknowledged as the only role model for the family in society and on earth.

What is inside and what is beyond will manifest uniformly. Within is the pure and true nature of that self. What is beyond is the boundless embracement and unification with the world of universe. When the identifiable self is pure, the mental space is boundless. It goes to family, community, nation and world. Cultivate the family, the action is plentiful. Cultivate the community, the action endures. Cultivate the nation, the action is fruitful. Cultivate the world, the action is all-pervading.

Cultivation takes the same path and covers the same territory with the notion of objective treatment. This objective treatment is the mindful and meditation concentration on that object embraced by the self. To quote Lao Tzu: Treat the family by the standard of family. Treat the community by the standard of community. Treat the nation by the standard of nation. Treat the world by the standard of world. Self is the world and the world is Self. Cultivating the self, establishing the family, governing the country, being peaceful with the world, and harmonizing into the Tao of nature are the ways of thus.

Lao Tzu asks himself "*How do I know how the world is such?" B*y uttering one word "Thus."

Entering the Mystical Te

When self is pure, it finds a supportive environment where it is able to enter into the space of mystic action within mystic action. Self-embraced mystic action is not mysterious, but rather plain and simple. Since the action of that mystic action is begetting but not possessing, enhancing but not dominating; (It) enlivens and nourishes, develops and cultivates, integrates and completes, raises and sustains. It enlivens without possessing. It acts without relying. It develops without controlling.

Taken further, Lao Tzu uses the conceptual entity of mind—knowledge—to tap into the mystic action. Knowledge, to Lao Tzu, is acquired mental information driven by conscious desire or egoistic persuasion. Knowledge is something that, at most, can be used to facilitate the mind by entering into the constant mindful but never minded information: the changing continuity with its spatial formation and timely manifest. Under this condition, one is required to have the ability and capacity of knowing around. However, it is not for the sake of pursuing the knowledge that is the very etiological and pathological nature of sickness.

His use of country connotes a double message. One is an individual body with bones and flesh, governed by the mind. The other is an independent nation with the land and its people being governed by a ruler. In the non-egoistic form, empowering oneself to take over a country has the same meaning as taking control of one's self before the ego-mind intercedes. Body is the country; the mental space occupied by the mind. No one can control the natural emptiness created for both the vastness of individuality and the visionary land to be conquered. This mental space is what distinguishes a human life from that of an animal. Whether the space is an individual configuration or a national territory, whether the energy in that space is for loving or governing, whether the energy which conducts the space is bio-sexual only or psycho-bio-sexual as well, the mental space remains the same. If you value the world as you do the body, you can be entrusted with the world; if you love the body as you love the beauty of the world, you can be responsible for the world

In a sense, knowledge is the energetic circulation, vibration and evaporation that conducts that space. Since energy is never fixed or dead, knowledge can be considered similarly, even though it is not as vibrant and enlivened as energy. It must be applicable, renewable, kinetic, and available. It does not exist as a fixed form but as a changing pattern; not a mental possession but a gift experienced; not a trademark but disposable garbage. It is not a pure virtue as the mind apparently treats it but a destructive monster in the beguiled mind's realization.

To obtain knowledge is necessary, but to have it is devastating; to apply it requires skill, to possess it freezes the mental adaptability. When the mind is not inured with knowledge, the mind is an empty "rock." (Even empty, it is still as hard as a rock; too difficult to influence and too hard to change.) While conditioned with knowledge, the mind becomes a slave to that knowledge. Trying to obtain it is an obsession; not demonstrating in front of mind decreases the price the mind has paid for it. Knowledge does not price itself but is ever at the mercy of mental occupation; it is not valued for its own virtue but by the ego's demand, and it is not fixed in any given action but constantly stained by conscious obsession.

When the nature of knowledge is understood by the mind, transformed and transpired by the mind, mystic action then will be seen in the eyes of the mind, viewed through the vision of mind, fused into action of the mind. Mystic action does not comfort the habits of mind nor satisfy mental confirmation of knowledge. It does not serve the needs of ego's demands. It can be fully experienced but can never be thoroughly explained; completely envisioned but never absolutely understood; mindfully anticipated but never analyzed with detail. Mystic action is mindless in its nature but mindful in the human spirit. It initiates itself into the originality of human nature but is beyond the capacity of the seeking mind. It is always there by itself but is never quite there in the analogy of mind. It is there when the mind is busy but never when the mind is preoccupied. It is very plain but remains forever a mystery to the potential of human mind.

Kind Action – Only Measurement

When unconditional love is replaced by self-interest love in the world of human communication and relationship, it will necessarily give rise to dislikes and animosities. It is nearly impossible for one who harbors this attitude and mentality to change they mind. As a person becomes more selfish, animosity feeds on itself. The longer it exists, the further it escalates. When this negativity becomes unbearable, the expression is hostile, indignant, and resentful. Violence can precede its final outcome, serving as a protective defense mechanism. Under these conditions, reconciliation is effected only when the situation can be dealt with beneficially. However, the real problem remains unresolved. Lao Tzu declares that reconciling a great hatred necessarily entails unsolved hatred. How can this be kindful?

This type of situation has been amplified by the peace negotiation in the Middle East. Hatred between the two nations has been deep and strong. The scars from this centuries-old-violence are so severe and evident that this deeply rooted hostility cannot or will not be reconciled by means of political talks and land bargaining. In this ancient battle ground innocent souls have been fiercely fighting one another while the land bears witness and washes away the blood. Who can promise to rule the forever changing unchangeable land? Who can benefit from bloodshed, the owner or the slave?

The separation of two factions in one nation is comparable to the separation between two mountains. The mountains, rising above the mouth of the valley, share their foundation and energy resource, and are content with their own valley existence. The space in between is so wide they cannot stand side by side, but they remain inseparable. Each mountain stands upon its own independent ground base, yet they both have the same valley-bottom.

Lao Tzu's observation of the matter is that the sage honors the left-hand tally but does not blame people. Left-hand tally is the stub kept of the record of the initial agreement. It is a promise of both the initial contract and the mindful hope for the result, but not the promise that no change can be made. The sage, of course, honors this. Should the sage hold fast to the tally and fight for the sake of an empty agreement? He should not, and he never does. Instead, his mind is open and his heart is open. Before kind action, he holds onto the tally. Before kindless action, he holds onto openness. That is the virtue of trustworthiness. That is the virtue of Loving. That is the virtue of kind action.

Before kind action, tally is always useful, not in itself, but because kind action makes it useful. Before kindless action, tally is the stone wall, the confronting distance, the initiation of violence. As previously discussed when selfish love holds the position, nothing else matters. What is the use of keeping one's promise? It has already been promised by and for selfishness. Love our enemy as we love ourselves; our enemy is the very hatred of our own self!

This is the symbolic representation of difference as two individuals, two nations, and two countries. This is the application of how we are all inseparable. Male and female are different but they need to sleep together; two races are two different families, but they must share the same land; two countries fly different flags but they share a common territorial line. T*he Tao of heaven is impersonal, it enhances those who are kind*. It is the genuine Love and unconditional Love that ties two people together. It is kindness and generosity that binds two families together. It is the vision and image that unify the two nations. This is the only way we can overcome the problem of "hatred." There is no other choice, not now or ever.

Conditional love is unstable and unreliable, subject to change, varying from love to hatred; unconditional Love has no boundary, no territory, no limit, no self. It is the ideal transformation of cultivation. Because of its unwavering love cultivation harmonizes people and nation, pure-person and universe, one and all.

Chapter 7
Between Palace and Temple

Fig. 7.1 34th Hexagram (Good Fortune)

The sixth line, at the heading of the 34th hexagram in I Ching, indicates that: "When the goat butts against the hedge, he can neither move forward nor go backward. Nothing further is served. Difficulty brings in good fortune." In this line the hedge represents both the divine religious orders and the institutionalized governing laws. People, as represented by the goat, are trapped in their country of residence as well as their temple of worship. Their spiritually transformed seed of goat (pelvic bones) in structuring the abdomen, is restrained by the blood of flesh and the passion of fire. Marching boldly forward defies the laws of the governing country (body), and falling back is against the natural rules of transcending power (sleeping spirit). They (sheep transformed from goat) live in conditions that will necessarily evoke a Revolution (Ge) of 49th hexagram.

Fig. 7.2 49th Hexagram (Revolution)

An authoritative government (the instinct within) has already been established in the previous hexagram, 48th the Well (Jing), the cosmic hollowing well, resulting from revolutionary reaction (God's corruption). This is symbolized as the pelt of an animal (slavery needs) that, through its use over the course of years (sacrifice), has lost its resiliency (the Chi of love), become softened (tamed), and consequently shed its original character (the spirit power). In like manner, time and change give rise to revolutionary action, a new beginning (a dreamed hope). Without this, man comes to a standstill, having been brainwashed or butting his head against an unyielding wall of laws. A new system must replace the old as symbolized by a new pelt being brought in. Man must garner his forces and skills in order to advance his life in his ongoing search for freedom.

Fig. 7.3 48th Hexagram (the Well)

This 49th hexagram is a composite of the clinging mentality and firing attitude of Li accompanied by the joyous mentality and spontaneous attitude of Dui. Li represents the abdomen (large intestine), the middle daughter, and happiness. Dui represents the mouth, the youngest daughter, and the faith. This hexagram illustrates the abdomen's clinging need for food to secure the body. The mouth is required to be expressive for the soul to be retained. The middle daughter clings to her physical reality of security and safety, and the youngest daughter desires spiritual freedom and spontaneous expression. When happiness greets faith, constant revolutionary action is invoked. The revolution arises from the expression of spirit and soul, through biological vibration and spiritual illumination. It is defined by governing laws and spiritual orders, legislated in palaces and temples, and rewarded through spiritual people.

How to restrain the clinging mentality of the soulful attachment is the function of a governing body. The mind must be stilled for the body to liberate itself from this obsessive clinging. How to purify the joyous mentality of spirit into its deep wisdom power is the function of transcending power. The spirit must be distilled to allow wisdom to manifest. This is the difficulty surrounding body and mind, people and spirit, state and church.

This is the state of entrapment, the condition of imprisonment and the situation of difficulty that necessitates revolution. This pervading atmosphere of battling can trace its origin to the revolution between heaven and earth, fire and water. Lake of chest is faced with the challenge of drying up, and abdomen is in imminent danger of starvation. The conscious meets the challenge of verbal exhaustion, while the unconscious is threatened by instinctive urging.

Fig. 7.4 17th Hexagram (Following)

Fortunately, the 49th hexagram can be carried on by the function of Cauldron (Ding): 50th hexagram. This journey is following through, as indicated by the third line of 17th hexagram: Following (Sui). The line expresses that "If one clings to a great man, s/he loses the little man. Through following, one finds what one seeks. Good for dwelling and preserving." In this description the little man/boy represents one who is immature and in a lower position. The great man embodies the unyielding position and its eternal quality. One will abandon childish actions by further seeking high spiritual quality. What one loses is what one has already experienced and digested; therefore, there is no need to cling. This is a powerful message to surrender to the inner truthful spirit in the process of dissolving all superficial actions and beliefs. One can then stay within the pure orphan state by sustaining the source from the great mother.

Lao Tzu has described the life situation of the orphan by further suggesting that they needs not seek gain from losing, nor loss from gaining. This is how we must live together. In both political and spiritual life, we must harmonize the care-taker role of government—the Goddess' role—and the wisdom power of church—the power of God—into inseparable and undivided oneness. By practicing such, people will be unified with their spirits, and government and the divining order will be integrated. Drawing Chi together into harmony is the father of teaching. No one saves people; they save themselves. No religion can liberate spirits; they reach enlightenment by themselves.

Taoists declare: "My body is the country, and my mind is the king. My life is controlled by me, not by God." They devote themselves to the Taoist approach that exclaims "I want to be and get pregnant by myself." This is why Taoism can never become institutionalized. The essence of Taoism has remained unchanged since its emergence in ancient China. Whether an emperor favored or disavowed the Tao, its teachings are steadfast, simple yet profound. Its essence endures. There have been some that tried to establish the Tao into a rigid and concrete entity, but were inevitably met with failure. At one time in the past, there was a verbal and literal confrontation between Buddhism and Taoism, although no violence occurred, and no lives were lost.

Lao Tzu exclaims I want to be wholly different from everybody else by taking the substance from the mother source. When the inner alchemy practice, meditation and cultivation, arrive at kind action, the body has sufficient energy to sustain itself, the mind is pure enough to allow shen to conduct daily business. The meditator is thus capable of performing kind action in society by loving "the people" and governing "the country." Loving the people is loving the energy (Chi), governing the country is governing the body. Body is the image of people; love is the energy of people; military is the means of managing the energy, and kingship is the holy crown of true self.

In Chapter 58 Lao Tzu explains that when the government is silent, people are sincere. When the government is intrusive, the state is decisive. The word decisive is guai in Chinese or jue in the Mawangdui texts. Linguistically, jue means to decide, to make a choice or to confirm. Jue was extended from guai whose meaning was to split, separate, break-through or resolve. The character guai, which is the 43rd hexagram, is the only one that Lao Tzu has applied from the teaching of I Ching: Resoluteness (Guai). The character guai initially means to separate, break apart or split material. It is composed with the strokes of hand and object, indicating that hands break an object into pieces.

Fig. 7.5 43rd Hexagram (Break through)

This was perhaps the earliest method of distribution: breaking and dividing the objects with hands and distributing them evenly or with preference among family members. When the meat was cooked, the head of the family broke it apart into small pieces for all family members to share. Later still, the guai came to represent the emperor's jade seal. The seal had a carved edge and could be handheld through a hole bored for this purpose. Or as a protective measure it could be worn around the neck with a decorative silk thread. In the history of human development, the earliest method of decision making and material distribution of guai has been gradually extended into linguistic format to outline laws and rules and justice practices. The material objects (such as meat) were replaced by the decisions or choices made by mind and the written words. Official documentation began to circulate within the court and state.

Lao Tzu advises that when the government is intrusive, the state is decisive, referring to conditions between the governing body and its state affairs. The head of the family becomes the ruler of a state, and the family matters are expanded into state affairs. Instead of directly punishing or rewarding members with the power of hands, letters and documents became the slapping power, willful acknowledgment, and disguised congratulations as the rulers began to hire officials and executors to carry out their orders. The more intrusive the government became, the more rules, regulations and legislation were enacted. More official documents and orders were distributed in the state, proliferating rapidly into what exists in government today.

As the 43rd hexagram has indicated, and as a rule of natural order, the primary decision arises from either masculine or feminine perspective. The old man, the horse, heaven, the father or husband represents the lower trigram, while the youngest daughter, the sheep, the concubine, the beauty or the vampire represents the upper trigram. The decisiveness of heavenly power serves as the base of cosmic foundation, while the indecisive joyful lake of beauty is the creative transition. This eternal order represents the ultimate demarcation between wisdom and youth, stillness and passion, understanding and feeling, penetration and creation, and separation and unification: the unique unqualified cosmic structure.

Externally, people represent food, material, and energy circulation, while country represents hands, mentality, and wisdom power. Earth produces food, mother gives birth to all creatures, and love makes everything commence and flow. This is the power of yin: the virgin, the receptivity, and the resurrection. Hands are the makers of all things, mind is the decision of all things, and wisdom power is the light of all things. This is the power of yang, the creation, the penetration, and the separation.

In true spiritual life, therefore, the mind must be decisive, the body transformed, and karma purified. This is the cosmic Chi Kung practice, the third stage of Taoist inner alchemical practice: transforming Shen into Xu. The mind should no longer be selfish, the soul no longer egoistic, sensation no longer scattered, and body no longer contaminated. We then have the most desirable marriage, the highest unification, and the most peaceful harmony. The inner body/mind is in harmony to process food and interact with the environment. The decisive mind never wavers from awareness of inner stillness and inner sacrifice. Chaos must be put in order. The striking footsteps must be firm. Any alarming distraction must be registered subconsciously. One's facial expression should be serene, yet severe and firm. One's lack of creativity (represented by the skin damage on the thigh in the fourth line) should be awakened by spontaneous inspiration rather than anticipated participation. Poisoned meat must be eliminated, the weed-covered land must be cultivated, and the sickened body/mind must be purified. This is the literal expression of the Guai and the practical application of this chapter.

Loving the People

What are "People"?

People are of both a unified and a collective body/mind. People are what a country is all about: a single and unified entity of land and population. Land is where people are born, live and die. Altogether, people make up the population and become the caretakers of the land. As a collective body/mind, society is made up of necessary habits, customs and rules. These three are the richness of a nation, since they comprise and embrace color and flower, beauty and attraction, discipline and order. People are the citizenry of the land and rivers, they are love and benevolence, justice and troublemakers; people are the destroyers.

We are told that the sage has no benevolence, he treats his people like strawdogs and the sage is always without his own mind: utilizing the people's minds as his mind. Only when the sage is free from benevolence and mind, can he manage benevolence objectively and be mindful of the people's minds. The sage is the source of mind, and people are the active mind. Benevolence is the internal balance. The deeper the sage is connected to the source, the more mindful are people's actions. As they become more mindful they also become more faithful and loving toward their source. Since the sage has faith in himself and in the people, no distrust or mistrust can be discerned. Only benevolence measures. When faith is weak, there is distrust—especially in the worth of speech. Results speak for themselves.

In the context of nature, the reason why rivers and seas have the capacity for kingship over all the valleys is that they excel in lowliness. That is why they have the capacity for kingship over all valleys. Thus, since the sage wants to elevate the people, his speech is down to earth. Since the sage wants to advance the people, he positions himself at the back. So that when he is at the front, people do not harm him. When he stands above, people do not feel pressure. The whole world supports him untiringly. Since he does not rely on competition, the world has nothing with which to compete. The sage is neither a political nor religious leader, but a combination of both. He has the least ego but balances the emperor's enormous ego. This can be illustrated by the history of the Chinese political structure and its religious practices. The motto of an emperor in the Chinese mind is "to act on behalf of the Tao of Heaven."(ti-tian-xing-dao) The mixed role he plays, the ambivalent position he holds, the limited power he exerts, and the political fantasy of which he dreams, positions the emperor as both a human being and a heavenly emperor. His ego power circulates endlessly as he merges in his autocratic monarchy.

The Taoist beliefs become the inner vision that the emperor can only imagine and the outer attraction that he is able to demonstrate. The Confucius discipline becomes the customary rule that enables the emperor to launch his political execution and exercise his moral restraint. Taoist ideas give him the freedom, and Confucius disciplines provide him with security. To the Chinese people, the heavenly emperor's power is as directive and active as the emperor's orders, but the emperor's spirituality is no greater than that of the citizenry. It is the presence of egoistic power and the invisibility of spiritual fantasy that gives rise to the emperor's unlimited role. It is this conditioned reality and unrestrained spirituality that provides the people only a limited position within which to settle, but an open space to explore.

How to Love People

To love people is to be unselfish and have a non-minded awareness, intention, attention and engagement. When the ego-self and its selfishness are expunged from mind, the heart is open, the love is all pervasive. To love the people is to have kind action and to have enough adequate faith within kind action. When there is adequate faith, people live happily and die gloriously. Faith allows the sage's mind to be as pure and clean as that of a child, and the people's minds to be clear and simple as an uncarved log. The sage's smile is the hope within people's hearts. The full display of his vital force is the wish carried in the people's minds. This spontaneous action is the undisplayed direction followed by the people.

Lao Tzu advises: Do not exalt intelligence and people will not compete; do not value rare goods and people will not steal; do not display for public view and people will not desire. Get rid of wisdom, abandon intelligence, and people will benefit a hundredfold. Get rid of benevolence, abandon justice, and people will return to filial piety and kindness. Get rid of skill, abandon profit, and thieves will disappear. These three are inadequate. This always makes people not know and not desire. This always makes the knower dare not act. So just let things be. Observe the plain and embrace the simple.

How to take care of People
Employing the Unknown Virtue

According to Lao Tzu's strategy: Those who practiced Tao in olden times did not enlighten people, rather they made them simple. No one can bestow enlightenment upon another. Enlightenment must be an individual journey over universal land. When people live their simple life, they become enlightened along their own God-given journeys. Lao Tzu further explains the reason for this by saying: What makes it the hardest to govern the people is what they already know. It becomes most difficult to govern the people because of their knowledge. The more knowledge people have, the more bizarre things appear.

To know what one knows is a gift. This inward process is a procedure that seeks the connection, a way of tapping into God's creative mystery. Knowledge is a mental product, a seed of mind.

To have knowledge is to have skill. To be able to know is a human skill, to be capable of *know*ing around is a human mentality; to obtain knowledge is to obtain the ego possession, and to transfer the knowledge is to transfer the ego obsession.

The best way to deal with knowledge is to abandon it; the best way to deal with the knower is to become grounded with the stillness of the unknown. Using knowledge to govern the country, knowledge itself becomes the thief of the country. Not using knowledge to govern the country, knowledge itself is the action of the country. Always realize that these two are the model for ruling.

Formula before the Fear

There is a story behind this formula. When Genghis Khan marched through the land of China, killing was the purpose as well as the reward. He was astonished and awakened by Chiu Chuji's perception that "People are unafraid of death." Quoting directly from Lao Tzu. Chiu Chuji was the founder of the Dragon-Gate School of Taoism (1148 - 1227). The underlying message is that you cannot kill all the people, because people are fearless before the power. They are the power. When fear arises, it will be overwhelming. Fear can lead to the death of an entire race of humans and their nation. The tragic experience and homeless life style recorded in Jewish history follows this concept.

Whenever people are unafraid of death, how can killing be used as a threat? When people take up arms to battle against the will of their honest heart in a selfish action, they must be taught a lesson. This holds true as well when they use their desiring heart to achieve their personalized "perfection." The discipline of killing in accordance with nature's law is based entirely upon people's action and the results of that action. Whenever people are afraid of death and are acting contrary, I will catch and kill them; who else can act so? When people are fearful of death yet themselves become killers, they perform the duty of an executioner. This is like doing carving for a master craftsman. Doing the carving for a master craftsman, how could one's hand not get cut?

The message is to let the killers kill each other. Since the duty of an executioner is to exercise his natural law, he is destined to kill, thereby exercising the discipline of the ruler, as well as freeing the innocent from the task.

Practical Success

Success is determined by self-accomplishment toward affairs through the inner power of dedication, determination and will. Without inner accomplishment, there can be no social recognition of success. Success is consequent to all affairs. It does not proclaim its own existence. Why cleave to it? In Taoism, success is about the personal liberation upon energy transformation with no acknowledgment of social appraisal. Since the value of life itself is constructed within kind action, there is no need for social recognition. It is within the people's hearts, and its reward is the final outcome, that of becoming immortal.

In regard to the majority of people, their engagement in affairs fails prior to the success. They are either lost within themselves or they exhaust themselves before they reach success. To quote: "Give as much careful attention to the end as to the beginning; then the affairs will not fail." It is on that account that the sage desires not to desire and does not value goods that are hard to get. He learns not to learn and restores the common people's losses. He is able to support the nature of all things and, not daring, to impose action.

Governing the Country

Nature of a Country

The nature of a country within a society is as concrete and subtle as the given name of an individual. The image of a country is as fragile and delicate as the fleeting thoughts transpiring in the mind. The structure of a country is as tangible and existential as one's personal identity, and the heritage of a country is as strong and firm as the belief of a seeker.

Within any given country, land is the soil, mountains are the breasts, rivers are the blood stream and people are the residents. Youth is the flower, intellect the attraction, and culture the adornment. The country is customized with various structural patterns and decorative colors. The army is the protector and the government is the destroyer. For a country, environment is the body, king is the mind, people are the consciousness, religion is the conscience, government is the ego, founding fathers are the spirits or the worshipers. Within a country, people are the essence, culture is the vitality, and administration is the spirit. People must engage with a peaceful mindset and be at ease with themselves for the land to be cultivated and the country healthy. When the culture is vital and energetic, the mind is nurtured and the country is rich. When the administration is clean and simple, society is well preserved and the country is tranquil.

A country is the identity of a strong ethnic group that is foreshadowed by weaker ones. A small country is a small family, and a large country is a large community. The territorial line between countries is like a projection of thought, an image of mind, an identity of ego, a sign of victory, a call to attention, and a protection from fear. The gates within the line are wide open and as smooth as the communication between two lovers. The walls between the line are as firm as the belief systems of two distinguished cultures. The light shining through the line is as bright and joyful as our individual dreams, and the fire burning upon the line is as hot and flaming as a cultural expectation.

The territorial line itself is the mark of a war, the bloody stain left by the sacrificer, the victorious declaration of the winner, and the surrendering confirmation of the loser. The territory is where the nationality is defined and passports are required. It is where politics rule, immersed within their own inseparable boundaries. It is where the bodies of two nationalities attract one another, the minds of two languages communicate in one way or another, and the seeds of cultural unification give birth to one another.

The line itself is as subtle as the flow of two different streams of consciousness and as broad as the projection of the mind's eye. It is the longest distance the ego can cover with acceptance; the final proof that justice can demonstrate and protect. It stands before the eyes when ego speaks forth, but is hidden behind a curtain when consciousness flows through. It is why two nationalities can exist with each other and two cultures can meld. The life of an individual, a family, community, nation and culture is the demarcation of this territorial line. What powerful marks the mind has been drawing! What a beautiful inspiring flag the ego has been waving! What a comfortable state in which the people are caged!

Ways of Governing the Country

Governing a country can be as complex a process as healing one's physical illness. When the body is in harmony with the mind and environment, the resulting state is that of health. When dealing with illness, the mind must take responsibility for seeking its own cure. Working through sickness allows for further growth and transformation. Living with sickness allows one to understand the meaning, distance and duration of life. Working through the self and seeking professional help are the two ways of solving the problems. Working through the self has always been the primary hope, method, and task. With no internal demand, there can be no professional help; without the need to break through, the spiritual help that is forever present becomes remote. By liberating from these two, one reaches the ultimate freedom and enlightenment. The body must live and die; the soul must be drawn into the eternal marriage of love and peace.

In matters of government, Lao Tzu suggests: Not constraining the living environment. They (people) do not get bored by life. Because we do not get bored, there is no boredom. All problems within a society are created by the confusion and conflict of mind, thus generating legal practice and military interference. The more prohibitions there are in the world, the poorer the people will be. The more rules and demands that flourish, the more thefts there will be.

Lao Tzu sharply criticizes the failure of a government by stating: The reason people are starving is because the government taxes too much. This is the reason for starvation. The reason people are hard to govern is because their leaders are actively engaged. This is why they are hard to govern. The reason people are not serious about death is because they seek the burdens of life. This is why they are not serious about death.

It is critical to know that the mind exhausts the bodily energy in the same manner that the government exhausts people's energy. On the one hand, government flourishes from the actions of its people. Without people, the government is an empty ego form and its administrative office becomes an empty funeral chapel. On the other hand, government is the powerhouse of involved people seeking the burdens of life because of their enslaved needs and the collective wishes of their government.

Lao Tzu has also proposed that: Governing a large country is like cooking a small fish. Use the right lawfulness to govern the country. How do I know this is so? When no-boundary is known, it allows the country to exist. The country, existing from its source, can endure. The role of a government is to integrate the diversified social elements into a grand harmony without judging or valuing the goodness of intention, efficiency of process, quality of the products, and resultant teachings. The character of government is an invisible mind with kindness and a visible body with force. It is the fusion of will and the penetration of power. It should be a beautiful harmony of simplicity, not a diversified organization of complexity. This is the right lawfulness, the art of cooking (frying) a small fish, that each and every soul swims in the oceanic body.

Whoever understands the people's needs knows how a government should govern. Whoever stands on the people's side wins the war, and whoever envisions the picture of a clean, healthy, productive and harmonious environment, is capable of taking over the power of beauty. When the country is in big trouble, there arises patriotism. Whoever can bear the disgrace of the country is the ruler of the country. Whoever can bear the misfortune of the world is the ruler of the world.

The story of Gandhi serves as an example of this statement. He might not have read Lao Tzu or the book of Tao Te Ching, but it makes no difference to either Gandhi or Lao Tzu. What Gandhi did was not for himself although the power emerged from his inner self. What Lao Tzu stated was not for his benefit even though it "came" through his own mind.

Mutual Existence of Countries

A great nation flows downwardly; it is the mother of the world, and the integration of the world. The mother is always tranquil and overcomes the male by her tranquility; so she benefits the world. A great nation relies on a low position to take over a small nation. A small nation, being in a low position, is taken over by a great nation. So being lower allows for taking over or being taken over. Being a great nation only desires to unify the people. Being a small nation only seeks people's business. They both get what they want, but the greater is in being the lower.

A big country opens her mouth to the sea with her main stream body. Her position is naturally lower than the smaller countries that have only small rivers running miles to or away from the sea. A small country or nation is already in the lower position. It lacks the resources to expand. With no valuable resources, her most important and only business is her people. The small country of Japan has emerged as an economically powerful nation by thriving upon her people's business: the collective power of mind.

The application of international relationship is not to stomp upon the divisions but to whirl around them, not to draw the line but to flow along the line. The cultural dots are already there and the racial lines have already been there. The coating of cultural dots cannot be covered up since they are the cultural image and personality. How can one understand modern Western culture without the aid of a scientific approach? How can one engage in Indian mystical practice without first knowing Yoga? And how can one understand the Chinese mind with no knowledge of Chinese philosophy?

With the same reasoning, one can walk along the racial line, but find no way to cross it. The line is invisible. Inside that invisible line the race is a sleeping lion. The line cannot be crossed without destroying its existence. If the mind is open, the line becomes visible; the space around the line vibrant. Everyone can walk through or even step on the line. That is the nature of mutual and neutral co-existence. That is the nature of the communicative heart of human beings, the bearers of the greatest potential existence on earth.

Military

Nature of War

War is the final result of mental conflict, the breakthrough of ego confrontation, the reconstruction of distorted justice, the restoration of absent conscience, and the redistribution of the power structure. When there is a conflict or confrontation due to misunderstanding and mistrust, the tension and heat may accelerate to the degree that antagonism and contention are the only reality. This can escalate, resulting in war as the best or only solution. When power is used excessively, as it is in any aggressive invasion, as coercive, obsessive exploitation and suppressive punishment, these abusive actions culminate in war. Ultimately, the power holder will necessarily be overpowered by the persons or parties that had been suppressed and oppressed. Similarly, when opposing armies clash, those who cry win! Stiffness and callousness are the company of death. Softness and suppleness are the company of life. The powerful army will not win. A stiff tree will break. So stiffness and callousness stay below. Softness and suppleness stay above.

This observation explains that war is the only means to exchange the power structure, thereby restoring peace and uplifting human conscience. By its very nature, war is self-destructive. If there were no blockage, no misunderstanding, no ego obsession, no holding-on, there would be no war. War is itself the sign of demonstration from individual involution to group evolution, from self actualization to cultural civilization, and from inter-personal hatred to the social expression of that hatred. To understand the nature of war is to understand the nature of human inner conflict between conscientious spiritual awareness and the unjust action of ego, between submission to the power of body and the full display of the power of mind.

War is, in effect, an evolutionary process of changing the human adaptive strategy from passive reaction to aggressive control. This applies to both natural and social environment. War evolves from the destructive character of egoist aggression, whereas peace arrives through the constructive nature of human spirit. The old habits and systems held firmly for generations must be severed to allow the new to exist. The process of change is extremely difficult. It may take a war to forcefully demand the transition, ensure the change, and announce the new order.

The process of war can be recognized as twofold, with both positive and negative experiences as the outcome, regardless of extenuating situations. As the boundaries of attachment are broken in order to enter into the freedom of unknown, the future is uncertain and unpredictable. It can be as destructive as the decaying and deforming process of any material existence. War is too painful and shattering for anyone to be required to experience its ravaging consequences. It is devastating to be at death's door in the prime of life, witnessing fallen comrades cross its threshold. Within the war zone, there is no glimmer of mental anticipation; only gunfire, the sound of explosions causing untold destruction, the crying of hearts, the burning of flesh, and the drifting ashes.

The underlying fuse for this erupting conflict was ignited by the power of ego, the power of mind gone mad. Since war has no conscientious evaluation and appraisal, it disregards any social justice. The person who launches war justifies himself to protect his ego.

If war could be justified, Jewish people would not have been denied their right to reside in Israel for these many years. The American Indians would not have been forced to live on reservations. Nothing matters in war except who is defeated, who is victorious. To the victor goes the power to demonstrate justice; to the defeated that have forfeited survivorship goes the preservation of justice which will ensure future revenge.

When the country being invaded has the wherewithal to defend and protect itself, the invasion is thwarted. If they have no defense, it is no longer an invasion but an act of submission to the invaders. The invaders display their power and authority. Whether native or invader they are all the same before the power flow of nature. War is fair to everyone. If the position of power is over, the present power structure cannot endure. If it is the time for another power to take over, it cannot fail. Neither side is willing to be subdued. Nature itself must force the issue of power.

When the inner conscience is alive in everybody's heart, there will be no war. However, when war is necessary, the side with inner conscience stands the greater chance of victory. This is not to say that the lack of a motivated inner conscience will necessarily precipitate a loss. The final solution depends on who is granted the power by the turn of nature. Nobody can change this or influence this immutable fact. Call it the power of God or the justice of God; this turn of nature is beyond man's manipulation. The Mongolian, Arabian, Manchurian, the Europeans and the Japanese have all tried to invade the land of China. They all failed; there is no possible way for them to take it over and keep it for themselves. No one can take away "the beauty" from the king unless he is willing to share it, and no one can take care of "the beauty" other than the king-beast, the perfect match to the beauty of the human flower.

This is the truth, the fact and the justice of the animal world, of which we are an element. The stronger, quicker and more intelligent hold the seat of power. The weaker, slower and less intelligent form the masses. They are relegated to carry out the more menial tasks, to be subservient. The financially poor, the mentally retarded, the uneducated live out their natural life span. Consequently, the richer, stronger and smarter must take charge of their submissive partners lest might they be overtaken by new invaders who emerge from the ranks. Lao Tzu revealed that: When opposing armies clash, those who cry win! In world history, Rome, Persia, China, Mongolia, France, England, all enjoyed their time of glory. America is now having its time. Can it last?

On this subject Lao Tzu proposes: Using the Tao as the rule for governing the people, do not employ the army as the power of the world, for this is likely to backfire. Where the army has marched, thorns and briars grow. Being good has its own consequence, which cannot be seized by power. Achieving without arrogance, achieving without bragging, achieving without damage, achieving without taking ownership. This is called achieving without force. Matter becomes strong, then old. This is called "Not-Tao." Dying young is "Not-Tao."

Military – Strong Army

Military signifies the best preparation of ego protection and the final defense against the fear of death. Lao Tzu states implicitly that: The strong army is the mechanism of bad luck. The elements of the world may oppose it. So those who have ambitions cannot rest. Therefore the nobleman takes his place on the left side, and the commander on the right side. So the army is not the nobleman's weapon. As a mechanism of bad luck, he uses it only as the last resort. Then the best way is to use it quickly and destructively. Do not enjoy this. To take delight in it is to enjoy killing people. Those who enjoy killing people do not attract the favor of the world. The good inclines to the left, the bad inclines to the right. Thus the intelligent officer stays on the left, the army commander stays on the right. Speaking in an image of sadness, after killing the people, every one stands in mourning. Victory is celebrated as a funeral service.

Lao Tzu has taken a humanistic stance by treating the army as the last resort and not the best display. The left position is the auspicious one while the right side indicates bad luck. By its very nature, winning a war is based upon the death and surrender of others. Of course, the victory should be celebrated as a funeral service. The personification of patriotism is at most an extension of selfish love. It does not entail a picture of fairness and non-partiality. Also, war is the extreme of competition; both the winner and loser have mixed feelings of accepting the reality, there is resentment and dissatisfaction. A sense of fear and uncertainty about the future lurks on the victorious side and a strong will for vengeance and retaliation arises on the losing side.

The ultimate reality, as Lao Tzu explains, is that even if weapons are far more numerous than people, they are not used. The more and sharper the weapons the people have, the more chaotic the nation will be. Let people be serious about death and enjoy a long journey. Though there are carriages and boats, they are not useful for travel. Let people return to use the technique of knotting the rope, to enjoy the food, to appreciate the cloth, to delight in customs, and to settle in their living conditions. The neighbor countries are in sight. The sounds of dogs and chickens are heard. People grow old and die without interfering with each other. How beautiful such a picture of country and people is: the simple government and plain citizens. If all people mind their own way, are mindful only of their own business and content with themselves, then everyone's mind is at peace, the whole world flows harmoniously at the pace of a peaceful state.

Mentality of Winning

Being a good warrior does not entail power. A good fighter is not angry. One who is good at overcoming the enemy does not contact him. One who is good at leading people acts humbly. This is called the Action of non-competition. This is called leading people. This is called the Ultimate as old as heaven. When there is an absence of power, the mind preserves its total clarity and awareness. When a person is not angry, there is no emotional disturbance before the action. When there is no confrontation, there is no exhaustion of energy consumption. When the mind is humble, the people are encouraged and the work is done.

Lao Tzu further explains that I dare not be the host, but rather a guest. I dare not advance an inch, but rather retreat a foot. This is called performing without performing, rolling up one's sleeves without showing the arms. By not holding on to an enemy, there is no enemy. There is no disaster greater than having no enemy. Having no enemy almost destroys my treasure. What Lao Tzu is saying is that one should never underestimate anything, especially the enemy. In the use of military force, overestimation loses an opportunity and underestimation loses the war. Being a host welcomes the war, being a guest conducts the war. In advancing the body is exposed; in retreating the body preserves the resource. The body must be relaxed, the mind must be disengaged. Exploring this, before action, the mind anticipates without expectation. During confrontation, the body/mind is actively engaging without losing its ground. When the battle is over, no scar is found on the body and there is no memory remaining in the mind.

Military Strategies

Use the unexpected to conduct the battle. Use disengagement to take over the world. This is because when you want to constrict something, you must first let it expand; When you want to weaken something, you must first enable it; When you want to eliminate something, you must first allow it; When you want to conquer something, you must first let it be. This is called the Fine Light. The weak overcomes the strong. Fish cannot live away from the source. The sharp weapon of the nation should never be displayed, nor should it be traded. Treasure is something that should be kept secretly and preserved carefully. When it is displayed, it invites manipulation, its secret is exposed, rendering the treasure valueless. Nor should the treasure be considered an economic gain; it is an act of self-betrayal. Judging how effectively America keeps its military weaponry under wraps—a closely guarded secret—we can understand that displaying it would be an open invitation to the enemy. There may be a monetary gain to some, but it would prove to be self-defeating action. We would create an unthinkable backlash of retribution. Can we afford to pay the price of such a backfire? Can we secure ourselves safely behind our best defensive mechanism?

Kingship

Widow or Orphan?

What the world hates is the widow and orphan without support. But lords and rulers name themselves these. Widow, on the one hand, is the mother without a husband. She lives with the nature of Motherhood; welcoming the power of penetration. She enjoys the unselfish care-taking, provides the needed nourishment, and returns finally to her frozen empty-womb state where the egg again becomes milk.

Orphan, on the other hand, is the son whose mother gave birth to him. He remembers only the sucking but the source is no longer there to sustain him. He holds the memory of his father inside his blood without the conscious awareness of the father's identity. So he returns to the mountain and sleeps inside the cave. The memory of sucking is restored with embryonic breathing; his mother's image is vibrating within his body, and his father's spirit shines inside his heart. His mother cries tearfully, expressing the people's joyfulness. His father laughs willfully, demonstrating the people's faithfulness. He becomes the Oneness of One.

Supportiveness of the Tao 求道

Tao is eternally nameless. Though simplicity is small, the world cannot treat it as subservient. If lords and rulers can hold on to it, everything becomes self-sufficient. Heaven and earth combine and allow sweet dew. Without rules, people will naturally become equal. At the outset, the rule must be expressed. Once it exists, quit saying it. The result of not saying it is to be without danger. In a manner of speaking, Tao is to the world as the rivers are to oceans and seas.

Tao is eternally nameless. If lords and rulers would abide by it, all things would evolve of themselves. What evolves desires to act. I, then, suffuse this with nameless simplicity. Suffusing with nameless simplicity is without humiliation. Without humiliation, peace arises. Heaven and earth regulate themselves. Simplicity refers to the procreative stage that ensures the maturity and complexity with the primary vitality. It serves also as the returning and revitalization that channel the changes merging from maturity and complexity. Unifying this notion of the Tao endows one with a peaceful mind, a happy life, and a full stomach. What more can be needed?

Chapter VIII
Longevity and Immortality

In this chapter, we gather all the energy in the brain or “niwan,” which is one of the many Taoist terms for brain: with “ni” for “mud” and “wan” for “elixir.” When the brain is in a state of emptiness, numerous holes in it will open and connect to the cosmic power, emitting cloud-like cosmic smoke. Then Te becomes the root of heaven unifying all that surrounds it. The brain serves as the cosmic water base or sacred lake, inviting the highest spiritual cultivation, unifying the five element-Chi into Wu Chi state.

The pure spirit or elixir or pure person flourishes in this sacred undercurrent like a rootless lotus flower. The brain serves as the temple of minds where all likened individuals gather to promote their mutual understanding, affection and growth. Brain is not the root of ego and instinct, but the mason of spirit and wisdom. The eight sections of brain skull represent the back of a tortoise. The nine palaces (holes) in the brain connect the tailbone and sacrum allowing the pure flow of Chi in the body/mind. When the abdominal Chi is gathered and purified in the brain, the nine palaces connect further with the nine stars in the universe, thereby providing all the necessary nutrition required by the body/mind.

Fig. 8.1 45th Hexagram (Gathering)

In I Ching, this notion is expressed by the 45th hexagram: Gathering Together (Cui). As we learned from a powerful and representative decision rendered by a sage, all the spirits gather together to purify their wounded souls and cloudy minds. A temple is built to pay tribute to ancestors, thereby unifying all the spirits, body/minded, enlightened and abandoned, into one family. This family represents our common spiritual foundation, the mutual connection and our common destination.

This is the transition from “Guai” to “Cui” where the heaven trigram in “Guai” transforms into earth trigram in “Cui.” Earth represents the cosmic mother, the root of heaven, and the creative womb of universal creatures. In 43rd hexagram, the spiritual mind is elevated to follow a higher spiritual path. One’s needs are diminished, instinctive behavior is abandoned in order to embrace the power of Te. When Te unifies all the spirits within her family, the spiritual mason and the lost souls are unified. Spiritual flowers and fruits are produced, longevity is ensured and immortality results. This can be envisioned as the transition from order to work, from discipline to obedience, from self-realization to self-actualization. Therefore, longevity is the order, the discipline and the self-realization. The immortality is the work, the obedience and the self-actualization. Longevity is a wish and immortality is the result of the wish. Now let us explore this wish.

Tapping the Gate of Longevity

Reasoning, Out

In the history of mankind, longevity has been the most common desire of the mind. There is no greater wish of the mind than to attain spiritual immortality. Longevity is an infinite mental desire that drives the finite existing body beyond its natural duration. This desire can be traced to an unpredictable miscalculation of the exact duration of a natural life cycle. It may also have its source from an excessive push from the transcendental spirit. The miscalculation is due to the faulty information being driven by ego anticipation. The push is an attempt made by spirit to escape from the existence of the trapped body and mind as quickly as possible.

Only a small minority of people can master the use of predicting one’s physical life journey. The masters of meditation can do so. A good doctor can predict the final outcome of a clinical patient’s duration based upon pathological evidence. A clear-minded person may get a small sense of it as foresight. Yet the spiritual life is independent from that of physical life. The body has no choice but to die, but the mind can choose when to release a final exhalation.

The willful anticipation of mind plays an important role in terms of the overall situation of death and dying. If a person has made up they mind to commit suicide, no one can prevent it. The unfinished jobs that have been devised by the mind must be updated or displaced before the spirit departs the body and this world. The decision comes from within. The proper approach is to live life fully without fighting against the nature of death. This can be illustrated from the life stories of Buddha or Jesus, both of whom were religious founders as well as superior masters of meditation. Buddha once ate poisoned meat to hasten his last breath; Jesus was crucified after his last meal. They each knew what awaited them: to liberate from death through mastering the spirit's way.

A life span of several hundred years was not uncommon for ancient Taoist sages. For example, Guang Chengzi, the Yellow Emperor's guru, lived over one thousand and two hundred years according to Zhuang Zi (Chuang Tse). Yet longevity cannot replace immortality. One needn't live a long physical life in order to achieve immortality. Wang Chunyang, the founder of the Complete-Reality School of Taoism, lived only to the age of fifty-eight years.

Distilling the Mental Clouds

When the ego retreats completely, the body is able to live its fullest physical life journey. When the mind disappears completely, the immortality or the native spiritual eternity, becomes fully present. Longevity is the process of changing within unchanging, while immortality is the character of the sameness of unchanging within the changing. Changing from and toward unchanging could never be predicted by the ego. In unchanging within the changing, the mind can never experience emptiness within nothingness. The unchanging is the union of black and white; the changing within is the transformation of rainbow bridge, the racial distribution of mankind. Understanding the white and holding on to the black enables the formation of the world. Being the formation of the world, ongoing action does not stray. When ongoing action does not stray, it returns to the infinite. This simplicity takes shape as a mechanism. The sage makes it the head ruler. Great ruling never divides.

The formation of the world is constructed within the mechanism; great ruling is what governs it. This is the mechanism of life and death, birth and rebirth. From sunrise to sunset, from night to day, it is a sleepless resting continuity of free changing process. From male to female, white to black, fire to water, it is the power of penetration. From female to male, black to white, water to fire, it is the power of receptiveness. Penetrating and receiving continues with no sign of beginning or end. The two never stray apart from each other: the Oneness within, the formation of the world. This action comes from nowhere, is present and exists everywhere. There is nothing above it still to be accounted for; there is nothing below it that has been excluded. Ever searching for it, it is beyond naming. It returns to no-thing. Its state is described as no state, its form is described as formless. It is called the vision beyond focus. Follow after it, and it proves endless. Go before it, and no beginning is found. Employ the Tao of today in order to manage today's affairs and to know the ancient past. This is called the principle of Tao.

Calling upon the Valley Spirit

As our mind begins to work, we understand the workability of the world. When our mind starts changing direction, we make sense of the change in our changing world. When our mind ceases to change, we conclude that changing is unchanging. That is all we know, is all we have ever known. Our conscious minds are torn between the two sides of the unknown, the infant and the wise. When we connect with one side, the other side is extended into a projection from dreams to wishes to plans. While following the other side, an immediately experienced story is revealed as an ageless and legendary mystery. The mind is, thus, a tangible entity within an infinitive reality. The consciousness in-between leaps to the heaven and falls to the earth; the unconsciousness languishes in the underworld, and the superconscious soars into the ethereal world. Fatherless spiritual light is too magnificent to hold, with cosmic wind spinning with countless corruptive seeds. Abysmal deep valley darkness is too frightened as it courses its deathless journey, an endless trickling stream flowing into the bottomless sea. Lost in a maze, the mind's eye searches alone. Still in an able body, but with sickened mind, hungry eyes and mournful voice, it retreats from the past only to return again to a meaningless life. We march forward on our hopeless journey to face the non-existing reality of death. What can the mind do, what is it capable of becoming?

This unchanging reality beyond the anticipation of mind is the nature of the Tao, the birth of universe, and the valley-spirit of Great Mother. Lao Tzu has characterized that valley-spirit is deathless; it is called the mystical female. The gateway of the mystical female is called the root of heaven and earth. Hovering, it seems ever-present. Put to use, it is never exhausted.

Visioning Immortality

The nature of unchanging before the Oneness with no birth/death is the longevity of Nature and the immortality of the Tao. To define this more clearly, longevity deals with form, both transforming and deforming. It exists between birth and death, growth and retirement, moving forward and turning back. Immortality reveals the presence of everlasting eternity. Lao Tzu realized that what makes heaven and earth eternal and long lasting is that they do not give birth to themselves. It is this that makes them eternal and long lasting. He further explains that reaching the ultimate emptiness, concentrating on the central stillness, all things work together. From this I observe returning. All things under heaven flourish in their vitality, yet each returns to its own root. This is stillness. Stillness means returning to its destiny. Returning to its destiny is steadfastness. To know steadfastness means enlightenment. Not to know steadfastness is to act forcefully. Acting forcefully brings disaster. Knowing the steadfast implies acceptance. Acceptance is impartial. Impartial is regal. Regal is heaven. Heaven is Tao. Tao is beyond danger even when the body perishes.

In this chapter, Lao Tzu is examining the Tao through mindful observation by returning to the total stillness of that rooted destiny. He finds that destiny moves along its steadfast course without being troubled by the mind; that is the realization of being enlightened. Knowing this is the mind's acceptance of being with the impartiality of the kingdom of heaven. This impartiality is being with the body of the Tao, a process of returning, a backward movement towards its procreated state, no-being and nothingness. Our mind never questions another sunrise after saying goodbye to the sunset, but it dreams of a wishful returning. Yet, the mind doesn't need to be regarded as being balanced as you would a checkbook, a time recorder. Body/mind's rhythm has the capacity to handle the necessary business of life just like the motion of the sun and the waning and waxing of the moon. Time takes care of itself. There is no need to remember everything and there is no need to hold onto everything. That is the child of the Tao: the renewal of change. The sun, moon and earth are more conscious of their actions and activities than anything we could ever impose upon them. This is the process of acceptance; this is the ability of staying with the steadfastness; this is the regal mind, the body of the Tao.

Moving along the Living Reality

Nature of Changing

All that we experience is change. From the conscious marriage between our parents to the formation of our independent individual life process; from the flash of an idea to its concentrated form of thought; from that internalized thought to the expressive activity; from a programmed activity to an extended wish beyond the final productivity; they are all the evolutionary process of involuntary changing. Nature never acts, since it is always the same; Nature never stops acting because it never remains the same within its changing form. Lao Tzu continues by saying that: Gusty winds do not last all morning, cloudbursts do not last all day. What makes this so? Heaven and earth will not last forever, how could a human being last!

On the surface and linguistic levels, the sentence "Heaven and earth will not last forever" appears contradictory with the sentence "Heaven is eternal, earth is long lasting." The love imbued in human nature is different than specific loves guided by emotional, mental and conscious desires. This illustrates the difference between the pure presence of spirit (shen) and its ever-flowing momentary conscious activity. It also clarifies the difference between faith and belief. That which is present is long lasting. That which is beyond mental calculation and ego anticipation is the all-pervading Love. That which is beyond rational evaluation and experiential judgment is the faith that goes beyond the depth of life testament. Faith is individual/universal while belief is personal/cultural. A scientist will follow the guideline of a scientific belief system. At a Jewish funeral ceremony, their customs and rituals are followed. Upon entering a Buddhist temple, you observe the rules being followed within the temple. But transpersonally and cross-culturally, the scientists, the Jewish people, and the Buddhists have the unspoken trust within, individually and universally. This trust within is called "faith," which is unconditional, collective and universal. A belief is a set of experiential habits, rationalized rules and mentally programmed systems within a cultural milieu, while faith is more subtle, deeper and much more pervasive and inclusive. It envelops the Love and the eternity of Nature.

Eternal faith never dies whereas experiential belief must die. Only after each timed and experienced belief dies and transforms can the mind return to its child-like state, awake from sleep, be humble and ready to face whatever may come. But one thing remains constant: all the living reality becomes a cosmic reality, but each must exist, die and move on. Glory or failure, gain or loss, are nothing but constant change. Take it easy, relax and let it go.

In the meantime, each movement is an enlightened journey. If the mind is not present and the body is not ready, repetition and continuation must take place until the mind is free, the body is ready to sleep. This is the glory of living reality and the grace of enlightening reality. Live fully, die completely. Then move on without looking back just as though nothing has happened. This is the true paradox of Lao Tzu's teaching. To practice this requires purity, innocence, and humility. This must be the right expression, right understanding and right attitude.

To Suffuse Oneself with Presence

How to suffuse one's mental content with presence is the major issue of cultivation, or the application of wu wei, inactive action, non-minded action. To know what is sufficient is to be rich. Or knowing what is sufficient averts disgrace. Knowing when to stop averts danger. This can lead to a longer life. To suffuse one's mental content with presence is to allow fully the presence of spirit engaging with the constant, moment by moment unification of both biophysiological action and psycho-spiritual behavior. A total mental awareness is needed with no inquiry into the meaning and result of each activity. No hypothesis is necessary prior to the activity, no desirable control is exerted toward the outcome of the activity. To love and to be loved is the effective practice of being fully present. When the reality of presence is absent or blocked an energy imbalance and deficiency is created. The mind manifests with wishes and longings for the loss of the connected loving presence. If the disconnection continues to exist, hope is lost, depression darkens the mind, suicidal desire or action is provoked as the richness of life dwindles away. It is like a beautiful flower withering away. This is what Lao Tzu called extreme fondness is necessarily very costly. Yet, the fondness is a feedback resulting from the energetic quality of either light or darkness. To be fond of the spiritual path will sacrifice the physical life but free the self, while to be fond of the dark force depletes all, pleases only the hellish world.

Instead of being fully engaged with the presence the mind begins to close off its environment as the ego advances. This is the nature of animated egoistic activity in its fear of losing the connection. The ego augments further pressure to the biophysiological action. Through this process, the psycho-spiritual enrichment of living, of "being with the presence," descends into ego obsessive control. The richness of life is replaced with the desire of becoming materially rich. Through obsession the ego attains satisfaction; through possession the mind avoids being lost in the reality of nature. The transcendent nature of reality becomes that of mental configuration, the knowledge the mind requires and the materials the mind possesses. Going with the flow is mystic and living with habitual configuration seems always lacking. The vision of heaven is distant, the mindset reality is too hellish. Living is meaningless; dying seems unsatisfactory. Lao Tzu has professed that the more you hang on to, the more you lose. This refers to actual objects to which the mind clings as well as the very act of clinging. Objects represent images and are the symbols of that clinging behavior. This is the drive that depletes the Chi or life force that channels the body/minded equilibrium.

Reversing the Process of Entropy

When people are born, they are soft and gentle. When they die, they are stiff and callous. When myriad things, grasses and trees, are born, they are soft and tender. When they die, they are withered. So stiffness and callousness are the company of death. Softness and suppleness are the company of life. No existing research in the field of gerontology can be found in the works of Lao Tzu, yet on the nature of gerontology, he achieved a complete understanding of the subject. Based upon the natural observation and epistemological investigation, he managed to survive the returning stage from growth back to childhood, going beyond the life process of birth and death. Because he could not find a place to die physically, he experienced that harmony is eternal.

Tao is the harmony of yin and yang. For human beings the earliest "being of harmony" between heaven and earth is the eternal nature of that pure self, the unifying of yin and yang. Through the evolution of human growth and development the yin Chi, fundamental in our Great Mother, and the yang Chi descending from the Ethereal Father (God's spirit) marry into the pure harmony. However, they lose the essential balance through their children: our original biological parents. Due to this we rarely get in touch with the true nature of eternal harmony. Rarely we experience the blissfulness of that harmonious beauty, with the possible exceptions of having biological sex, the embracing the two souls, or entering into the abysmal place where our Great Mother meets with the Ethereal Father.

By its very nature, human sexual activity always advances forward to the point of no return. When two people are attracted the activity may begin with an embrace. This harmony unifies the two lost souls into the beginning of a new product: three—the combined self—child. Two things then transpire. One is, as Lao Tzu has described when things reach their climax, they are suddenly old. This is "Non-Tao." "Non-Tao" dies young. As a result, the climax itself exhausts the life force and pushes physical life toward its "old" stage. The climax announces itself the prime of life growth and development. Through sexual practice, the life force is lost either into condoms or wombs—for people who do not practice Taoist sexual energy cultivation and conservation.

Fig. 8.2 Sexual energy is drawn up the spine to the crown, refined in the Microcosmic Orbit, blended with positive organs' Chi and stored in the Cauldron. Internal Achemy begins at the Cauldron.

Fig. 8.3 The Taoist Practices of Healing Love open the Way to experience the Greatest Freedom. Refined sexual energy is use for improved health and for spiritual alchemy in creating our spirit body.

The only gain is possibly the bodily experience stored within the memory, preparing to be replayed anytime the mind wishes to initiate a climax. Children are sometimes the byproducts of that experience.

In addition to that, love becomes a loss; sexual life is a loss; having children is a loss. Living through married life is not conducive to finding the lost part of the pure self: the harmonious Oneness. The initially loving relationship has been transformed from the romantic stage of searching for the other Chi, the other side of Oneness, the very lost part of Oneness. It is initiated into a commitment to maintain the relationship and accepting the responsibility of raising the children and keeping the self-promise alive. Only a few married couples are true soul mates. When it is obvious that the relationship cannot lead to eternal satisfaction, when it cannot be granted by social recognition, the marriage can be dissolved. Though the searching is continuous and endless searching, the lost self can never be retrieved. People then blame love as the scapegoat even as they continue the futile search. They blame their spouses and their children. The search for the lost part of Oneness is curdled into hatred, and the initial passion for reunion of the two takes a turn toward revenge. They are looking in the wrong place.

Reconnecting the Source of Longevity

The source for longevity is within the body, not as a physical womb but a spiritual one. Taoists call this spiritual womb. the "cauldron." The right method to "cook the cauldron" is not to search outwardly for love from others, but to search within the naked and abandoned self. It is the method of going back to the state in which we are all orphans, in the very depth of our body/minds. It is here our Great Mother became a widow after giving birth to both of us, male from our Ethereal Father and female from Herself. The spirit and breath belong to the Ethereal Father and the body and blood belong to our Great Mother. When we are able to preserve the beauty and attraction of our Great Mother, we preserve one-half of that Oneness by embracing the other half that is already within us. When we reach that place, we acknowledge the prime virtue of our Great Mother, recognize Her innate loneliness, respect Her single-minded devotion, and reconcile the numb feeling of Her blood-sucking action.

This is the real application of donning the spirit and soul, and drawing them into Oneness. The spirit is the very seed of that lost half, and the soul is the very essence of our biological self. Spirit is yang and soul is yin. When they are embraced, Oneness is preserved. We are the children of our great Mother and the Ethereal Father, and since we are the sons of God, His yang Chi is instilled within our body/mind. Knowing harmony is discernment. Enhancing life is equanimity. Generating vitality through mind is strength. Life is enhanced through universal vitality, the will of searching for the lost part of self is strengthened; and the act of discernment is eternalized. This is the most authentic harmony that one can achieve. This is the true meaning of returning, and the most practical application of unifying the two into Oneness. To act with determination is to have will. Not to lose one's substance is to endure. In the matter of cultivation and transformation there is neither gender nor biological difference. We are all the children of our parents; we are all the sons of God.

The two separated parts of the pure self, the co-existence of harmonious Oneness, are the widow and the orphan. The widow is the essence of earthly yin, and the orphan is the descended and transformed heavenly yang seed. This has been detailed in the fifteenth hexagram of I Ching, Modesty (Chian). In this hexagram the youngest son of the Creator, the representative of heaven on earth, retreats to the mountain. He drinks the heaven's tear—the rain and spring water in the mountain—the basic substances of life. It is here that the orphan—the son—meets his mother—the widow—who is the mountain spirit. This is why the hexagram is defined as the handle of the Kind Action, the reverer of light, and the ruling of manner.

Fig. 8.4 15th Hexagram (Modesty)

Lao Tzu's description of this hexagram is when you know the son, turn back to preserve the mother. Although the body dies, there is no harm. Closing your mouth and shutting the door, there would be no wearing down of life. Opening the mouth and pursuing affairs, life cannot be saved. Seeing what is small is discernment. Preserving subtleness is strength. Using the light enables one to return to discernment. Without losing the center of the body is called penetrating the eternal.

When the widow and the orphan are embraced, the son knows the relationship between male of spirit and female of flesh as the most intimate love relationship of brotherhood and sisterhood. Harmony is then acknowledged and united, unified and embraced, reserved and preserved. They can be as close as they wish, and they can be as distant as they need to be. They are the One, the Oneness, the complete harmonized pure self. The relationship within and in between is then expanded, no longer restrained by the role-playing. The relationship is extended, no longer the small world of caged frozen selves. The relationship is transformed; self and image are no longer separately defined. Children are the world of Love. All the people are brothers and sisters. Love is both the image of inner vision and the passion extending to the depth and the remoteness of the universe. Compassion is both the need of inhalation and the action of exhalation. Bliss is the penetration and blossom from within. Kindness is giving and receiving. Desire is no longer stressful, wisdom is no longer staged. The renewal and refreshment in relationships is harmoniously granted. The ego is lost into unconditional Love and conditional awareness. The mind is expanded into universal understanding. Action itself is the expression of life's journey.

Longevity to Immortality

長壽之門

Walking through the Death

We all die just as we are dying at this moment. Our parents' wish has died into our life and our wish will die, or has already died into endless future generations. This dying wish is the specific act of love. We are constructed with the form given us (physical, mental and spiritual) and the formless form we have within. Form is composed of everything about our individual being, from hair to nails. Formless form is the collective seed (sperm and egg) granted by our Great Mother. Form must die, but formless form never dies. It is the very nature of energy transformation. At a subliminal level, matter and energy are inseparable. They are two of the One and One of the two. It is form because of its innate completion and perfection; it is not form because of its changing and transforming quality. The fire never extinguishes itself, and each fire's glow must be extinguished. The water is never dried up, yet each water molecule evaporates. We are going to die, yet we will never die. Who dies? It is the dying transformation of body/minded form. The body must die and mind must die.

For those who are good at preserving their lives—Walking through, not avoiding rhinos and tigers, entering battle without wearing armaments—the rhino has no place to dig its horns. The tiger has no place to drag its claws. The soldier has no place to thrust his blade. Why is this so? Because they have no place to die. Living between birth and death is subject to the control of soul (mind) and flesh, between ten and three. Living beyond the cyclical formation of death is the integration of ten and three, making the completion complete and trinity return. The completion of the son of God and the maker of His trinity become one again, the true spirit.

Open to Longevity

There are two kinds of longevity: biophysiological and psycho-spiritual. The Confucian family spanned five hundred generations according to the existing genealogy, with members scattered all over the world. Psychospiritual longevity is the ideal formation of psycho-spiritual creations, inventions and discoveries. Human beings, individually and collectively, are possessed of longevity and immortality. Our form is always that of a human body and a mind with wishes and dreams. Our form is never the same one lifetime to the next. It changes and we are all different yet existing within the Sameness of that change. We die individually time after time according to the longevity of that Sameness. Anyone desiring to achieve longevity must live through their longevity. If someone is searching for immortality, they must live through the mortality of their longevity. No one but yourself can understand your willful determination; no other person could answer to your personal destination. Do not reply with yes or no to any circumstance, simply live through all that comes. "Yes" is the structure and body of the Tao while "no" is the meaning and functioning of the Tao. The structure and body of the Tao is the longevity of the Tao in our being, and the meaning and functioning of the Tao is the immortality of the Tao without our being.

Longevity lives formlessly within each form; immortality exists beyond any meaning generated by mind. When each form lives fully there is no form held back; there is only the formless transformation. The mind seeking its own meaning becomes meaningless itself. This is the living Tao with form through formless form. This is the functioning Tao with meaning above the meaningless. Is that Tao really formless or meaningless?!

Lasering into Immortality

To die consciously and willfully is to have lived through the conscious awareness of hun or to be discharged from the morbid obsession of po. Otherwise, the mental configuration of death and dying is like the blowing of wind, the changing of temperature, the movement of sunlight, or the flowing of consciousness. During the last exhalation, if hun's mortal conscious awareness stays with po, it will merge into the earthly energy pattern of a ghost. It will pass through the gateway of mouth, nose or even ears, regardless of its being good or evil. This energy pattern will never associate itself with the third eye or crown point. If it is good, it is a wandering ghost; if it is evil, it is a hungry ghost.

The mortal conscious awareness of hun discharges itself from po by returning to its original format of shen. By embracing the light, this individual spirit crystallizes itself into golden elixir or spiritual being, like an intensified and condensed beam of laser light. Among living individuals, the high spiritual masters, whether religious or shamanistic, have the capacity of a laser light. They emit the bursts of light energy as a form of selfless love, pure heart, total awareness and passionate action. The beam of crystallized or concentrated pure light within those masters is comparable to a beam of condensed or intensified pure light produced within a laser machine. Many people have no consciousness of death in our human history regardless of any specific religious belief. "God loves me" is not a hallucinatory mental formation or grandiose conscious wish. When love is purified selflessly and completely, it is the pure self and pure love of God-self within. The spiritual body is light and spiritual motion is love; its body is formless and its action is deathless.

This is what is meant by Lao Tzu's statement that: To die, but not be forgotten, is to be immortal. Death is nothing other than a morbid and consciously fixed memory; death itself is a pure form of fear, an inability to release that habitual obsession. The mind thinks, the ego controls, the final deed is done. To be immortal is not a form of desensitizing, but rather a pure sense beyond the physical and mental. It is a sense of both conclusion/inclusion and integration/embracement leaving nothing pushed aside or left behind. There is blissful satisfaction within and no fear of being alone. Wishes are no longer needed and dreams are infantile memories. There is no sense of who is dead and who is alive; no awareness of living and dying. Soaring from life is not a sadness—one has passed through the forgiveness of heart and the attachment of mind. Consciousness becomes a mirror and ego is nothing other than an old habit. This is lasering with pure light, being with pure light, returning to the complete self and God's Love. This is the application of being immortal and entering immortality. Lao Tzu calls this the Tao of having a deep root, a strong stem, a long life and an enduring vision. Root is the source and stem is the form; life is the act and vision is the light.

Your Choice Matters

Whether you want to stick with mortality or be with immortality is entirely your own choice. The Heavenly Father gives you the light, heart and consciousness. The Earthly Mother gives you your body, kidneys and instincts. You are embraced by light. Freedom of choice is given to your heart, the freedom of action granted to your mind, and the freedom to channel the energy is there for the taking. If you follow your mental attributes, you will chase after ideas, rise and fall with your emotions, protect your beliefs, and sleep fitfully with nightmares. Let the light shine through you to live with compassion, be uncontrolled by the primary matters of sexual conquest as well as the secondary matters related to ideal connections. If you can bear to dwell with your sleepless inner mate, remain untroubled by your mind's unbearable loneliness and desirous longing, then you can live with inner peace. You can know with pure awareness, enjoy working with the changing character of nature, and be happy with your sacred relationship. Lao Tzu emphasizes that: The person who works according to Tao unites with Tao. He adds simply: Only those who are not slaves to life are wise to the value of life.

Chapter IX
Faithfulness

Longevity is the foundation of Taoist tradition, while immortality serves as the utility. The foundation is a vessel in which to facilitate the harmonious existence of spirit in the body/mind. The utility is the process of inner connection, inner understanding and inner transformation being built upon the foundation. The process of building and maintaining the most useable foundation exists mutually with the process of cultivating and crystallizing the Tao of harmony (water and fire). Water stands for the earthly substance, and fire is the cosmic substance. They are beautifully expressed by the two hexagrams in I Ching, number 34 and number 63. In the 34th hexagram, the thunder shakes above the heavens, indicating penetrating power arising from its own creative wisdom. The name of this hexagram is Dazhuang (Ta Chuang) or Super Great, with "da" meaning "big" or "large," and zhuang expressing "great" or "magnificent." Linguistically, the character zhuang is composed with two strokes, the chopped bamboo branches "pan" and soldier "shi." Pan is used for measurement, and shi represents the strength. The character shi consists of ten and one, representing the completion of affairs. "Zhuang" indicates that a man should have attained by his thirtieth year an established goal, a constructed family, characterized strength and wisdom.

Fig. 9.1 34th Hexagram (Power of the Great)

This hexagram is the combination of holy father and holy son. Father represents the spiritual order, the creative discipline and the sacred mechanism. Son represents the power, youth, strength and passion. The introductory explanation is: "During the ancient time the ancestors slept in caves and lived in the wilderness. The sages later elevated these conditions to palaces and houses. They were constructed with a ridgepole above the ceiling, to allow the wind and rain to be blown from the eaves and not into the house. They called this Dazhuang."

The symbolic meaning is that the sage does not walk the way that is incongruent with established orders. The orders are the guiding principles necessary to accumulate Te. Houses and palaces represent the vessels for the existence of the physical body, family, and for the nation as well. Churches and temples are the vessels for the existence of ethereal body, soul and spirit alike. Law and justice, as represented in number 43, are the building blocks for a harmonious social life where each individual body can find its safety in society. Rules and disciplines, however, represent the vessels or cauldrons used to establish a foundation for the enrichment of the spiritual life. They are the safeguards for the inner conscious activities. Without the house, family has no place to stay; without temple, spirit has no room to dwell. Without laws, society is in chaos; without discipline, spiritual life is aimless.

Meanwhile, however, how to liberate oneself from all the establishments and habits is the true meaning of spiritual liberation. This is accomplished with both Liberation (Ge) of 49th hexagram and "self-purification," which is Splitting (Bo) of 23rd hexagram. Revolution allows new vitality to flourish in society. Through self-purification, life is transformed. Therefore, the need to overcome oneself becomes the greatest challenge. Laziness, indulgence, pride, fixation, lack of discipline and self-control, agitation, anxiety, fear and all the external projections are the trials encountered along the path. Any improper indication or implication can hinder the progress of the path. These roadblocks are spiritual mirrors. By constantly observing these signs, one begins to see oneself clearly. God becomes the focus of the eyes, leaving self behind. Each and every action leads inevitably to its final destination as the external speech becomes an inner discipline, and as the external action becomes an inner reflection. That is faith being practiced within and without.

Fig. 9.3 23rd Hexagram (Splitting)

Two substances, water and fire are required to build such faith. In this life, we are constructed with water and charged by fire. We all possess these two basic substances that, when managed harmoniously, allow one to live a happy family life and fully enjoy the spiritual life. The partner and the soul mate are there. Self and love are there. God and Goddess are there. This is perfectly illustrated by the hexagram number 63, Completed (Jiji) (Ji Chi). The first character "ji" stands for "finishing the meal." It can be interpreted from the characteristic construction as "wolfing down the rice with spoon." The left side of the stroke is constructed with "white" and "spoon," indicating "rice" or "millet." The right stroke means "wolf down." The second "ji" means "enhancement" or "succeed." It is composed with a water stroke on the left and "organized" or "orderly" stroke on the right side. It is initially a river name. Thus, the term of this hexagram can be interpreted as "wolfing down one's success" or "finishing the order."

Fig. 9.4 63rd Hexagram (Completed)

There is a striking difference between the common usage and inner alchemical practice in dealing with this hexagram. The common usage is to finish up oneself or exhaust oneself. The top line of the hexagram expresses "Head is in the water. Danger." Of course, a person with his head in the water is danger in drowning, but this could be applied to other dangerous situations as well. In inner alchemical practice, this hexagram is an ideal unification. Within the hexagram are two water trigrams and two fire trigrams (Each hexagram in I Ching can be further divided into four trigrams from the bottom line to the top line, representing the images of the four worlds within). The two combined sets of trigrams represent the Inner Love Dancing and the Cosmic Bath. With the Inner Love Dancing, masculinity and femininity are eternally unified, dancing together forever. In Cosmic Bath, the "orphan" and the "widow" are embracing. Holy seed and cosmos are united. As the double marriages are completed, spirit returns. Understanding is the key to achieving this state. Faith is the means. Understanding is a necessity for the speech, and faith is required for the inner trust. This will be revealed in this final chapter.

Initiative Engagement of Faithfulness: Speech

Nature of Speech

Originally the need and desire for communication began with the voicing of our inner vibrant state of energetic circulation, expressing our inborn and intuitive sense with a wordless uttering sound: Tao. It is a form of revealing the true state of connectedness between self and no-self. The self has no need to be revealed, disclosed and displayed whereas the no-self seeks desperately to be spoken, expressed, and understood. It is analogous to an eruption of earth's stomach—volcano—while her peacefully standing mountains are connected to her inner stillness. The true mind has no need to communicate, but the minding mind never ceases communicating; the true mind is the pure and crystal clear sky, the minding mind is the moving clouds and stormy weather. The true mind is the pure consciousness of mind where there is no need to be conscious of itself. The minding mind is the symbolic interpretation and linguistic understanding of that mind, it is unceasingly conscious of itself and never reaches the state of complete-pure-consciousness. Thus, the human's intrinsic urge to speak is "weathered" by the minding mind resembling the nature of speech, composed by the usefulness of speech, and emerging as the communicable human and communicative mind.

We began with the wordless sound Tao in the first chapter, and we must now speak conclusively about its characteristic manifestation called speech and the voice produced. Voicing is the body/mind's first natural, habitual and instinctive action. It is also the primary speech before creative or intellectual participation. This pure, honest, humble and innocent voice is the "sound of Tao," simply opening the mouth and voicing through. This initial voice develops into the "symbolic structure of Tao." It is a combined character with two sub-characters of head and foot. Head manifests the speech from conscious thinking to outward expression, which is characteristic of voice as well as handwriting. Feet walk and dance, walking for pursuing and dancing for healing. Voicing and dancing are harmoniously circulated through the body/mind as and over an active inaction, while walking and writing carry the body/mind into active engagement. It also signifies that the head initiates and directs the bodily action carried by the feet.

To ask the meaning of this voice is to ask the meanings of sounds of thunder, earthquakes, rain, bird-song, or any natural vibrations that come through natural phenomena. We hear them and know them. There is no need to understand or interpret. Understanding is engagement and interpreting is disengaging from that which has already been engaged. To interpret such is like weaving with bodily dizziness, acting with mental fuzziness, and smiling behind the intellectual cunning.

Our feet normally respond to whatever the mind orders; they are responsible for maintaining groundedness while providing security and transportation for mental actions and physical activities. One head and two feet are the trinity or triangular diamond of body/mind between heaven and earth. One head and two hands are the trinity or triangular diamond of body/mind that manipulates the mechanism of heaven and earth. The head's action is an actionless action that acts without engaging, moves without marching, talks without walking. It is the weightless clouds and colorless spirit that execute this actionless action. The action of feet is an active engagement; it engages without knowing, marches without direction and walks without stopping. It is the intellectual mind and biological body engaged in action. When paying a visit to a friend, it is the mind making the visit. The mind drives the body to its destination as the body transports the mind for the engagement. When performing the act of physical love it is not the body that creates the excitement but the mind pushing the body/mind into climax. When someone thinks to murder, the hands don't understand what the killing action means. This action is the configuration of mind.

When one head and two feet act harmoniously, the feet do not work independently. They are the One since they must work together, and neither completes an action by itself. The quality of this trinity or triangular diamond is that it leaves no space for projected or specified activities, such as mental creativity, conscious manipulation, personality configuration, and emotional expression. Nor does it separate the body from the mind by dividing the total harmonious energy circulation into small, stagnated or dynamic pieces. Yet, through our civilization process, especially industrial evolution, the coordination of harmonious action between head and feet is diminished by the mechanism of wheels. Wagons and cars replace what feet can do and reflect a mechanical manipulation of life and a mental control of life. Feet are used as pedals to control the wheels, and hands are extended into manipulation of machines and innumerable products in the world. It is not dangerous itself, but soon becomes self-destructive. There is no real danger other than the fear of physical death. Death is itself not dangerous, but acting dangerously is injurious to the body/mind. Better to say "mind," since the body doesn't understand the meaning of danger.

Character of Speech

In itself, speech is only a partial body/minded action and an expression of the active state of mind. It is both self-explanatory and a self-doubting, self-promising and self-disguised, a self-belief and a self-disbelief, and a self-trust and self-mistrust.

There are four characteristics in speech:

1. Lao Tzu states that: Those who know, do not say. Those who say, do not know. If someone truly and absolutely knows, what purpose does it serve to talk about it? Communication is, in a sense, an attempt to clarify mentally. Speech itself serves as a vehicle moving back and forth between knowing and not-knowing. The speech expresses what one already knows, explains what one wants to know, requests what one seeks from self and others, and defends the habitual position of merely knowing.
2. Speech is a self-promise, a way for encouraging oneself, being continuously engaged with oneself, and building total trust within the self. The twofold purpose of the speech is: 1) to establish a relationship and build a mutual trust; 2) to cling to fixated habits ensuring addictive connectiveness and grasping firmly the attachment to body/mind. The order of business in making a promise is to ensure engagement, to commit to the process, and to bind to the result of what has been planned. The virtue of promise must be realized as a promise to only oneself but has no bearing on the change and final outcome. The nature of this process is so replete with change and complexities that it can render the individual self powerless and helpless. To control the changes and foresee the outcome is inconceivable.

On the social scale the practice of promising is within the realm of possibility only in a situation where one has absolute control. Promise is a sacrifice, especially when one is unsure of oneself or when two parties are involved. Life is not a promise; there is no need to relegate its richness into a programmed self-promise. In its depth, promise deals with self-insecurity; it is a powerful form of ego protection and fear suppression. The more insecure one feels, the deeper the fear one encounters. When promise is made easily and frequently one continues to make more promises. The other element existing in the depth of promise lies within the need and demand. At this level, promise is a bargaining process regardless of its purpose, whether material gain, emotional satisfaction or spiritual connection. Much of the trust is done through hand-shaking, not word-processing. Addressing this, Lao Tzu explains natural speech consists of few words and speaking with good trust. The action of promise carries the meaning of Lao Tzu's characterization: Beautiful words can advertise well.

3. Speech is an expression of the belief system of the mind, individual and collective, personal and cultural. It is a premise or a statement to which the mind adheres. It is a technique of binding and rejecting. Individual identity, group dynamics and social construction are all based upon the effective and powerful use of speech. In this manner the individuality, singularity and personality suffuse in the content of social group and cultural environment.
4. Speech is a way of revealing inner trust clarifying and confirming the ability and capacity of trustworthy relationships between the inner self and self appraisal or between self and others. Based on this inner trust, phrases or sayings such as the Power or the Message or the Voice of God are universally accepted and understood. Before the power, the message and the voice of God, there is nothing to fear; not even death itself. This highlights the authentic meaning of speech, the trustworthiness, and the deepest inner trust within the Self.

Quality of Speech

Upon accepting the limits of speech, we must then appreciate the values of speech. It is the primary signature of human action as well as the exclusive conclusion of that action. From this we know that speech can save or destroy the lives of self and others. Being careless loses the foundation. Being restless loses mastery. Foundation is the existence of body; mastery is the tranquility of mind. A good speaker is without flaw. Firstly, one knows oneself very well; therefore, the source of his speech is authentic and original. Secondly, the intention is nothing other than innocent self-display. There can be no motivation within the speech other than that honest heartfelt vibration. Thirdly, the purpose of speech is clear and complete within the speech itself; there is no further need for clarification and supplementation. The sage wants to elevate the people, his speech is down to earth. Also one who is good at leading people acts humbly.

Any experienced individual understands the result of over indulgence and is aware of the consequence of excessively informing: being overly informed leads to exhaustion, better to be centered. Information is similar to energy molecules. Each time specific information is exchanged there is energy transmission, whether mental, emotional or mechanical. Also, to inform is to teach and to cultivate. There are countless elements that shape the meaning and quality of propagation of information, colored by the inner conflict of the informant. It is not an easy task to accurately pass information from one to another. It remains a challenging and meaningful process to be accessed between individuals and from one generation to the next.

If there is no gap in the space between speaker and listener, the information is tangible, sentient, attractive or trustworthy. There is no identity crisis between teaching and learning, and there is no blockage between supply and demand. They are the One. No one is unqualified, no one is egoistic, no individual is counted as better or worse. One supplies the demands of the other. There is no rigid identity between one called “teacher” or “master” and the other named “student” or “disciple.” The teacher is rewarded by teaching and the student is informed through learning since they arise from the same source with different names. The older generation passes down and is left with nothing; the recipients receive everything but have nothing. No specific generation is valued once it has outlived its usefulness. The basic knowledge has been passed on in a similar fashion by all races and has been basically the same in the activities of eating, sleeping, courtship and worship.

Another example worth considering is air-breathing. Air is like information, the energy and life force. We all breathe the same existing air everywhere on this planet. With breath, inhalation is the child, the student, the demander and the life itself. Exhalation is the parent, the master, the supplier and the death. We are made aware of the rhythm between breathing and thinking as similar during speaking. Individually, as we inhale we think, followed by a brief breaking point. We speak immediately with the exhalation after that breaking point. When speaking is done in a group environment, a pause is normally met with silence from the audience for a matter of seconds to minutes. During this brief period, the speaker not only inhales the air but the vibration from the audience as well. This is an inner communication in progress. At this level the message of speech is no longer one of language. It is pure energy vibration and circulation. When the audience is receptive, each pause is responded to with applause and verbal exclamations. One single speaker can inhale all the stimulus-response from the audience. That is the quality and power of speech!

Speechless Action 無言之行

When we solve the problem of the central network of the speech organ-brain—we can then return to the energy center of stomach. When we were living in our mother's womb, we were more than just an image in her head. When the sage produces a self-fertilized gamete, based upon the principle of universal construction and the story of human history, he reaches the state of immortality: devoid of the desire for sex, food, and sleep. The son (seed) he produces is within his body but without a body. It has no root but is deeply rooted. When the sage achieves this goal he is no longer an earthly creature; he is transposed into a different kind of species in the universe. He has reached the final stage of what Lao Tzu described as i*mmortality*.

During this stage, the sage inhales in the world and smiles like a child for the world. He realizes two things: one is the Tao of heaven is good at responding without speaking and appearing without being asked; the other one is wordless teaching and the riches of non-action are matched by very little in the world.

In reference to the child-like smile, it is the most authentic expression of love and being in love. This kind of smile is: vibrating but not tingling, bright but not dazzling, innocent without wrongdoing, humble without the need of acknowledging itself as knowing-how, vulnerable without the desire to be rescued. This smile indicates: happy but not overly excited, joyful with full self-control, recognizing with no preference, communicating without cunning, understanding without prejudice, and respecting each other without self appraisal. This smile has no pre-cognition, no defensive mechanism, no fearful protection and no intellectual wisdom. Yet, it is this smile that expresses pleasure for the food, communication, protection and growth. This smile is so powerful that a mother would die for it; it is so pure that any evil-minded adult must necessarily reflect upon the true nature of inner-child. Who could possibly turn away from that innocent and radiant smile? This is the quality of pure Love, the manifest of passionate loving, the expression of kindness, and the ultimate communication with no further need.

This child-like smile also conveys the meaning of a wordless teaching which addresses two functions: real teaching with no prerequisite nor limitation of language. The first one is love of light and for life. It is always there when you are unaware of it, but when you mindfully seek to investigate it in any manner, it is not there nor has it ever been. The second function is the indication and conclusion of the limitation of language. There is never enough of it; it can stimulate a state of completion. Anyone who is not obsessed with the “mental structures,” who cannot be totally gratified by the language imprinted in the mind, knows that it is simply a tool to communicate feelings and sensations between the body and mind, a vehicle to transport the flashes and patches of mentality.

Trustworthiness

Establishing a Trusting Environment

In Chinese language the character xing is both trust and faith, constructed with one stroke for "person" and the other stroke for "speak." Its literal meaning is "one who speaks" or "the person who speaks." From within, the person reveals their natural truthfulness without the mechanical nature of that mental confirmation. One speaks from body/minded heart. It is not a description of value and worthiness of self as an individual; it is a recognition of the state and stage presently existing. It is not a prescription of self-bounded purposeful action; it is an indication of existing in nowhere. It is not a wish of what the mind anticipates; it is a state of being lost in human vulnerability. It is not a call for help as the ego might wish; it is a presentation of man's ideal mental and communal existence.

To live in this way will generate a true fellowship of trust. Others listen not only to the vibration of voice but also the circulation of the heartbeat from either side. What others integrate is not merely the intellectual understanding of words, ideas or beliefs. There is an awareness of the openness of heart and the honesty of mind carrying both knowing and respect, both energetic communication and inner connection. The audience is the listener, part of the existing environment, fellow countrymen with the right to listen and the privilege of being a partner to a mutually shared value.

Mechanism of Trust

In addressing the mechanism of trust, Lao Tzu states that: Trustworthy words are not beautiful. Beautiful words are not trustworthy. True words seem paradoxical. This is because the knower does not know everything; the know-it-all knows nothing. And kindness is not over-indulgent; over-indulgence is not kind. The first statement refers to openness toward knowledge. The second accentuates the beauty of kindness. Knowledge is a virtue. There is no need to display it. If someone regards knowledge for what it is, as imperfect as the self, then that person has accepted and applied it. This is a true knower of not knowing any more than what was already known. The know-it-all, however, is one who hungers again and again with no memory of what has been eaten and digested throughout the present lifetime.

Kindness ceases to exist beyond what the kind can do; is never in denial about what the kind has already defined. Kindness is beauty that emanates with honest loving, benevolent caring, readily accepting and willingly given. It is there for inactive acting. There is a mutual preparedness, neutral respect and selfless responsibility to be applied to the harmony of action. In regard to inactive acting, each expects nothing in return, loses nothing, and gains nothing. There is no judgment call on its connection within or without. The Tao of heaven benefits and does not harm. The Tao of humankind exists and does not compete. While using it, as soon as he exists for others, he has more. As soon as he gives to others, he has more. This is all the revelation of universal kindness.

Way of Trustworthiness

On the surface most people do not appear to be trustworthy. Their trust is anxious and fearful, based on their desirable wish or eventful engagement. This is unlike the trust established between two people who are confident that they know each other very well. It is feasible that, even if their situation is soured, no damage is done to their relationship. However, to establish trust within and to build a trustworthy relationship are two separate entities. Although it takes time, effort and a suitable environment to build a trustworthy relationship, the demands and requirements for self-trust within are much greater. Normally, people are unwilling to investigate the nature of self-trust. It requires a thorough knowing of the self, complete immersing in the nature of this self, objectively applying it and happily suffusing with the outcome. Self-examination must be objective and selfless. To be trustworthy is to place trust in oneself as well as others without preference or prejudice, thereby performing fully with that trust. He is trustworthy to those who are trustworthy. He is also trustworthy to those who are not trustworthy. It is the trust of Action itself. It is not necessary to trust others before trusting oneself, nor is it necessary to act for others in order to be trusted. The nature of trustworthy action is to be possessed of it, act upon it, and be worthy of the trust of Action.

Faithfulness

God of Our Spirit

Faith is an act of total submission to and embracement of Oneness as it sways smoothly along the formation of presence, unbounded by the detransformation of yesterdays or tomorrows. Faith accepts that which is present and trusts whatever has been concealed; faith is happy with the conceivable and content with manageable; faith is fulfilled with whatever is achievable and well aware of the uncontrollable. Faith is essential but has no central kernel. Faith is omnipresent; sometimes observable but without a focal point. Faith is the gift clearing the path to what we can be, but not what we are incapable of being; it reveals what Love is, but not what is loveable; it expresses selfless devotion, but not self-sacrifice. Faith is the unfolding of all that we can release, but not at all what we receive.

Faith is visible when the heart is open, yet invisible as the tears of the mourner are to the mourned. It nestles secretly inside your pillow, but remains beyond the capacity of imagination. It is as silent as "waveless" breathing, as bright as "wireless" lightning. You may harbor without doubt, but never find the slightest trace of it. It lies within the devoted heart and smile of Love. Rational mind cannot grasp it; intuitive mind has no need for it; intelligence cannot breakthrough to an understanding of it; stupidity cannot comprehend. The Mother cannot live apart from it; the Child has no need to search for it. God instills its bravery; the self experiences the sublime blissfulness within. Space cannot hold it; time cannot trace it. Matter cannot form without it; energy cannot flow without it. Faith nourishes our spirit, enlivens it with worship, and ultimately dies away with it.

Virtue of Faithfulness

Faith generates trust, promotes the loving activity, assures kind action, ensures the meaning and quality of life, and elevates the life above and beyond its cyclical activation of birth and death. From the joint adventure on earth between the Progenitor's penetrating light and the Great Mother's whirling magnetism to the genetic engineering of in vitro fertilization between sperm and egg, faith gains nothing, loses nothing, deviates from nothing, integrates nothing. Search for faith within belief becomes disputable. In the attempt to create faith within the church, we are left with self-imposed isolation. In constructing faith with words, the linguistic interpretation becomes the main attraction. When we connect faith with action, the result is purposeful rejection. When we express faith with love, sexual and asexual attraction abounds. When we defend faith by raising the sword, revenge is forthcoming. Gambling our faith against life is rewarded with an exhausted corpse. Visualizing faith conjures up a stained symbol. Making sense of faith brings up a consciously activated hallucination. Projecting faith with rationality constructs a self-defined delusion.

It is this faceless faith that enables us to see our truth, to observe our action, to express our feeling, to share our love, to exchange our transcendental message, and to reveal our eternal nature. Faith can never be a beneficial commodity nor a valuable possession in the mind of our ego eyes. They see only to capitalize on it, to employ its service to their benefits.

We have become so fixated with our quest for material gain that we fear to face God. There has always been a space reserved in our mind for God yet life is over for us. We selfishly and mercilessly exploit our environment, consuming dead organs and inanimate matter. Life has become the driving force of a pursued direction, a magnified pleasure, a sensational feeling, an imagined goal, and an illusive mind. Our habits and beliefs are concluded from the beginning to the end from one experiential moment to the next transitional moment in the continuum of the interval between birth and death. We view life in our world as a shining star moving along in one direction. We treat the meaning of life as following a projected goal with the conclusive solution that death becomes the only answer.

We are dying, as we all must do. Why should we bother with a life already troubled with such a meaningless solution? How can it be so meaningless and void of matter as its empty form? We seize life greedily before casting it aside to visit its twin sibling: death. Death is equally as meaningful as life; it is life in and of itself.

Beyond the Transformation of Life

When we look beyond our sensational living presence, our minds will become subdued. Once we come to terms with the inevitability of death our minds will loosen its struggle. When we find out that belief is as powerful and useless as dismisbelief, our minds will stop clinging to long-held, firmly entrenched beliefs. In rejecting past misconceptions our minds can become childlike once again. It is the beginning of understanding that we cannot explain, nor is there any need to explain. When the minding mind is set aside, that very mind magically becomes faithful. Then God is faithful, the world is faithful, as we are faithful.

The heart is always faithful because it connects with light, embraces both birth and death, and is faithful in itself. When faith is weak, there is distrust. Especially in the worth of speech. Results speak for themselves. Lao Tzu is very practical in his use of few words in his teaching. He declares that: My words are easy to understand and easy to apply. Yet no one in the world can understand them and no one can apply them. He may seem too demanding and concerned, yet with faithfulness he realizes that: Words have their origin, and events have their leader. Only because of prevailing ignorance I am not understood. The few who understand me, the more precious I am. So the sage wears shabby cloth, but holds a treasure within. The treasure within is the inner child, the pure self, the God-like self. Before the light of Love, what is the use of adornment? Before the truth of nakedness, what is the use of dirt and dust? Before the ever-present self, how can ragged clothing compete with its own shabbiness? Before the destruction and decomposition of the physical changing process, where can we hide?

All active expression is borne from the corresponding energy consumption of life force within self. If you don't know how to preserve yourself, you will succumb to exhaustion. Find something essential to do before your life is over. Recognize and hold close to the treasure within. Use acts of kindness to promote yourself. The Tao of heaven is impersonal. It enhances those who are kind.

Those who are kind are the people who possess the Love within and preserve the Love without. When Love is embraced with selfness, it becomes the pure Self. Tao is alive within. When the Tao is preserved, and nothing else whatsoever, it is the power of Self. This is God's power within. Without it, life is gratified and exhausted, or depressed and hungry. We gratify the ego's animated pleasure only to exhaust our own life force. We are depressed because we cannot find love—true love—either from the beauty of physical attraction or from the flowing of mental examination. We are destined to remain hungry, seeking, as we do, attractive stimulus or sexual climax. This is the Tao of Love within and without.

Those who are kind are those who have kind action and act kindly. When there is Love within, there is enough kindness, compassion, and generosity. Hunger is filled with the light of Love; thirst is replaced by the harmony of Tao—the sweet dew between heaven and earth; ego is transformed into the stillness of heart, the wisdom of mind, and the tranquility of spirit. Since the harmony of Tao is beyond creation and destruction, so the sweet dew is beyond life and death. It is the tears of heaven and earth, the self of male and female, the Love of Tao and the Action of kindness.

Those who are kind are those who have faith within, without, and in between. The faith within is the power of Tao; the faith in between is the harmony between ourselves and our company (love or lover); the faith without is neither calculation and expectation nor worship and sacrifice. Calculation is the mechanism of ego; expectation is the wish of ego; worship is the disguised attraction of ego; and sacrifice is the threatened honor of ego. Love needs no calculation; Action needs no expectation; harmony needs no worship, and faith needs no sacrifice. Tao pervades, Te encompasses all, harmony is energized, and faith is suffused. This is the realization of Tao, the application of Action, the meditation of harmony, and the cultivation of faith.

Through our long journey of coming and going between the wordless uttering sound Tao, the mind becomes motionless, the mouth speechless, the breath voiceless, life deathless. Silence sets in the body, stillness comforts the mind, and mystery captures the spirit. Again, useless, meaningless, waveless, ... before the voiced Tao of not Tao, along the actionless kind action, during heart expanding meditation, and after ceaseless, meaningless cultivation, all are encompassed by the faithful elevation.

Fig. 9.5 Inner Alchemy of the Tao

Appendix I
Lao Tzu's Tao Te Ching

Translated by Edward Brennan and Tao Huang

Chapter 1

1. The Tao that is voiced is no longer that of eternal Tao.
   The name that has been written is no longer that of eternal name.
2. The nameless is the beginning of the cosmic universe.
   The named is the mother of the myriad creatures.
3. Being at peace, one can see into the subtle.
   Engaging with passion, one can see into the manifest.
4. They both arise from a common source but have different names.
   Both are called the mystery within the mystery.
   They are the door to all wonders.

Chapter 2

1. In the world,
   Everyone recognizes beauty as beauty,
   Since the ugly is also there.
   Everyone recognizes goodness as goodness,
   Since evil is also there.
2. Since
   Being and non-being give birth to each other,
   Difficulty and ease complete each other,
   Long and short measure each other,
   High and low overflow into each other,
   Voice and sound harmonize with each other,
   And before and after follow each other.
3. Therefore the sage
   Lives in actionless engagement,
   And preaches wordless doctrine.
4. The myriad creatures
   Act without beginning,
   Nourish without possessing,
   Accomplish without claiming credit.
5. It is accomplishment without claiming credit that makes the outcome self-sustaining.

Chapter 3

1. Do not exalt intelligence and people will not compete;
   Do not value rare goods and people will not steal;
   Do not display for public view and people will not desire.
2. So the sage's governing methods are:
   Emptying the mind,
   Vitalizing the stomach,
   Softening the will,
   Strengthening the character.
3. This always makes people not know and not desire.
   This always makes the knower dare not act.
   Therefore, nothing is beyond ruling.

Chapter 4

1. Tao functions in itself empty harmony.
   When used, it remains full.
2. For sure, this source is the very ancestor of the myriad things.
3. Blunting the sharp edges,
   Unravelling the tangles,
   Husbanding into the light,
   Being as ordinary as the dust.
4. Ah! Limpid, it seems to exist forever.
5. I do not know whose son it is,
   This whom is exceeding the Heavenly Emperor.

Chapter 5

1. Nature has no benevolence,
   It treats all things like strawdogs;
   The sage has no benevolence,
   He treats his people like strawdogs.
2. Between heaven and earth it seems like a bellow:
   Empty, yet inexhaustible,
   The stronger it is activated, the greater the output.
3. Being overly informed leads to exhaustion,
   Better to be centered.

Chapter 6

1. Valley-spirit is deathless, It is called the mystical female.
2. The gateway of the mystical female,
   Is called the root of heaven and earth.

3. Hovering, it seems everpresent. Put to use, it is never exhausted.

Chapter 7

1. Heaven is eternal, and earth is long-lasting.
2. What makes heaven and earth eternal and long-lasting is that they do not give birth to themselves.
   It is this that makes them eternal and long-lasting.
3. Hence the sage,
   Relaxing the body, the body comes to the fore.
   Beyond the body, the body comes to the fore.
   Beyond the body, the body exists of itself.
4. Not even relying on selflessness
   Enables the self to be fulfilled.

Chapter 8

1. Eminent goodness is like water.
2. Water is good at benefitting all things,
   Yet it actively competes.
   It retires to undesirable places.
   Thus it is near to Tao.
3. Dwelling in good places,
   Drawing from good sources,
   Supplying from good nature,
   Speaking with good trust,
   Governing with good rules,
   Conducting with good ability,
   And acting within good time.
4. For this reason,
   There is no competition,
   There is no concern.

Chapter 9

1. Hanging on to it will cause overflow; better to let go.
   Forced consent does not endure.
   Filling the house with gold and jade will not bring safety.
   Riches and royalty result in pride; they bring about their own punishment.
2. When the work is done, the body withdraws.
   This is the Tao of heaven.

Chapter 10

1. Donning the spirit and soul, and drawing them into Oneness,
   Can this come apart?
   Gathering in Qi and making the body supple,
   Is this not an infant?
   Being clear-headed and eliminating any mystic vision,
   Can even a speck exist?
   Loving the people and governing the country,
   Is this not inactive?
   Opening and closing the Gate of Heaven,
   Is this not the female?
   Comprehending the four corners of the world,
   Is this not knowledge?
2. Begetting and nourishing;
   Begetting but not possessing,
   Enhancing but not dominating.
3. This is Mysterious Action.

Chapter 11

1. Thirty spokes join at one hub,
   Yet it is the emptiness inside the hub that makes the vehicle useful;
   Clay is molded into a vessel,
   Yet it is the hollowness that makes the vessel useful;
   Windows and doors are cut out,
   Yet it is their empty space that makes the room usable.
2. So, any having makes for excess,
   Any not-having makes for usefulness.

Chapter 12

1. Five colors blind the eyes.
   Racing and hunting madden the heart.
   Pursuing what is rare makes action deceitful.
   Five flavors dull the palate.
   Five tones deafen the ears.
2. So, the sage's method is for the belly, not for the eyes.
   He abandons the latter and chooses the former.

Chapter 13

1. Favor and disgrace surprise the most.
   Value the trouble as you do the body.

2. Why do “favor and disgrace surprise the most”?
   Favor enhances only the inferior,
   Receiving it is a surprise,
   And losing it is also a surprise.
   This is why “favor and disgrace surprise the most”.
3 Why to “value the trouble as you do the body”?
   It is only because I have a body that I have trouble.
   If I did not have a body, where would the trouble be?
4. So, if you value the world as you do the body,
   You can be entrusted with the world;
   If you love the body as you love the beauty of the world,
   You can be responsible for the world.

Chapter 14

1. Look for it and not to be seen, it is called invisible;
   Listen to it and not to be heard, it is called inaudible;
   Reach for it and not to be touched, it is called intangible.
2. These three are beyond reckoning, so
   When these three merge, they are One.
3. As for this One,
   There is nothing above it remaining to be accounted for,
   There is nothing below it that has been excluded.
   Ever searching for it, it is beyond naming.
4. It returns to no-thing.
   Its state is described as no state,
   Its form is described as formless.
   It is called the vision beyond focus.
5. Follow after it, and it proves endless.
   Go before it, and no beginning can be found.
6. Employ the Tao of today in order to manage today’s affairs and to know the ancient past.
7. This is called the principle of Tao.

Chapter 15

1. The ancient sages of Tao are subtle and mysteriously penetrating.
   Their depth is beyond the power of will.
2. Because it is beyond the power of will,
   The most we can do is describe it:

3. Thus, Full of care, as one crossing the wintry stream,
   Attentive, as one cautious of the total environment,

Reserved, as one who is a guest,
Spread open, as when confronting a marsh,
Simple, like uncarved wood, Opaque, like mud,
Magnificent, like a valley.

4. From within the murky comes the stillness.
   The feminine enlivens with her milk.

5 Keeping such a Tao, excess is undesirable.
   Desiring no excess, work is completed without exhaustion.

Chapter 16

1. Reaching the ultimate emptiness,
   Concentrating on the central stillness,
   All things work together.
2. From this I observe their returning.
3. All things under heaven flourish in their vitality,
   Yet each returns to its own root.
   This is stillness.
   Stillness means returning to its destiny.
   Returning to its destiny is steadfastness.
   To know steadfastness means enlightenment.
   Not to know steadfastness is to act forcefully.
   Acting forcefully brings disaster.
   Knowing the steadfast implies acceptance.
   Acceptance is impartial.
   Impartial is regal. Regal is heaven. Heaven is Tao.
   Tao is beyond danger even when the body perishes.

Chapter 17

1. The eminent has consciousness of self.
   The next down are loved and praised.
   The next down are feared,
   At the bottom is the source.
2. When faith is weak, there is distrust.
   Especially in the worth of speech.
3. Results speak for themselves.
   This, people call me Nature.

Chapter 18

1. When the Great Tao is abandoned,
   There is benevolence and righteousness.
   When intelligence arises,

There is a great deal of manipulation.
When there is disharmony in the family,
There comes about filial piety.
When the country is in big trouble,
There arises patriotism.

Chapter 19

1. Get rid of wisdom, abandon intelligence, and People will benefit a hundredfold.
   Get rid of benevolence, abandon justice, and
   People will return to filial piety and kindness.
   Get rid of skill, abandon profit, and Thieves will disappear.
2. These three are inadequate.
   So just let things be.
3. Observe the plain and embrace the simple.
   Do not think much and do not desire much,
   Get rid of learning and worry will disappear.

Chapter 20

1. How much difference is there between yea and nay?
   How much difference is there between beautiful and ugly?
2. What one fears is what he cannot help but fear.
3. One is in the wilderness without central ground.
4. Ordinary people are fulfilled,
   Eating delicious food,
   Reaching the climax of romance.
   I am desireless and without anticipation,
   Like a baby who does not yet.
   Gathering energy together, entering the abyss beyond the point of no return.
5. Ordinary people have more than enough,
   I am a fool at heart, as a water droplet is to the spring.
6. People of affairs are bright and intelligent.
   I alone am unintelligent.
   People of affairs are cunning and clever.
   I alone am dull and unsophisticated,
   Unnoticed in the depth of the sea,
   Looked for in an endless horizon.
7. Ordinary people are productive,
   I alone maintain the living essence within.

I alone stay with a unitary source, as if stubborn.
8. I want to be wholly different from everyone else,
By taking my sustenance from the mother source.

Chapter 21

1. The marks of profound action follow only from the Tao.
2. The substance of Tao is boundless and unfathomable.
Unfathomable and boundless,
In its center there is form;
Boundless and unfathomable,
In its center there is an object;
Embryonic and dark,
In its center there is essence;
The essence is very pure,
In its center there is trust.
From now to the days of old,
Its name never dies,
Because it creates all things in their beginning.
3. How do I know the source of all beginnings?
From this.

Chapter 22

1. Those who boast of themselves lose their stance.
He who displays himself is not seen.
He who justifies himself is not understood.
He who lashes out does not succeed.
He who builds himself up does not endure.
2. In the sense of Tao,
This is said to be eating too much and acting too much.
It results in disgust.
3. Those who desire will not endure.

Chapter 23

1. Yield, and retain integrity.
In the depths of whirling, there is stillness.
The hollow enables the plentiful.
The old gives way to the new.
The small allows for increase.
Excess breeds confusion.
2. Therefore the sage holds oneness as the shepherd of the world.

3. He who does not display himself is seen.
   He who does not justify himself is understood.
   He who does not lash out succeeds.
   He who does not build himself up endures.
4. Therefore,
   Only the spirit of noncompetition makes things non- competitive.
5. So the old saying, “yield, and retain integrity,” is but a few words.
   But when rightly understood, integrity returns.

Chapter 24

1. Natural speech consists of few words.
2. Gusty winds do not last all morning,
   Cloudbursts do not last all day.
   What makes this so?
3. Heaven and earth will not last forever,
   How could a human being last!
4. So the person who works according to Tao unites with Tao.
   In the same way he unites with action.
   In the same way he unites with loss.
5. Uniting with action, the Tao becomes action.
   Uniting with loss, the Tao becomes loss.

Chapter 25

1. Matter is formed from chaos.
   It was born before heaven and earth.
   Silent and void.
   Standing alone, without territory,
   Able to be mother to the world.
2. I do not yet know its name,
   I call it Tao.
   With reluctance I deem it to be Great.
   Great refers to the symbol.
   The symbol refers to what is remote.
   What is remote refers to returning.
3. Tao is great.
   Heaven is great.
   Earth is great.
   Kingship is great.
   These are the four great things in the world,
   Kingship is one of them.
4. Humankind takes its origin from earth.

Earth takes her origin from heaven.
Heaven takes its origin from Tao.
Tao takes its origin from Nature.

Chapter 26

1. The heavy is the root of the light.
   Tranquility is the master of the restless.
2. Thus, the noble person will travel all day without leaving his seat.
   Though the center of the highest authority,
   And surrounded by luxury,
   He remains clearminded.
3. How could the king of myriad chariots treat his body with less care than he gives the country?
4. Being careless loses the foundation.
   Being restless loses mastery.

Chapter 27

1. A good traveller leaves no tracks.
   A good speaker is without flaw.
   A good planner does not calculate.
   A good doorkeeper does not lock, yet it cannot be opened.
   A good knotter does not use binding, yet it cannot be undone.
2. Therefore, the sage is good at his earnest demands upon people.
   So no one is left out.
   No talent is wasted.
   This is called being in the tow of enlightenment,
   And it ensures the good person.
3. For everything that is good is the teacher of the good person.
   Everything that is bad becomes a resource for the good person.
   No need to honor the teachers.
   No need to love the resources.
4. Though knowing this is a great paradox,
   It is the subtle principle,

Chapter 28

1. Understanding the male and holding onto the female Enables the flow of the world.
   This being the flow of the world, the eternal action abides.
   Knowing that the eternal action abides is to return to childhood.
2. Understanding the pure and holding on to the impure

Enables the cleansing of the world.
With the cleansing of the world, ongoing action suffices.
When ongoing action suffices, it returns to simplicity.

3. Understanding the white and holding on to the black Enables the formation of the world.
   Being the formation of the world, ongoing action does not stray.
   When ongoing action does not stray, it returns to the infinite.
4. This simplicity takes shape as a mechanism.
   The sage makes it the head ruler.
   Great ruling never divides.

Chapter 29

1. I see that those who want to take over the world and manipulate it do not succeed.
2. The sacred mechanism of the world cannot be manipulated.
   Those who manipulate it will fail,
   Those who hold on to it will lose it.
3. Matter
   Either leads or follows,
   Either heats or chills,
   Either strengthens or weakens,
   Either enhances or destroys.
4. So the sage abandons extremes, extravagance, multiplicity.

Chapter 30

1. Using the Tao as the rule for governing the people,
   Do not employ the army as the power of the world.
   For this is likely to backfire.
2. Where the army has marched, thorns and briars grow.
3. Being good has its own consequence,
   Which cannot be seized by power.
4. Achieving without arrogance,
   Achieving without bragging,
   Achieving without damage,
   Achieving without taking ownership.
   This is called achieving without force.
5. Matter becomes strong, then old.
   This is called “Not-Tao”.
   Dying young is “Not-Tao”.

Chapter 31

1. The army is the mechanism of bad luck.
   The elements of the world may oppose.
   So those who have ambitions cannot rest.
2. Therefore the nobleman takes his place on the left side,
   And the commander on the right side.
3. So the army is not the nobleman's weapon.
   As a mechanism of bad luck,
   He uses it only as the last resort.
   Then the best way is to use it quickly and destructively.
   Do not enjoy this.
   To take delight in it is to enjoy killing people.
   Those who enjoy killing people do not attract the favor of the world.
4. The good inclines to the left,
   The bad inclines to the right.
5. Thus the intelligent officer stays on the left,
   The army commander stays on the right.
6. Speaking in an image of sadness,
   After killing the people, every one stands in mourning.
   Victory is celebrated as a funeral service.

Chapter 32

1. Tao is eternally nameless.
2. Though simplicity is small,
   The world cannot treat it as subservient.
   If lords and rulers can hold on to it,
   Everything becomes self-sufficient.
3. Heaven and earth combine and allow sweet dew.
   Without rules, people will naturally become equal.
4. At the outset, the rule must be expressed.
   Once it exists, stop speaking of it.
   The result of not speaking of it is to eliminate danger.
5. In a manner of speaking, Tao is to the world
   As the rivers are to oceans and seas.

Chapter 33

1. To know others is to be knowledgeable,
   To know oneself is enlightenment;
   To master others is to have strength,

To master oneself is to be powerful.
2. To know what is sufficient is to be rich.
To act with determination is to have will.
Not to lose one's substance is to endure.
To die, but not be forgotten, is to be immortal.

Chapter 34

1. As the Tao is all-pervading,
It operates on both the left and the right.
2. Success is consequent to all affairs.
It does not proclaim its own existence.
All things return.
Yet there is no claim of ownership,
So it is forever desireles.
This can be called small.
All things return.
Yet there is no claim of ownership,
This can be called great.
3. The sage accomplishes greatness in not acting great.
Thus can he accomplish what is great.

Chapter 35

1. Holding on to the great Symbol,
The whole world carries on.
On and on without doing harm.
2. Being happy at peace,
Enjoying greatly the music and food.
Travellers stop by.
3. When the Tao is spoken forth plainly
It has no flavor at all.
4. Look, but that is not sufficient for seeing.
Listen, but that is not sufficient for hearing.
Use it, but it is not exhausted.

Chapter 36

1. When you want to constrict something,
You must first let it expand;
When you want to weaken something,
You must first enable it;
When you want to eliminate something,

You must first allow it;
When you want to conquer something,
You must first let it be.
This is called the Fine Light.

2. The weak overcomes the strong.
Fish cannot live away from the source.
The sharp weapon of the nation should never be displayed.

Chapter 37

1. Tao is eternally nameless.
If lords and rulers would abide by it,
All things would evolve of themselves.
2. What evolves desires to act.
I, then, suffuse this with nameless simplicity.
Suffusing with nameless simplicity is eliminating humiliation.
Without humiliation, peace arises.
Heaven and earth regulate themselves.

Chapter 38

1. Eminent action is inaction,
For that action it is active.
Inferior action never stops acting,
For that reason it is inactive.
2. Eminent action is disengaged,
Yet nothing is left unfulfilled;
Eminent humanness engages,
Yet nothing is left unfulfilled;
When eminent righteousness engages,
It reduces the results of engagements;
Eminent justice engages, but does not respond adequately to situations.
For that reason it is frustrated.
3. When Tao is lost,
It becomes Action;
When Action is lost,
It becomes benevolence;
When benevolence is lost,
It becomes justice.
When justice is lost,
It becomes propriety.
4. Propriety is the veneer of faith and loyalty,

And the forefront of troubles.
5. Foresight is the vain display of Tao,
And the forefront of foolishness.
6. Therefore, the man of substance
Dwells in wholeness rather than veneer,
Dwells in the essence rather than the vain display.
7. He rejects the latter, and accepts the former.

Chapter 39

1. Those from the past have attained Oneness.
2. By attaining Oneness, heaven is clear.
By attaining Oneness, earth is at peace.
By attaining Oneness, the spirit is quickened.
By attaining Oneness, the valley is filled.
By attaining Oneness, the king puts order in the whole world.
All these result from Oneness.
3. Without its clarity, heaven is liable to explode.
Without its peace, earth is liable to erupt.
Without its quickening, the spirit is liable to die out.
Without its fullness, valleys are liable to dry out.
Without proper esteem, the king is liable to fall.
4. Esteem is rooted in the humble.
The high is founded upon the low.
5. This is why the lords and rulers call themselves widows and orphans without support.
Is this is not the root of being humble?
6. Much praise amounts to no praise.
7. Without preference, Being is as resonant as Jade and as gravelly as stone.

Chapter 40

1. When eminent persons hear of Tao,
They practice it faithfully;
When average persons hear of Tao,
It seems that they practice it, and it seems they do not;
When inferior persons hear of Tao,
They ridicule it.
2. Without such ridicule, it would not be Tao.
3. Thus, the aphorism that suggests the way is:
Knowing the Tao seems costly.
Entering Tao seems like retreating.

Becoming equal with Tao gives birth to paradoxes.
Eminent action is like a valley.
Complete understanding resembles being disgraced.
Vast action seems yielding.
Action that builds up seems remiss.
Pure integrity seems perverse.
The great square has no angles.
The great talent matures late.
The great voice sounds faint.
The great image has no form.
The Tao is praised but is unnameable.

4. Only Tao is good at beginning and good at completion.

Chapter 41

1. Tao moves by returning.
   Tao functions by weakness.
2. All things under heaven are born of being.
   Being is born of non-being.

Chapter 42

1. Tao gives rise to one.
   One gives rise to two.
   Two gives rise to three.
   Three gives rise to all things.
2. All things carry yin and embrace yang.
   Drawing chi together into harmony.
3. What the world hates is the widow and orphan without support.
   But lords and rulers name themselves these.
4. Do not seek gain from losing, nor loss from gaining.
5. What people teach, after discussion becomes doctrine.
6. Those who excel in strength do not prevail over death.
   I would use this as the father of teaching.

Chapter 43

1. What is softest in the world penetrates what is hardest in the world.
   Non-being enters where there is no room.
2. From this I know the riches of non-action.
3. Wordless teaching and the riches of non-action is matched by very little in the world.

Chapter 44

1. Which is more cherished, the name or the body?
   Which is worth more, the body or possessions?
   Which is more beneficial, to gain or to lose?
2. Extreme fondness is necessarily very costly.
   The more you cling to, the more you lose.
3. So knowing what is sufficient averts disgrace.
   Knowing when to stop averts danger.
   This can lead to a longer life.

Chapter 45

1. Grand perfection seems lacking, yet its use is never exhausted.
   Grand fullness seems empty, yet its use never comes to an end.
   Grand straightforwardness seems bent.
   Grand skill seems clumsy.
   Grand surplus seems deficient.
2. Activity overcomes cold.
   Stillness overcomes heat.
   Peace and tranquility can be the measure of the world.

Chapter 46

1. When there is Tao in the world, work horses are used to fertilize the land.
   Without Tao in the world, the war horse flourishes in the countryside.
2. There is no crime greater than fostering desire.
   There is no disaster greater than not knowing when there is enough.
   There is no fault greater than wanting to possess.
3. Knowing that sufficiency is enough always suffices.

Chapter 47

1. In order to know the world, do not step outside the door.
   In order to know the Tao of heaven, do not peer through the window.
2. The further out you go, the less you know.
3. So the sage knows without moving, identifies without seeing, accomplishes without acting.

Chapter 48

1. Having a zest for learning yields an increase day by day.
   Hearing the Tao brings a loss day by day.
   Losing more and more until inaction results.
   Inaction results, yet everything is done.
2. Managing the world always involves non-engagement.
   As soon as there is engagement, there is never enough of it to manage the world.

Chapter 49

1. The sage is always without his own mind.
   He uses people's minds as his mind.
2. He is kind to those who are kind.
   He is also kind to those who are not kind.
   It is the kindness of Action itself.
   He is trustworthy to those who are trustworthy.
   He is also trustworthy to those who are not trustworthy.
   It is the trust of Action itself.

3. In the world, the sage inhales.
   For the world, the sage keeps the mind simple.
4. All people are fixated on the ears and eyes.
   While the sage always smiles like a child.

Chapter 50

1. We live, we die.
2. The companions of life are three and ten.
   The companions of death are three and ten.
   That people live their active life necessarily leading to the ground of death is three and ten.
3. Why so? it is the nature of life itself.
4. As a matter of fact, I hear of those who are good at preserving their lives;
   Walking through, not avoiding rhinos and tigers.
   Entering battle without wearing armaments.
   The rhino has no place to dig its horns.
   The tiger has no place to drag its claws.
   The soldier has no place to thrust his blade.
5. Why is this so?
   Because they have no place to die.

Chapter 51

1. Tao enlivens.
   Action nourishes.
   Matter forms.
   Mechanism completes.
   For that reason, all things worship Tao and exalt Action.
2. The worship of Tao and exaltation of Action are not conferred, but always arise naturally.
3. Tao enlivens and nourishes, develops and cultivates, integrates and completes, raises and sustains.
4. It enlivens without possessing.
   It acts without relying.
   It develops without controlling.
5. Such is called mystic Action.

Chapter 52

1. The world begins with the mother as its source.
2. When you have the mother, you know the son.

When you know the son, return to preserve the mother.
Although the body dies, there is no harm.

3. By closing your mouth and shutting the door, there would be no wearing down of life.
   When opening the mouth and pursuing your affairs, life cannot be preserved.
4. Seeing what is small is discernment.
   Preserving subtleness is strength.
   Using the light enables one to return to discernment.
5. Without losing the center of the body is called penetrating the eternal.

Chapter 53

1. Through discrimination, I have the knowledge to walk in the great Tao.
   The only fear is what is other than that.
2. The great Tao is quite smooth, yet people prefer a short-cut.
   The court is so busy legislating that the fields go uncultivated and granaries are all empty.
   They wear the magnificent clothing, girdle the sharp swords.
   They are gorged with food and possess many brides.
   Their bounty suffices but they continue to steal.
3. This is opposite of Tao.

Chapter 54

1. What is well-built is not pulled down.
   What is well-fastened is not separated.
   Sons and grandsons worship unceasingly.
2. Cultivate the self, and the Action is pure.
   Cultivate the family, the Action is plentiful.
   Cultivate the community, the Action endures.
   Cultivate the nation, the Action is fruitful.
   Cultivate the world, the Action is all-pervading.
3. Treat the self by the standard of self.
   Treat the family by the standard of family.
   Treat the community by the standard of community.
   Treat the nation by the standard of nation.
   Treat the world by the standard of world.
4. How do I know how the world is such?
   Thus.

Chapter 55

1. Action in its profundity is like a newborn baby.
   Poisonous insects and venomous snakes do not sting it.
   Predatory birds and ferocious animals do not seize it.
2. Its bones are soft and its sinews supple, yet its grasp is firm;
   Without knowing the union of male and female, its organs become aroused.
   Its vital essence comes to the point;
   Crying all day, its voice never becomes hoarse.
   Its harmony comes to the point.
3. Harmony is eternal.
   Knowing harmony is discernment.
   Enhancing life is equanimity.
   Generating vitality through mind is strength.
3. When things reach their climax, they are suddenly old.
4. This is “Non-Tao”.
   “Non-Tao” dies young.

Chapter 56

1. Those who know, do not say.
   Those who say, do not know.
2. Close the mouth.
   Shut the door.
   Merge into light.
   As ordinary as dust.
   Blunt the sharpness.
   Unravel the entanglements.
3. This is called mysterious sameness.
4 You are not intimate by acquiring it.
   You are not distant in not acquiring it;
   You do not profiting by acquiring it.
   You do not lose it by not acquiring it;
   You are not ennobled by acquiring it.
   You are not disgraced by not acquiring it.
5. This enables the nobility of the world.

Chapter 57

1. Using the right lawfulness to govern the country.
   Using unexpectancy to conduct the battle.
   Using disengagement to take over the world.

2. How do I know this is so?
   Thus.
3. The more prohibitions there are in the world, the poorer people will be.
   The more destructive weapons people have, the more chaotic the nation will become.
   The more know-how people have, the more bizarre things will appear.
   The more rules and demands that flourish, the more thefts there will be.
4. Therefore the sage says:
   When I am inactive, people transform themselves.
   When I abide in stillness, people organize themselves lawfully.
   When I am disengaged, people enrich themselves.
   When I choose non-desire, people remain simple.

Chapter 58

1. When the government is silent, people are sincere.
   When the government is intrusive, the state is decisive.
2. Disaster is what fortune depends upon,
   Fortune is what disaster subdues.
   Who knows a final outcome?
3. There is no right lawfulness.
   Justice tends towards the extreme.
   Kindness tends towards evil.
   People have been familiar with this for a long time.
4. So,
   Be rounded without cutting.
   Be compatible without puncturing.
   Be straightforward without trapping.
   Be bright without dazzling.

Chapter 59

1. For governing people and serving the heaven, nothing is better than frugality.
2. Only frugality enables the pre-empty measures.
   Pre-empty measures mean a great accumulation of Action.
   A great accumulation of Action leaves nothing to be conquered.
   When nothing needs to be conquered, No-boundary is known.
   When no-boundary is known, it allows the country to exist.
   The country, existing from its source, can endure.

3. This is the Tao of having a deep root, a strong stem, a long life and an enduring vision.

Chapter 60

1. Governing a large country is like cooking a small fish.
2. If Tao is utilized to manage the society, its ghost will not become spirit.
   Not that ghost is not spiritual, but that the spirit harms no people;
   Not only does the spirit harms not the people, but that the sage is harmless.
3. As those two cause no harm, they are united in Action.

Chapter 61

1. A great nation flows downwardly; it is the mother of the world, and the integration of the world.
2. The mother is always tranquil and overcomes the male by her tranquility; so she benefits the world.
3. A great nation relies on a low position to take over a small nation.
   A small nation, being in a low position, is taken over by a great nation.
4. So being lower allows taking over or being taken over.
5. Being a great nation only desires to unify the people.
   Being a small nation only seeks people's business.
6. They both get what they want, but the greater is being lower.

Chapter 62

1. Tao is the conductor of all things.
   The treasure of the good.
   The protector of the bad.
2. Beautiful words can advertise well.
   Noble conduct brings praise to people.
3. As for those who conduct the bad, why reject them for it?
4. Therefore, after the crowning of the emperor comes the appointing of three administrations.
   Being presented with jade in front of the team of four horses is not better than sitting and entering thus.
5. The reason why this is valued of old is,
   It allows having without asking, and it allows forgiveness of wrong.
   Thus, it is most valuable to the world.

Chapter 63

1. Do non-doing.
   Engage in non-affairs. Savor non-flavor.
2. Large or small, many or few, reward or punishment, are all being done through Action.
3. Seek what is difficult with ease.
   Effect what is great while it is small.
4. The most difficult things in the world are done while they are easy.
   The greatest things in the world are done while they are small.
5. The sage never plans to do a great thing.
   Thus, he accomplishes what is great.
6. Facile promises necessarily result in little trust.
   What is easy necessarily entails difficulty.
7. Thus the sage, through extreme trials, encounters no difficulty.

Chapter 64

1. It is easy to sustain what is at rest.
   It is easy to plan for that of which there is not even a sign.
   What is fragile is easily broken.
   What is minute is easily dispersed.
2. Act upon it before it exists.
   Regulate it before it becomes chaos.
3. A massive tree grows from a little sprout.
   A nine-story-building rises from a clod of earth.
   A thousand-fathoms begin with a single step.
4. Those who impose action upon it will fail.
   Those who cling to it lose it.
5. So the sage, through non-action, does not fail.
   Not clinging, he does not lose.
6. The common people's engagement in affairs fail prior to success.
7. So the saying goes, "Give as much careful attention to the end as to the beginning; then the affairs will not fail."
8. It is on that account that the sage desires not to desire and does not value goods that are hard to get.
   He learns not to learn and restores the common people's losses.
   He is able to support the nature of all things and, not by daring, to impose action.

Chapter 65

1. Those who practiced Tao in olden times did not enlighten people, Rather they made them simple.
2. What makes it the hardest to govern the people is what they already know.

It becomes most difficult to govern people because of their knowledge.

3. So, using knowledge to govern the country, knowledge itself becomes the thief of the country.
   Not using knowledge to govern the country, knowledge itself is the Action of the country.
4. Always realize that these two are the model for ruling.
   Always be aware that this model is the mystic Action.
5. Mystic Action is deep and far-reaching.
   It is the opposite of matter.
   Only thus does it approach the Great Harmony.

Chapter 66

1. The reason why rivers and seas have the capacity for kingship over all the valleys is that they excel in lowliness.
   That is why they have the capacity for kingship over all valleys.
2. Thus, since the sage wants to elevate the people, his speech is down to earth.
   Since the sage wants to advance the people, he positions himself at the back,
3. So that when he is at the front, people do not harm him.
   When he stands above, people do not feel pressure.
   The whole world supports him untiringly.
4. Since he does not rely on competition, the world has nothing with which to compete.

Chapter 67 (Ch. 80)

1. A small country has few people.
2. Weapons are far more numerous than the people, but they are not used.
   Let people be serious about death and enjoy a long journey.
   Though there are carriages and boats, they are not useful for travel.
   Let people return to:
   Use the technique of knotting the rope,
   Enjoying the food,
   Appreciating the cloth,
   Delighting in customs,
   Settling into their living conditions.
3. The neighboring countries are in sight.

The sounds of dogs and chickens are heard.
People grow old and die without interference from each other.

Chapter 68 (Ch. 81)

1. Trustworthy words are not beautiful.
   Beautiful words are not trustworthy.
   The knower does not know everything.
   The know-it-all knows nothing.
   Kindness is not over-indulgent.
   Over-indulgence is not kind.
2. The sage does not collect.
   As soon as he exists for others, he has more.
   As soon as he gives to others, he has more.
3. So the Tao of heaven benefits and does not harm.
   The Tao of human-kind exists and does not compete.

Chapter 69

1. Everyone in the world says I am great, great without parallel.
   Being without parallel is what enables greatness.
   If there is a long standing parallel, it becomes small.
2. I always have three treasures:
   First is compassion.
   Second is frugality.
   Third is to not dare act in front of the world.
3. So compassion enables courage.
   Frugality enables abundance.
   Not daring to act in front of the world enables the mechanism to endure.
4. Today there is courage without compassion.
   There is abundance without frugality.
   There is appearance alone without substance.
   This means no-life.
5. Through compassion: fight and win; defend and be secure.
6. When the heaven establishes itself, it always relies upon compassion.

Chapter 70

1. Being a good warrior does not entail power.
   A good fighter is not angry.
   One who is good at overcoming the enemy does not contact him.

One who is good at leading people acts humbly.
2. This is called the Action of non-competition.
This is called leading people.
This is called the Ultimate as old as heaven.

Chapter 71

1. There is a saying on using military force, it says:
I dare not be the host, but rather a guest.
I dare not advance an inch, but rather retreat a foot.
2. This is called performing without performing, rolling up one's sleeves without showing the arms.
By not holding on to an enemy, there is no enemy.
3. There is no disaster greater than having no enemy.
Having no enemy almost destroys my treasure.
4. When opposing armies clash, those who cry win!

Chapter 72

1. My words are easy to understand and easy to apply.
Yet no one in the world can understand them and no one could apply them.
2. Words have their origin, and events have their leader.
3. Only because of prevailing ignorance that I am not understood.
The few who understand me, the more precious I am.
4. So the sage wears shabby cloth, but holds a treasure within.

Chapter 73

1. Knowing that you don't know (everything) is superior.
Not knowing that you don't know (everything) is a sickness.
2. So the sage's being without sickness is that he knows sickness as sickness;
Thus, he is without sickness.

Chapter 74

1. People are fearless before the power.
If fear arises, it will be a great fear.
2. Not constraining the living environment.
They do not get bored by life.
Because we do not get bored, there is no boredom.
3. Therefore the sage is self-aware but not introspective.
He has self-respect but does not price himself.

4. He rejects one and takes the other.

Chapter 75

1. Courage combined with daring promotes killing.
   Courage not combined with daring promotes life.
2. These two can be either beneficial or harmful.
3. Who knows the reason for what heaven hates?
4. The Tao of heaven is Good at winning without fighting,
   Good at responding without speaking,
   Appearing without being asked,
   Good at strategizing while fighting.
5. The net of heaven is broad and loose,
   Yet nothing slips through.

Chapter 76

1. Whenever people are unafraid of death, how can killing be used as a threat?
   Whenever people are afraid of death and are acting contrary, I will catch and kill them; who else can act so?
   When people are absolutely afraid of death but perform killing, they are the best qualified to be executioners.
2. This is like doing carving for a master craftsman.
   Doing the carving for a master craftsman, how could one's hand not get cut?

Chapter 77

1. The reason people are starving is because the government taxes too much. This is the reason for starvation.
   The reason people are hard to govern is because their leaders are actively engaged. This is why they are hard to govern.
   The reason people are not serious about death is because they seek the burdens of life. This is why they are not serious about death.
2. Only those who are not slaves to life are wise to the value of life.

Chapter 78

1. When people are born, they are soft and gentle.
   When they die, they are stiff and callous.
2. When myriad things, grasses and trees, are born, they are soft and tender.

When they die, they are withered.
3. So stiffness and callousness are the company of death.
Softness and suppleness are the company of life.
4. The powerful army will not win.
A stiff tree will break.
5. So stiffness and power stay below.
Softness and suppleness stay above.

Chapter 79

1. The Tao of heaven is like drawing a bow.
The high bends down,
The low rises up.
The surplus decreases.
Insufficiency is supplied.
2. So the Tao of heaven reduces what is surplus and enhances what is insufficient.
The human Tao reduces what is insufficient and caters to the surplus.
3. Who can use the surplus to benefit the heaven?
Only those who possess Tao.
4. So the sage
Exists without ownership,
Accomplishes without holding on.
It is thus, without desire, that the wise see.

Chapter 80

1. Nothing in the world is softer and more supple than water.
When confronting strength and hardness nothing can overcome it.
2. Using nothingness simplifies.
Using water overcomes hardness.
Using weakness overcomes strength.
There is no one in the world who does not know it, but no one can apply it.
3. So it is a saying of sages that:
Whoever can bear the disgrace of the country is the ruler of the country.
Whoever can bear the misfortune of the world is the ruler of the world.
4. Truthful speech seems paradoxical.

Chapter 81

1. Reconciling a great hatred necessarily entails unsolved hatred.
How can this be kindful?
2. So the sage honors the left-hand tally but does not blame people.

Door to All Wonders

Application of the Tao Te Ching

Mantak Chia

and

Tao Huang

Door to All Wonders

Here is an in depth exploration of Lao Tzu's "Tao Te Ching". Taoist Master Mantak Chia and Tao Huang guide us into the origins of the philosophy and way of living that generations have followed. The thrust of the book is directed to the practical significance and ramifications of cultivating the Tao and Te—regardless of the exercises one may employ for training. The mindfulness of Tao and Te in our lives and in our cultivation practices streamlines the effectiveness of all that we are and all that we do. The essence of this project is more experiential than conceptual. Taoism is all about experience: words are the final elixir or the representations of that elixir, being crystallized. They are like DNA in a living flesh.

New Approach to Understanding the Tao Te Ching

If ideas are "food for thought" then these master chefs have served up the most nourishing of specialties: healthy culinary treasures for the body, mind and spirit. These treasures are easily digested when approached with respect and with open hearts and minds. Chewed well and blended with your elixir and essence, their beneficial truths will manifest in your daily life.

Clear and Interesting Insights to Lao Tzu

"Thirty spokes share the wheel's hub; it is the center hole that makes it useful." There are many pages and words between these covers yet it is the empty space between the ears that render them valuable. The wisdom presented here is intended to be considered, embraced and absorbed. It is presented with profound knowledge of and respect for the Tao. The open-respectful reader will receive a transmission that will serve every breath.

First Conceptual Understanding of Virtue and the Tao by the Universal Tao

How to live a meaningful life? Indeed, what makes a life meaningful? Lao Tzu's brief and essential verses have confounded humankind and conferred blessings on humankind dating from their inscription and many translations over 2,500 years past. Allow yourself the privilege of dwelling within these sheltering thoughts as you continue making your way along the Way.

Mulţumiri

Autorii şi personalul Universal Healing Tao Publications implicat în pregătirea şi realizarea volumului EMDR şi vindecarea prin Tao. Cum să foloseşti psihologia energetică pentru a depăşi traumele emoţionale îşi exprimă recunoştinţa faţă de numeroasele generaţii de maeştri taoişti care le-au transmis învăţăturile lor preţioase prin viu grai, neîntrerupt, de-a lungul a mii de ani. Îi mulţumim maestrului taoist I Yun (eremitul Un Nor) pentru că ne-a transmis fără rezerve formulele alchimiei interne taoiste.

Le suntem veşnic recunoscători părinţilor şi învăţătorilor noştri pentru numeroasele daruri pe care ni le-au făcut. Amintirea lor aduce bucurie şi satisfacţie în strădaniile noastre necontenite de a înfăţişa sistemul Tao Universal. Pentru aceste daruri, îi vom iubi mereu. Ca întotdeauna, contribuţia lor a fost crucială pentru prezentarea conceptelor şi tehnicilor sistemului Tao Universal.

Dorim să le mulţumim miilor de bărbaţi şi femei anonimi cunoscători ai artei vindecării taoiste, care au dezvoltat multe dintre metodele şi ideile prezentate în volumul de faţă. Le mulţumim pentru încurajarea personală necontenită semenilor noştri taoişti, studenţilor, clienţilor, familiilor şi prietenilor care au inspirat scrierea acestui volum prin dorinţa lor vie de a înţelege reciclarea emoţională taoistă.

Le mulţumim numeroaselor persoane care şi-au adus aportul la forma finală a cărţii: personalului editorial şi de producţie de la Inner Traditions/Destiny Books pentru eforturile de a clarifica textul şi de a realiza o nouă ediţie aspectuoasă a volumului, iar lui Nancy Yeilding pentru redactarea noii ediţii.

Mulţumiri speciale echipei de producţie thailandeze pentru munca ei la prima ediţie a acestei cărţi: Hirunyathorn Punsan, Sopitnapa Promnon, Udon Jandee şi Suthisa Chaisarn.

Doug Hilton doreşte să le mulţumească: soţiei sale, Ana, pentru toată dragostea şi susţinerea pe parcursul procesului de scriere; maestrului Mantak Chia pentru toate cunoştinţele, înţelepciunea, îndrumarea şi sprijinul său; lui Dell Graff pentru că l-a iniţiat în domeniul consilierii persoanelor cu adicţii; Veronicăi Graff pentru că i-a arătat valoarea tradiţiilor mai vechi; lui Brent Neumann pentru numeroasele conversaţii care l-au pus pe gânduri; Donnei Bourd pentru că i-a prezentat tehnica EMDR şi pentru că l-a sprijinit constant; doctorului Sal Mendaglio pentru că i-a prezentat noţiunea de polarităţi; lui Gerald Hilton fiindcă l-a încurajat şi i-a reamintit fără încetare valoarea antipozilor; lui Edward Gutierrez pentru înţelepciunea şi încurajarea continuă; Juttei şi lui Walter Kellenberger pentru susţinerea lor tăcută şi constantă; lui Gordon Mah pentru că l-a ascultat cu răbdare şi l-a încurajat; doctorului Marshall Wilensky, care i-a predat tehnica EMDR; doctorului Francine Shapiro fiindcă a descoperit EMDR; doctorului Robert Miller pentru că a creat Protocolul Dependenţei Senzaţie-Stare; tuturor maeştrilor taoişti care au contribuit la cunoaştere şi miilor de clienţi care i-au împărtăşit înţelepciunea şi experienţa lor de-a lungul anilor. Mulţumiri speciale îi sunt adresate şi lui William U. Wei pentru răbdarea şi dedicarea în procesul de producţie a ediţiei originale.

Cum punem în practică reciclarea emoţională taoistă

Informaţiile prezentate în acest volum se bazează pe experienţa personală şi pe cunoştinţele autorilor despre reciclarea emoţională taoistă. Practicile descrise sunt utilizate cu succes de mii de ani de taoişti instruiţi individual. Se recomandă ca cititorii să nu aplice practicile, pe ei înşişi sau pe alte persoane, fără a primi informaţii, instruire individuală şi o certificare din partea unui instructor de reciclare emoţională taoistă atestat, întrucât executarea incorectă a anumitor exerciţii poate cauza leziuni ori probleme de sănătate. Cartea de faţă se doreşte o completare a instruirii individuale oferite de Tao Universal şi un ghid de referinţă pentru aceste practici. Efectuarea acestor practici doar pe baza cărţii se face pe proprie răspundere.

Meditaţiile, practicile şi tehnicile descrise aici nu trebuie utilizate ca alternativă sau substitut pentru tratamentele şi îngrijirile medicale profesioniste. Cititorii care suferă de afecţiuni ce au la bază tulburări fizice, mentale sau emoţionale trebuie să consulte un specialist sau un terapeut profesionist. Asemenea probleme trebuie rezolvate înainte de începerea antrenamentului Tao Universal.

Nici Tao Universal, nici personalul şi nici instructorii săi nu pot fi consideraţi responsabili pentru consecinţele oricărei practici sau utilizări incorecte a informaţiilor conţinute în volumul de faţă. Dacă cititorul efectuează vreun exerciţiu fără a respecta strict instrucţiunile, observaţiile şi avertismentele, responsabilitatea îi aparţine în exclusivitate.

Cartea de faţă nu îşi propune să ofere niciun diagnostic, nicio reţetă, niciun tratament medical şi nicio recomandare curativă în legătură cu niciun fel de boală, indispoziţie, suferinţă sau condiţie fizică.

Introducere

Elaborarea unei psihologii integrate a energiei

Doug Hilton

Formarea mea ca psihoterapeut a început în 1984. Pe tot parcursul pregătirii m-au măcinat întrebări care nu au primit niciun răspuns. De exemplu, la primul curs de teorie a personalităţii, profesorul ne-a spus că cei mai mulţi dintre noi studiam psihologia pentru că doream să ne facem bine noi înşine, nu numai să-i ajutăm pe alţii. În ceea ce mă privea, avea dreptate.

Totuşi, pe măsură ce am lucrat în diverse ramuri din domeniul psihologiei, sănătatea mea mintală ori cea a colegilor mei nu părea să se îmbunătăţească odată cu experienţa. Am început să mă întreb dacă lipsa stării de bine îi caracterizează pe cei care aleg consilierea ca profesie ori dacă e creată sau agravată de activitatea profesională în domeniu. Iar în cazul în care consilierii se îmbolnăvesc din cauza profesiei lor, m-am întrebat cum e posibil acest lucru şi ce este de făcut pentru a-l preîntâmpina.

Tot în acest sens, îmi aduc aminte că în timpul specializării ni s-a spus că la finalul unor zile de consiliere ne vom simţi încărcaţi de emoţiile pacienţilor consultaţi în zilele respective. Profesorul ne-a spus să nu ne încărcăm cu emoţiile clienţilor. Ne-a spus că poate fiecare dintre noi va avea nevoie să stea de vorbă cu un consilier, astfel încât aceste sentimente să nu se acumuleze în noi şi să nu devină de necontrolat. La atât s-a redus formarea noastră în ceea ce priveşte acest aspect important al consilierii. Habar n-aveam cum să mă detaşez, cum să mă protejez ori cum să scap de efectele nesănătoase preluate de la clienţi.

Eram derutat de accentul pus pe minte şi pe creier în multe abordări clasice ale consilierii, deşi, aparent, toată lumea ştie că mintea şi trupul nostru sunt legate între ele. Clienţii mei se plângeau mereu de probleme fizice care păreau legate de dificultăţile lor emoţionale, însă nu ştiam cum să-i ajut. Şi mai greu îmi era să înţeleg de ce tratamentul anumitor probleme, ca adicţiile sau tulburările alimentare, consta în principal în a ţi se spune să gândeşti altfel.

M-a surprins faptul că adesea, în urma consilierii, problemele cu care se confruntau clienţii nu dispăreau. Am fost şi mai şocat de faptul că frecvent erau etichetaţi ca suferind de o tulburare de personalitate şi catalogaţi drept imposibil de ajutat dacă progresul lor nu era rapid şi constant. M-am întrebat de ce în domeniul meu de activitate nu se încerca să se depăşească această situaţie.

Apoi, în 2001, am făcut un curs de formare în desensibilizare şi reprocesare prin mişcări oculare (Eye Movement Desensitization and Reprocessing – EMDR), o revoluţie în domeniul consilierii. EMDR a făcut un pas mare în abordarea ciclurilor şi dinamicilor care ne creează provocări concrete. EMDR este o tehnică de consiliere de specialitate utilizată în toată lumea pentru a-i ajuta pe oameni să se debaraseze de sentimentele negative legate de lucruri care li s-au întâmplat în trecut, dar care continuă să-i preocupe. S-a dovedit deosebit de eficientă în tratarea tulburării de stres posttraumatic (TSPT) atât la soldaţii întorşi din război, cât şi la ceilalţi oameni. Nu este complicată în ceea ce priveşte interpretarea, recomandările sau temele pentru acasă. Recunoaşte legătura dintre minte şi trup şi lucrează cu energia (indiferent dacă aceasta este recunoscută oficial sau nu). De-a lungul anilor s-au făcut multe studii despre EDMR, metoda a fost rafinată, devenind un tratament ce oferă rezultate rapide şi permanente pentru majoritatea persoanelor care îl primesc.

Cum funcţionează EMDR

EMDR utilizează seturi de stimulare bilaterală (înainte şi înapoi) a simţurilor în timp ce pacientul se concentrează asupra unor aspecte-cheie ale problemei care trebuie abordată. Iniţial, se realiza prin mişcări oculare, de unde şi originea denumirii. Totuşi, în prezent se face şi prin stimularea simţului tactil – prin tapotarea picioarelor clientului – sau a auzului – pocnind din degete lângă urechile pacientului. A fost conceput şi un aparat electronic care poate produce senzaţii, sunete şi jocuri de lumini ce realizează stimularea.

În protocolul EMDR consilierul îi prezintă clientului metoda, iar problema asupra căreia se va lucra este identificată şi clarificată. Acest pas e urmat de trei etape ale tratamentului: desensibilizarea, în care sentimentele şi impulsurile negative sunt îndepărtate; instalarea pozitivă, care acumulează convingeri pozitive; şi scanarea corporală, axată pe eliminarea oricăror senzaţii fizice negative rămase.

În concluzie, procedura funcţionează. Odată ce închei toate cele trei etape, sentimentele sau impulsurile negative nu revin. Funcţionează foarte rapid în comparaţie cu majoritatea celorlalte metode de consiliere. Clientul nici măcar nu trebuie să creadă în metodă pentru ca aceasta să fie eficientă.

Stabilirea unor legături dinamice

Învăţarea metodei EMDR mi-a oferit o modalitate cu totul nouă de a-i ajuta pe ceilalţi, ce părea mai holistă şi mai puţin dependentă de interacţiunea dintre clienţi şi mine. Clienţii se vindecau singuri. Eu nu făceam decât să-i ghidez. Simţeam că utilizau o abordare mai satisfăcătoare din punct de vedere clinic. EMDR dă rezultate mai rapide şi mai concrete. Totuşi, întrucât metoda a fost descoperită întâmplător, la cursurile de formare nu ni s-au oferit explicaţii clare despre motivul pentru care funcţionează.

În 2004 am fost la Grădina Tao, frumosul centru pentru sănătate şi instruire creat de maestrul Chia în Thailanda. Îmi făcusem la San Francisco o idee despre ce are el de oferit şi abia aşteptam să învăţ mai multe. Am avut norocul să aflu despre Grădina Tao când am participat la primul curs de formare şi să am posibilitatea de a sta pe toată perioada verii, pentru a afla mai multe. Ca mulţi alţi participanţi, aveam multe întrebări fără răspuns despre viaţa mea şi despre viaţă în general. Am descoperit că maestrul Chia şi sistemul Tao Universal organizat de el ofereau răspunsurile mult căutate.

Pe când mă aflam la Grădina Tao am început să fac legături mintale între domeniul psihoterapiei şi practicile qi gong predate acolo. Aveam impresia că meditaţia pe care o învăţam ar putea avea efecte similare cu ceea ce se petrece în EMDR. Deşi discuţiile anterioare despre EMDR cu persoane care folosesc o altă abordare nu fuseseră constructive, doream foarte mult să ştiu ce credea maestrul Chia despre această tehnică, aşa că l-am abordat emoţionat la sfârşitul unui curs de meditaţie. Când l-am întrebat dacă a auzit despre EMDR, mi-a spus: „Nu. Ce-i aia?”. Am rămas surprins că nimeni nu-i povestise deja despre metodă. M-am gândit că probabil nu există mulţi consilieri care să-şi pună genul de întrebări pe care mi le puneam eu.

I-am povestit pe scurt despre stimularea bilaterală (înainte şi înapoi) aplicată în EMDR în timp ce clientul se concentrează asupra amintirilor tulburătoare din trecut. El mi-a zis: „A, ştergi emoţiile din jurul problemei”. M-am gândit: „De unde-o fi ştiind?”. Eram şocat. Apoi m-a rugat să merg la el acasă în seara respectivă şi să testez metoda pe el. Am fost şocat din nou.

Am mers la el acasă şi l-am întrebat dacă avea vreo problemă asupra căreia dorea să se concentreze în timp ce aplicam tehnica. A răspuns afirmativ şi mi-a explicat-o. Toţi trecem în viaţă prin lucruri care ne copleşesc, aşa că nu m-a mirat că a găsit o chestiune ce putea fi supusă intervenţiei. Era totuşi o chestiune importantă. Presupunând că avea să fie nevoie de mai mult de o şedinţă, mă gândeam deja când m-aş fi putut întoarce pentru a termina treaba.

Am parcurs procesele preliminare şi apoi am început etapa desensibilizării, partea care elimină sentimentele negative. De obicei, EMDR acţionează rapid în îndepărtarea acestor sentimente. Dacă problema o constituie un singur incident, de multe ori sentimentele negative pot dispărea într-o şedinţă sau două cu o durată de o oră şi jumătate. În acest caz, au dispărut după aproximativ cinci minute. Eram perplex. M-am gândit că emoţiile lui dispăruseră doar pentru o vreme şi că urmau să reapară dacă întrerupeam procesarea, aşa că am continuat. După încă zece minute a trebuit să recunosc că etapa desensibilizării se încheiase. Instalarea pozitivă şi scanarea corporală se încheiaseră şi ele automat. Am discutat despre această experienţă şi maestrul Chia a avut de spus multe lucruri pozitive. Am plecat de la el foarte fericit, dar nedumerit.

A doua zi la prânz, maestrul Chia m-a chemat la masa lui şi mi-a spus: „Ştii, EMDR funcţionează, însă emoţiile se găsesc încă în organe”. La început am crezut că, într-un fel sau altul, ne scăpase ceva în timpul scanării corporale. Apoi a început să-mi explice din perspectiva energiei cum funcţionează EMDR şi că tehnica validează, de fapt, afirmaţiile formulate de maeştrii taoişti de mii de ani, mai ales pe cele referitoare la mişcările oculare.

Totuşi, după cum a formulat Einstein în celebra lui ecuaţie $E = mc^2$, energia nu poate fi creată sau distrusă. Nu poate fi decât transformată. EMDR elimină legătura dintre minte şi memorie, însă emoţia din jurul problemei tratate nu dispare. Rămâne în organele interne. Să ne-o imaginăm ca pe un computer în care creierul este hardware-ul, organele alcătuiesc software-ul şi în care există legături spre fiecare fişier. EMDR distruge legătura, dar lasă energia în organe. Numele fişierului a fost corupt. Reziduul energetic al problemei respective nu mai ştie încotro să se îndrepte. Se poate duce oriunde. Energia care nu a fost transformată se poate întoarce la tine pe un traseu nou. Energia din organe trebuie să fie transformată şi legată la sol pentru a nu reveni asupra ta.

În timpul discuţiilor cu maestrul Chia, ne-am gândit că sistemul qi gong Tao Universal ar putea ajuta la explicarea, îmbunătăţirea şi transformarea EMDR într-o tehnică pe care lumea să o poată folosi cu încredere şi în mod eficient pentru propria vindecare. Pentru a înţelege cum pot să apară aceste beneficii din combinarea celor două, e important să avem câteva noţiuni de taoism, qi şi qi gong.

Taoismul

Taoismul este o veche filosofie chineză axată pe deprinderea căii de a trăi în armonie cu natura. Lui Lao Zi i se atribuie meritul dezvoltării taoismului şi al scrierii învăţăturilor sale în Tao te qing. Practicile taoiste presupun dezvoltarea conştientizării energiilor din noi şi din jurul nostru şi deprinderea celei mai bune modalităţi de a reacţiona la ele. Învăţăturile taoiste pun accent pe echilibru, aşa cum se poate vedea în următoarele două fragmente din Tao te qing:

> Cerul şi Pământul nu cunosc „omenia”: ele se poartă cu „cele zece mii de fiinţe şi lucruri” la fel cum s-ar purta cu nişte „câini de paie”; Omul Sfânt nu cunoaşte „omenia”: el se poartă cu oamenii la fel cum s-ar purta cu nişte „câini de paie”.
> Întinderea dintre Cer şi Pământ se aseamănă, negreşit, cu foalele fierarului: este goală, şi totuşi nesecată! Cu cât se mişcă, cu-atât suflă mai mult aer. Vorba multă împuţinează viaţa: a păstra înlăuntru vidul este mai presus[1].

Relaxarea şi detaşarea sunt, de asemenea, noţiuni importante în taoism. În evoluţia sa pe parcursul a mii de ani, sistemul antic al taoismului a cultivat numeroase aspecte legate de sănătate şi de vindecare, ca acupunctura, tai chi, feng shui (arta amenajării casei sau a locului de muncă pentru a crea un flux de energie armonios), I Ching (o metodă prin care energiei universale i se cere îndrumare pentru modul de abordare a evenimentelor viitoare), astrologia chineză şi qi gong.

Qi şi qi gong

Qi (pronunţat „chi”) este energia din jurul nostru şi din noi. Diferite culturi şi sisteme i-au dat un alt nume, dar, aparent, întâlnim un consens că qi există. Ştiinţa occidentală, de pildă, vorbeşte despre energia bioelectromagnetică a corpului. Qi circulă în corpul nostru la toate nivelurile şi prin toate tipurile de ţesut. Sângele urmează calea qi-ului. Există diverse tipuri de qi în corpul nostru, pe planetă şi în univers.

Qi gong se referă la procesul prin care învăţăm cum să ne însuşim aceste energii pentru a ne controla, a ne vindeca, a ne fortifica şi a ne echilibra starea de sănătate la toate nivelurile, astfel încât să creăm mai uşor armonie interioară şi să interacţionăm armonios cu lumea din jur. Ne ajută să înţelegem mai bine care sunt cele mai potrivite moduri de reacţie la împrejurări, astfel încât să nu perturbăm armonia. Când practică qi gong, oamenii experimentează o stare euforică naturală. Qi este energie relaxată, astfel încât practicanţii se simt calmi şi echilibraţi, dar şi suficient de energici pentru a reacţiona la situaţiile zilei. Persoanele care practică qi gong învaţă să se tempereze, să se relaxeze, să se concentreze, să stocheze energie şi să se comporte astfel încât să nu-şi irosească energia şi să nu o consume prea repede.

Ca multe culturi aborigene şi antice, qi gong se axează pe modul în care omul poate să trăiască în armonie cu natura şi să înveţe de la ea. Numeroase practici qi gong s-au dezvoltat din observarea modului în care reacţionează copiii, animalele şi copacii la condiţiile schimbătoare. Acest tip de lucru cu corpul îţi permite să-ţi depăşeşti parţial rezistenţa la schimbare. De exemplu, ideea de relaxare te poate face să cauţi motive pentru care acum nu e momentul potrivit să te relaxezi, însă respiraţia corectă creează frecvent o stare de relaxare fără niciun fel de obiecţii sau împotrivire.

Axarea pe simptome în medicina occidentală face ca individul să fie tratat adesea de mai mulţi specialişti diferiţi, fiecare cu propria perspectivă (adeseori în contradicţie cu celelalte), şi ca un singur individ să primească multe tratamente, fiecare cu propriile efecte secundare. În schimb, perspectiva oferită de qi gong şi de toate practicile sistemului Tao Universal recunoaşte corpul şi mintea ca formând un singur sistem.

Cum ne-am împărtăşit descoperirile

Din conversaţiile despre EMDR ce au urmat după primul schimb de păreri cu maestrul Chia, amândoi ne-am dat seama că îmbinarea dintre EMDR şi sistemul Tao Universal, bazat pe principii şi practici de qi gong, constituie materia primă pentru elaborarea unei metode noi care poate fi întrebuinţată pentru a-i învăţa pe oameni să se vindece singuri. De-a lungul anilor, am făcut încercări independent, combinând elemente de EMDR cu qi gong, şi ne-am împărtăşit experienţele şi descoperirile în diverse momente. Practica pe care o numim reciclare emoţională taoistă a fost rafinată într-o asemenea măsură încât este justificat să fie împărtăşită cu restul lumii şi să reprezinte o nouă şi puternică metodă de vindecare.

Probabil te-ai întrebat şi tu: „Cum ne abatem de la calea sănătăţii şi a fericirii?” sau „Cum ne dăm seama că ne-am abătut de la ea?”. În primele cinci capitole este descris modul în care influenţele externe ne pot deruta astfel încât să nu mai ştim cum să trăim în armonie cu lumea. Aceste capitole demonstrează că adeseori gândim şi acţionăm pe căi care ne încurcă şi mai tare, ducând atât la „soluţii” ineficiente şi complicate, cât şi la afecţiuni ca depresia, anxietatea şi trauma.

Cartea de faţă a fost scrisă pentru a explica legăturile energetice dintre tulburările de stare, ca depresia şi anxietatea, şi traume şi adicţii, precum şi pentru a arăta cum poate noua metodă energetică să dizolve şi să transforme aceste legături. Începând cu capitolul 6 vei învăţa cum se pot folosi cunoştinţe din taoism, din sistemul Tao Universal şi din EMDR pentru a crea practici simple, dar eficiente, capabile să anuleze această dinamică, ajutându-te astfel să te vindeci pe tine şi pe alţii pe toate planurile.

Practicile respectă principiile sistemului Tao Universal şi învăţăturile taoiste, care ne ajută să explicăm cum şi de ce funcţionează metoda – pe cale holistică, asupra întregului sistem minte-corp. Citate din Tao te qing sunt presărate în pasaje relevante ale cărţii. Observă-ţi reacţiile la ideile prezentate. Ai putea înţelege modul în care ai fost influenţat fără să-ţi dai seama, astfel încât te-ai îndepărtat de natura ta şi de adevăratul tău scop.

Pentru a evidenţia factorii care par importanţi, folosim cuvinte sau sintagme ca „lumea”, „oamenii” şi „societatea modernă” cu referire la tendinţele generale ale unor grupuri, şi nu pentru a sugera că fiecare persoană din lume acţionează la fel. În multe cazuri, ilustraţiile oferă situaţii ultrasimplificate sau exagerate intenţionat, pentru a transmite o anumită idee. Cititorul e rugat să le trateze cu aceeaşi uşurinţă cu care sunt oferite.

Căutarea sensului şi a sănătăţii în lumea modernă

Aparent, toţi căutăm lucruri asemănătoare: pace lăuntrică, control emoţional, modalităţi de a elimina gândurile nedorite, sănătate fizică şi vitalitate, precum şi o înţelegere a principiilor după care funcţionează viaţa şi a celor mai bune căi prin care putem reacţiona la schimbările şi la provocările vieţii. Fiecare dintre noi caută răspunsuri în ritmul şi în felul propriu. În lumea modernă ai foarte multe opţiuni de explorat. Poţi apela la religie pentru răspunsuri, poţi adopta un anumit domeniu ştiinţific sau te poţi orienta spre practici de medicină alternativă sau complementară. Toate aceste opţiuni au propria valoare, bineînţeles, însă e posibil să nu ofere explicaţii şi experienţe suficiente pentru a-l satisface pe individul care caută. Chiar dacă găseşti un sistem de credinţe satisfăcător şi ştii ce ar trebui să faci, să crezi ori să simţi, se întâmplă adesea să nu ştii cum să pui intenţiile respective în practică. Remediile rapide care dau dependenţă pot părea mai simple şi mai fiabile decât munca necesară pentru a-ţi găsi sau a-ţi crea propria magie în viaţă, însă nu dau aceeaşi satisfacţie durabilă pe care o poate aduce căutarea fericirii autentice.

Cum ne-am rătăcit

În general, cu toţii ştim că ar trebui să facem „ce trebuie”, dar cum ştim ce înseamnă asta în fiecare situaţie? Atunci când suntem confuzi şi încordaţi, prietenii şi rudele ne spun „să fim tari”, „să nu cedăm uşor” şi „să ne ascultăm instinctul”, dar alteori ne spun „să luăm situaţia ca atare”, „să ne detaşăm” şi „să ne punem mintea la contribuţie”. Când ar trebui „să întoarcem şi celălalt obraz” şi când „să nu cedăm teren”? Dacă nu avem o bază formată din cunoştinţe şi practici care să ne ajute să înţelegem ce, cum şi când să facem, chiar şi sfaturile bine intenţionate pot fi foarte derutante. Cum să cultivăm autodisciplina dacă nu ştim cum funcţionează sistemele noastre mentale, emoţionale şi fizice şi nici cum sunt legate de mediul în care trăim şi cum le influenţează acesta?

Când nu ştim cum să ne alegem abordarea, cei mai mulţi dintre noi reacţionează de frică şi se bazează doar pe puterea voinţei şi pe logică în viaţă. Bineînţeles, problemele apar pentru că viaţa nu corespunde întotdeauna voinţei sau ideilor noastre despre cum ar trebui să stea lucrurile. Când exagerăm în hotărârea noastră de a controla lucrurile, tindem să intrăm în lupte pentru putere cu prietenii, şefii, rudele, partenerul de viaţă şi colegii de muncă. Furia, frustrarea, frica, îngrijorarea şi resentimentele se pot acumula pe măsură ce vedem iar şi iar că, indiferent cât de siguri suntem de ideile noastre despre cum trebuie să fie lucrurile, nu vom obţine întotdeauna tot ce dorim. Mai mult, dacă experienţele ne contrazic convingerile despre lume sau despre noi înşine, ne-am putea simţi copleşiţi. Asemenea sentimente pot duce la anxietate şi la depresie.

Foto 1.1. Mesajele contradictorii creează confuzie.

Mass-media ne îndeamnă să recurgem la o sursă exterioară pentru a ne simţi mai bine. Aluziile şi imboldurile sunt peste tot – în reviste, în cărţi, la televizor, pe panourile publicitare şi pe internet. Mesajul te poate încuraja să faci ceva nesănătos, de exemplu, să bei alcool, să iei droguri, să fumezi ţigări, să mănânci excesiv ori să joci jocuri de noroc. Sau te poate încuraja să faci ceva sănătos, de pildă, să citeşti o carte, să te uiţi la o comedie, să-ţi vizitezi prietenii sau să te înscrii la un curs de meditaţie. Chiar dacă avem acces la asemenea surse sănătoase din afara noastră, faptul că tânjim mereu după lucruri tot mai multe şi tot mai bune pentru a ne simţi mai bine nu ne elimină decât temporar stresul şi deruta. Alte mesaje întăresc ideea că acumularea de bunuri ne va face fericiţi, însă nu ne garantează şi că vom avea întotdeauna banii necesari pentru a cumpăra lucrurile respective.

Foto 1.2. Când încerci să controlezi incontrolabilul, poţi simţi că încerci să împingi la deal un bolovan imens.

Un alt aspect al societăţii noastre moderne care creşte inconştient nevoia indivizilor de a recurge la soluţii externe pentru propriile probleme este faptul că preţuim corectitudinea. Mass-media strecoară ideea de corectitudine în cultura noastră. Tuturor ne place să auzim poveşti despre binele care biruie răul. Din păcate, combinaţia dintre încurajarea indivizilor de a-şi controla mediul şi destinul prin voinţa lor şi ideea conform căreia corectitudinea este de aşteptat şi de dorit în viaţă duce în mod cert la eşec, la deziluzie şi la senzaţia că eşti depăşit de situaţie.

Foto 1.3. Societatea ne încurajează să cumpărăm tot felul de lucruri în speranţa că acestea ne vor face fericiţi.

Uneori, indivizii ajung să facă lucruri nesănătoase, de exemplu, să consume alcool sau droguri sau să joace jocuri de noroc, pentru a face faţă acestor sentimente copleşitoare. Unii devin dependenţi de o substanţă sau de o activitate. Dependenţa şi trauma sunt factori esenţiali şi generalizaţi în majoritatea crimelor şi nedreptăţilor pe care le săvârşim unii împotriva altora. Probabil că cei mai mulţi dintre noi ne-am întrebat la un moment dat: „Ce e în neregulă cu oamenii?”, „De ce nu ne putem înţelege pur şi simplu unii cu alţii?”. Ne întrebăm de ce au loc atât de multe războaie, înşelătorii şi furturi din motive pecuniare, materiale şi teritoriale. Totuşi, aceste comportamente pot fi considerate produse secundare ale unei lumi ce susţine că acumularea de bunuri este soluţia problemelor noastre.

Multe dintre eforturile noastre formale în direcţia schimbării acestor tipare constau în crearea unor servicii specializate şi locuri de muncă pentru experţi care să abordeze fiecare parte a problemei. Am investit mult timp, energie şi bani în împărţirea problemelor în subcategorii, inventând nume pentru acestea şi creând politici, legi, servicii, programe de formare şi documentaţie aferentă care atestă progresul făcut în rezolvarea chestiunii. Creăm proceduri şi locuri de muncă pentru evaluarea progresului. Restructurăm organizaţii pe baza acestor evaluări. În curând vom avea nevoie de experţi care să ne spună căror experţi să ne adresăm ca să primim ajutor pentru problemele noastre. Oare această abordare ne oferă cu adevărat rezultatele dorite? S-ar zice că nu. Războaiele împotriva infracţionalităţii, drogurilor, terorii şi sărăciei încă nu sunt câştigate. Strategiile noastre pentru a face faţă simptomelor se bazează pe aceleaşi convingeri iniţiale referitoare la logică şi puterea voinţei care au creat, de fapt, aceste probleme.

Foto 1.4. Aparent, logica şi puterea voinţei sunt utile, însă uneori ne pot duce la soluţii care creează mai multe probleme, de o complexitate mai mare.

Pe scurt, trăim într-o lume ce pare dominată de ideea de efort pentru a ne alina suferinţa, şi totuşi suferinţa noastră e chiar rezultatul acestui efort. Putem deprinde astfel convingeri şi obiceiuri nesănătoase, ancorate atât de bine în convingerile şi deprinderile noastre individuale, încât nici nu le băgăm de seamă şi nu le punem sub semnul întrebării.

Viaţa într-o societate a soluţiilor rapide

Mijloacele de informare în masă ne bombardează constant cu cele mai recente şi mai rapide moduri de a ne simţi mai bine, de a economisi timp şi de a ne atinge obiectivele. Soluţiile rapide sunt ridicate în slăvi; par să fie extrem de atrăgătoare şi să satisfacă simultan mai multe necesităţi. De exemplu, oamenii fumează ţigări ca să se relaxeze, să fie sociali, să se simtă interesanţi sau sofisticaţi şi să obţină mai multă energie. O asemenea soluţie pare avantajoasă şi eficientă. Nu e de mirare că lumea recurge la soluţii rapide mai drastice şi mai periculoase atunci când cele folosite de obicei nu funcţionează sau când nu are alternative mai sănătoase. Întrebuinţarea soluţiilor rapide ca stil de viaţă creează un tipar paradoxal. Oamenii încearcă să recurgă la soluţii rapide pentru a se relaxa. Însă, dacă această strategie nu funcţionează, nu mai reuşesc să se relaxeze. Atunci tind să încerce soluţii rapide mai periculoase. Astfel de cicluri ar putea fi evitate dacă lumea ar învăţa să facă opusul – mai întâi să se relaxeze şi apoi să termine ce rămâne de făcut.

Foto 1.5. Adesea, ca să ne bucurăm de momentul prezent, avem nevoie de stimulare artificială.

Părinţii nu pot contracara complet influenţa societăţii

Adeseori, părinţii sunt consideraţi responsabili pentru evoluţia emoţională şi financiară a copiilor lor de-a lungul vieţii. Totuşi, cum ar putea părinţii să ofere suficientă îndrumare şi influenţă pentru a contracara influenţa diverşilor factori care-i încurajează pe copii să lupte în viaţă şi să-şi măsoare valoarea în funcţie de câte lucruri pot cumpăra, mai ales dacă ţinem cont de faptul că şi părinţii sunt influenţaţi în acelaşi mod? În cazul în care copiii nu înţeleg cum aşteptările societăţii au afectat fericirea părinţilor lor, e uşor să-i învinuiască. Este o ironie că, dacă ai resentimente, acestea îţi consumă energia şi te fac mai slab, iar astfel devii mai vulnerabil şi te simţi depăşit de situaţie sau devii deprimat atunci când te confrunţi cu provocările vieţii.

Foto 1.6. Părinţii ne influenţează în mare măsură viziunea asupra vieţii, dar şi societatea.

Goana după realizări în viaţă te poate face să te simţi gol pe dinăuntru

Viaţa într-o societate competitivă

Motorul lumii noastre sunt banii. Unii oameni au mai mulţi bani decât alţii. Fără bani nu putem avea lucrurile pe care le dorim, de aceea ne luăm la întrecere pentru bani, putere şi statut, în speranţa că într-o zi le vom avea. Unii câştigă aceste competiţii, alţii le pierd. Toţi pierdem uneori. Ne dăm seama când pierdem şi de obicei suntem deprimaţi, cel puţin pentru o vreme. Tindem să ne forţăm ca să facem mai mult şi mai bine, astfel încât să obţinem banii şi lucrurile pe care le vrem. Acest fapt poate crea stres şi anxietate.

Foto 1.7. În cele din urmă, încercarea de a câştiga, ca stil de viaţă, îi face pe oameni să se simtă dezamăgiţi şi ranchiunoşi.

Prea mult ataşament, insuficientă detaşare

În cultura noastră consumeristă, toate tipurile de mass-media ne bombardează zi de zi cu mesaje care ne spun că, pentru a fi împliniţi, trebuie să cumpărăm şi să realizăm lucruri. Suntem încurajaţi „să luptăm pentru ce-i al nostru". În consecinţă, în cele din urmă ne agăţăm de bunurile noastre. Un asemenea ataşament creşte probabilitatea de a ne agăţa şi de alte lucruri din viaţa noastră, de pildă, de oameni, de emoţii şi de propriul punct de vedere. Detaşarea li se poate părea inutilă sau indezirabilă celor care acţionează astfel. Totuşi, vom pierde inevitabil anumite lucruri. Nu vom obţine întotdeauna ceea ce dorim. Prin urmare, dacă nu am învăţat să ne detaşăm ori să apreciem valoarea detaşării, suntem mai expuşi riscului de a ne simţi copleşiţi atunci când viaţa nu ne oferă lucrurile pe care le dorim sau pe care credem că ar trebui să le avem. Un obiectiv comun în renunţarea la adicţie este „detaşarea cu dragoste". Deşi sună atractiv, multe persoane nu ştiu să pună în practică acest obiectiv. E dificil să renunţăm la ataşamente dacă o mare parte din stilul nostru de viaţă presupune şi eforturi.

Lao Zi ne arată o altă cale în capitolul 9 din Tao te qing:

A păzi cu străşnicie bunuri şi a le spori nu este mai presus de a înceta la vremea cuvenită. Îngrijind de săbii şi ascuţindu-le nu le vom putea avea la veşnicie. Când aurul şi jadul umplu odăile, nu se va putea găsi nimeni care să le poată străjui. Cunoscând îndestularea şi mărirea, de te vei arăta trufaş, tu singur îţi vei pricinui prăpădul.
Desăvârşindu-ţi lucrarea, numele tău se va face cunoscut, iar tu să te retragi – acesta este Tao al Cerului[1].

Cunoaşterea procesului firesc al schimbării

Din cauza gândirii liniare, a vieţii extreme şi a grabei, mulţi oameni tind să-şi formeze aşteptări nerezonabile de la ei înşişi şi de la viaţă. Se aşteaptă ca schimbările să se petreacă repede şi uşor, chiar şi atunci când încearcă să schimbe o problemă care le-a afectat ani la rând viaţa sub numeroase aspecte. Au tendinţa de a aştepta ca schimbarea să se petreacă liniar, fără suişuri şi coborâşuri. Adeseori se axează prea mult pe rezultat, şi nu pe proces, şi de aceea nu îşi atribuie meritul eventualelor progrese făcute până când nu-şi ating obiectivele. Iată ceea ce numim perfecţionism. Perfecţioniştii consideră că greşelile le reflectă defectele de caracter, şi nu prilejuri de a învăţa şi de a creşte. De asemenea, cei care nu înţeleg procesul firesc al schimbării îşi formează o gândire defectuoasă în ceea ce priveşte controlul pe care îl au sau pe care ar trebui să-l aibă asupra întâmplărilor din propria viaţă. Trebuie să se relaxeze şi să se bucure de proces, inclusiv de suişurile şi coborâşurile fireşti, inerente învăţării unui lucru nou.

Foto 1.8. Lupta şi lăcomia în viaţă duc în cele din urmă la nefericire, dacă nu ştii şi cum să te detaşezi ori să renunţi atunci când dorinţa de a avea mai mult îşi pierde sensul.

Toate aceste concepţii greşite despre procesul firesc al schimbării ne duc pe calea dezamăgirii şi cresc riscul de a ne simţi în cele din urmă copleşiţi de viaţă. Pentru cei aflaţi în această situaţie, obsesia şi ruminarea sunt adesea strategii de coping. Ei încearcă să găsească o soluţie, însă gândirea lor liniară îi ţine într-o buclă fără ieşire. Însă, în timp ce se zbat să găsească o soluţie, energia toxică se acumulează în corp. Teama creată de lipsa cunoaşterii sau a încrederii în ordinea naturală a lucrurilor poate creşte probabilitatea de a recurge la activităţi şi la substanţe care vor genera, de fapt, mai mult haos şi mai multă confuzie.

Devalorizarea şi ignorarea necesităţii de a renunţa

Într-o lume care consideră că acumularea de bunuri este măsura succesului şi a valorii în viaţă, e firesc să adoptăm o abordare ce susţine acest obiectiv. De obicei, încercăm să mergem direct spre obiectivele pe care ni le-am propus şi să considerăm orice obstacole ivite în cale drept probleme sau ameninţări. Situaţiile în care nu putem menţine calea directă spre ele sunt privite ca un eşec personal. Începem să credem că ruşinea şi învinovăţirea sunt imbolduri necesare pentru a ne învăţa lecţia şi a ne descurca mai bine data viitoare. Totuşi, ruşinea şi învinovăţirea ne subminează încrederea în noi şi sporesc şansele să obţinem în continuare rezultate nesatisfăcătoare. Trebuie să înţelegem că toţi creştem şi învăţăm în ritmul propriu, cu suişuri şi coborâşuri pe parcurs. Toţi avem puncte forte şi neajunsuri. Există anumite lucruri pe care poate nu vom fi niciodată în stare să le realizăm. Renunţarea are legătură cu acceptarea realităţii şi a propriilor limite în ce priveşte controlul asupra noastră şi a situaţiilor cu care ne confruntăm, şi nu cu lenea sau slăbiciunea.

Foto 1.10. Poate că nu vom fi în stare niciodată să facem anumite lucruri.

Nu ne concentrăm suficient asupra prezentului

Setea de succes material ne încurajează firesc să ne concentrăm asupra viitorului. Prea multă axare pe viitor poate genera îngrijorare, ceea ce ne face să ne bucurăm mai puţin de momentul prezent. Dacă nu ne axăm pe prezent, concentrarea şi controlul asupra prezentului sunt limitate. Lipsa de concentrare asupra prezentului duce la şi mai puţin succes în îndeplinirea obiectivelor noastre. Atunci apar sentimentele negative legate de succesul nostru limitat, ceea ce ne atrage atenţia din nou asupra trecutului. Dacă nu te concentrezi asupra prezentului, rămâi cu sentimente negative.

O atitudine din care lipseşte recunoştinţa

Fără o bază spirituală care să-l canalizeze, consumerismul ne poate face vulnerabili la metodele sofisticate de publicitate, care sugerează că nu putem fi fericiţi dacă nu achiziţionăm toate produsele noi de pe piaţă. Apoi descoperim inevitabil că bucuria deţinerii acestor produse e de scurtă durată. Adoptarea unui asemenea stil de viaţă ne limitează bucuria pentru lucrurile pe care le avem deja, în special pentru acele aspecte din viaţa noastră care nu sunt bunuri materiale.

Foto 1.11. Progresul de ultimă oră nu creează întotdeauna mai multă fericire.

Strategii de succes versus strategii falimentare

Confundarea asertivităţii cu agresivitatea

În logica abordării noastre societale care presupune acapararea, lupta şi acumularea, redefinim adesea asertivitatea drept capacitatea de a-i determina pe oameni să facă ce vrem, în loc să le comunicăm pur şi simplu ce dorim sau de ce avem nevoie. Astfel, devenim inconsecvenţi în ceea ce priveşte convingerile noastre despre puterea personală. Ajungem să acţionăm ca şi cum ar trebui să obţinem orice vrem şi să ne simţim vinovaţi şi ruşinaţi în caz contrar. De asemenea, tindem să simţim furie, frustrare şi resentimente faţă de persoanele şi situaţiile care nu se supun voinţei noastre. De obicei, încercarea de a ne impune voinţa prin constrângere şi manipulare duce la şi mai multă frustrare, întrucât ceilalţi pot alege întotdeauna să spună „nu”.

Foto 1.12. Convingerile dezechilibrate despre puterea personală pot duce la furie, frustrare şi resentimente faţă de persoanele şi situaţiile care nu se supun voinţei noastre.

Abuzul de voinţă

Putem influenţa anumite aspecte din viaţa noastră prin eforturi, dar pe altele nu le putem controla. În general, diferenţa constă în faptul că avem control asupra noastră, dar nu şi asupra altora. Dacă cineva s-a hotărât să nu facă ce vrem noi, atunci controlul nostru e foarte limitat. Puterea voinţei nu poate depăşi limitele fizice sau aspectele practice ale unei situaţii.

Dacă ai un stil de viaţă materialist, nu te atrage ideea de a recunoaşte că nu poţi obţine mereu ceea ce vrei. Drept urmare, tinzi să ignori realitatea limitelor propriei influenţe şi să abuzezi puterea voinţei în moduri agresive şi manipulatoare.

Declanşarea accidentală a sistemelor noastre de apărare

Dacă nu ştim cum să abordăm obiceiurile proaste, ne folosim adeseori contextul cerebral în încercarea de a câştiga bătălia dintre conştient şi inconştient. Totuşi, când încercăm să ne convingem pe noi înşine să facem ceva, deşi avem anumite rezerve la un nivel mai profund, ne activăm accidental sistemele de apărare pentru a nu acţiona conform dorinţelor noastre conştiente.

Să ne imaginăm pe cineva care se teme de înălţime şi îşi spune să privească în jos de pe un zgârie-nori. Cu cât încearcă să o facă, cu atât îi vin în minte motive să nu privească. Persoana respectivă ar putea gândi: „Te-ai ţicnit? Chiar mi-e frică!”. Lucrul cu corpul dă rezultate mai bune în multe cazuri, deoarece aceleaşi sisteme de apărare nu se declanşează la fel de uşor. Sistemul Tao Universal şi Tao te qing, pe care se bazează, descriu o abordare mai sănătoasă, care „depăşeşte puterea voinţei”:

> În vechime, cei meniţi să se desăvârşească prin Tao erau neştiuţi, însă atotştiutori; atât de adânci, cu neputinţă de a fi cunoscuţi.
> Numai şi numai din pricină că nu puteau fi cunoscuţi, iată de ce atât de greu le pot da o înfăţişare!
>
> Erau prevăzători, ca atunci când se trece, în timpul iernii, un puhoi.
> Temători – temându-se parcă de vecinii din jur.
> Respectuoşi, asemenea unui oaspete.
> Neîncordaţi, aidoma gheţii topindu-se.
> Neprefăcuţi: erau asemenea lemnului nelucrat.
> Cuprinzători: asemenea văilor dintre munţi.
> Nedesluşiţi – păreau înceţoşaţi!
>
> Cui îi este cu putinţă ca din tulburare să capete netulburarea, limpezindu-se încetul cu încetul?
> Cui îi este cu putinţă ca-n nemişcare fiind, întruna să lucreze, încetul cu încetul împlinindu-se?!
> Cel care păzeşte acest „Tao” nu caută să strălucească; numai şi numai din pricină că nu caută a străluci, iată de ce îi este cu putinţă să se arate neînsemnat, iar nu ca unul proaspăt încununat de izbândă[2].

Extremele te pot dezechilibra

Am putea face o analogie între cursurile de apă de pe pământ şi sistemele energetice din corpul nostru: acestea sunt ca un sistem de cursuri de apă de diferite forme şi mărimi, ca oceanele, fluviile, lacurile şi pâraiele. Gândeşte-te ce se întâmplă cu toate aceste cursuri de apă pe măsură ce afli informaţii despre fiecare dintre următorii factori.

Căutarea fericirii poate duce la un stil de viaţă nesănătos şi extrem

În lumea modernă, agitată în care ne zbatem să câştigăm destui bani pentru a cumpăra cea mai recentă invenţie care ar trebui să ne facă viaţa plăcută ori să economisească timp, stresul se poate transforma cu uşurinţă în senzaţia că suntem depăşiţi de situaţie.

Comportamentul şi dorinţele extreme sunt valorizate în societatea modernă. Expresii comune ca „Ori fă ceva memorabil, ori nu mai face nimic” şi „Câştigă cine adună cele mai multe puncte când şi-a pierdut viaţa” sunt exemple în acest sens.

Astfel de idei îi încurajează pe oameni să aprecieze mai mult rezultatele exterioare decât pacea interioară şi să năzuiască la o viaţă lipsită de echilibru. Uneori chiar se sugerează că obţinerea rezultatelor exterioare aduce pacea interioară. Totuşi, ştim cu toţii că nu ni se garantează aşa ceva şi că „mai mult” şi „mai mare” nu înseamnă întotdeauna „mai bine”. De fapt, tipul de luptă, de lăcomie şi de competiţie ce apare atunci când oamenii cred că aceasta este singura sau cea mai bună cale pentru a fi fericiţi creează adesea prea mult stres şi nu le permite să se bucure în mod firesc de viaţă.

Figura 2.1. Sistemele energetice din corpul omenesc sunt asemenea râurilor, lacurilor, pâraielor şi oceanelor.

Graba

Când suntem în situaţii dificile, mulţi dintre noi se grăbesc să clarifice lucrurile înainte ca situaţia să se înrăutăţească. Din păcate, astfel cresc şansele să ne simţim în cele din urmă depăşiţi, nu neapărat pentru că situaţia se agravează, ci pur şi simplu fiindcă e mai stresant să încerci să gestionezi o situaţie dificilă dacă te grăbeşti decât dacă îţi iei un răgaz. Un posibil slogan util de ţinut minte ca să nu cazi în capcana grabei este „Dacă te stresezi, regresezi”. De obicei, când suntem stresaţi, avem reacţiile care ne sunt cele mai familiare. În asemenea momente nu am încerca ceva nou, fiindcă s-ar putea dovedi şi mai stresant. Vechile noastre căi familiare de a face faţă situaţiei sunt în general cele învăţate de timpuriu în viaţă, când aveam mai puţine cunoştinţe şi mai puţină experienţă. Aşadar, atunci când ne stresăm în plus grăbindu-ne, nu ne facem un bine.

Foto 2.2. Ne bazăm prea mult pe tehnologie, „mai mult" şi „mai rapid" pentru a ne îmbunătăţi viaţa.

Învăţarea dependentă de stare

Un alt concept care ne poate ajuta să înţelegem de ce răgazul este de fapt mai bun atunci când ne confruntăm cu situaţii dificile este învăţarea dependentă de stare. Tindem să ne amintim ceea ce am învăţat în momentul în care avem aceeaşi stare ca atunci când am învăţat prima oară lecţiile respective. Dacă ai deprins multe dintre cele mai bune strategii de coping într-o stare de calm, probabil că ţi le vei aminti tot într-o stare de calm. De obicei, la serviciu sau la şcoală învăţăm lucruri când suntem calmi. Dacă mai târziu adoptăm un stil de viaţă frenetic sau haotic, ne va fi mai greu să accesăm informaţiile necesare pentru a funcţiona la randament maxim, inclusiv faptul că suntem mult mai eficienţi dacă ne păstrăm calmul.

Foto 2.3. Învăţarea dependentă de stare se referă la tendinţa oamenilor de a uita ceea ce ştiu atunci când au o stare diferită de cea în care erau în momentul dobândirii cunoştinţelor respective.

Dacă te stresezi prea mult, e posibil să nu-ţi poţi accesa cele mai bune informaţii şi strategii. Atunci când se ceartă, cuplurile sunt adesea dezorientate de această dinamică. În toiul certei, partenerii tind să reacţioneze în moduri care nu îi caracterizează şi care chiar depăşesc anumite limite pe care şi-au promis că nu le vor depăşi.

Supraîncălzirea

Atunci când ne grăbim, când gândim prea mult, când ne forţăm să obţinem ultimele gadgeturi şi bunuri şi când ducem un stil de viaţă extrem, corpul nostru intră în stări conflictuale şi se supraîncălzeşte. Oamenii stresaţi acumulează prea multă căldură în cap. Nu pot să gândească limpede şi nici să doarmă bine. Supraîncălzirea poate contribui la ceea ce numim burnout. Se pare că intuim că acest lucru este adevărat. Spunem că creierul nostru e „prăjit” atunci când suntem prea stresaţi şi nu putem gândi limpede.

Prea multă căldură în jumătatea superioară a corpului ne poate împiedica să gândim limpede sau să ne calmăm. S-ar părea că toţi suntem conştienţi într-o anumită măsură că relaxarea şi „răcorirea” sunt noţiuni legate între ele. Când nu putem dormi bine ori când nu putem gândi clar, tindem să luăm decizii proaste, iar comportamentul nostru lasă de dorit, ceea ce atrage consecinţe indezirabile care, la rândul lor, ne stresează şi mai mult ca să rezolvăm problemele create de deciziile şi comportamentele nepotrivite. Îngrijorarea cauzată de noile probleme şi încercarea de a le rezolva pot crea şi mai multe conflicte şi încălzire. Iată un cerc vicios. De asemenea, acest tip de încălzire poate stimula sau agrava hiperactivitatea.

Foto 2.4. Ritmul frenetic generează prea multă căldură, care afectează negativ capacitatea noastră de a fi eficienţi.

Prea multă tensiune

Multă lume lasă relaxarea mai ales pentru concedii şi vacanţe. Astfel, în timpul concediilor şi vacanţelor nu numai că eşti presat să te detensionezi, aşa cum ai nevoie, dar relaxarea devine un moment, în loc să fie un proces continuu. Atunci când credem în expresii ca „fără efort nu obţii nimic”, „munca înainte de distracţie”, „fii mai bărbat” şi „muncesc cu gândul la weekend”, s-ar zice că am adoptat un stil de viaţă în care refacerea forţelor se numără printre ultimele noastre priorităţi, nefiind îngăduită decât după ce ne-am atins obiectivele, indiferent care ar fi ele. Însă, când devenim tensionaţi, tindem să fim mai puţin eficienţi, aşa că o astfel de abordare creşte probabilitatea să ne simţim frustraţi şi depăşiţi de situaţie.

În termeni taoişti, mulţi oameni au un stil de viaţă dezechilibrat prin faptul că acordă prea multă importanţă aspectului yang (agresiv, activ) al vieţii şi prea puţină aspectului yin (de refacere, de receptare). Să ne gândim la această situaţie ca la un cont bancar. Dacă retragi mai mulţi bani decât ai, vei da de necaz, aşa cum spune clar Lao Zi în capitolul 26 din Tao te qing.

> Grija este rădăcina nepăsării; netulburarea este stăpâna nesăbuinţei.
> De aceea, Omul Sfânt cutreieră din zori şi până-n seară, însă nu îşi părăseşte poverile. Deşi are în stăpânire privelişti semeţe şi lăcaşuri ale desfătării, el este nepăsător.
> Cum şi-ar îngădui atunci „stăpânul a zece mii de care” să nesocotească ţara prin purtarea sa?! Dacă va nesocoti ţara, atunci îşi va pierde dregătorii; dacă va fi nesăbuit, atunci îşi va pierde domnia[1].

Prea multă încordare

Se acordă multă importanţă aspectului fizic, mai ales muşchilor lucraţi în zona abdominală. Este în regulă să fim supli şi să avem corpul bine lucrat, iar contractarea musculaturii e necesară în timpul exerciţiilor fizice, însă cei care stau încordaţi tot timpul se vor simţi obosiţi şi stresaţi în cele din urmă. Canalele energetice din corp sunt ca nişte furtunuri minuscule pentru grădină. Dacă răsuceşti furtunul, jetul de apă se blochează.

Organele interne sunt responsabile pentru procesarea alimentelor şi lichidelor. Ca să-şi îndeplinească funcţia, trebuie să fie relaxate şi să se poată mişca liber. Este o ironie că, dacă îţi ţii abdomenul prea încordat, durează mai mult ca mâncarea să treacă prin procesul de digestie. Astfel, creşte probabilitatea ca hrana să fie stocată sub formă de grăsime. Persoanele care obişnuiesc să stea încordate sunt mai puţin eficiente în celelalte activităţi zilnice şi devin lente şi iritabile, întrucât fac eforturi să-şi depăşească constrângerile energetice. Din această cauză, ele s-ar putea simţi deprimate, anxioase şi chiar depăşite de situaţie.

> Când se nasc, oamenii sunt moi şi slabi, iar când mor, sunt tari şi puternici. Când răsar, plantele sunt moi şi plăpânde, iar când mor, sunt veştede şi tari.
> Prin urmare, cel tare şi puternic se-ndreaptă către moarte, iar cel moale şi slab se-ndreaptă > către viaţă.

> De aceea, dacă oştirea este puternică, ea nu va birui, dacă arborele este puternic, el poate fi îmbrăţişat cu amândouă mâinile.
> Ceea ce este puternic şi mare se găseşte jos, iar ceea ce este moale şi slab se găseşte sus (Tao te qing, capitolul 76)[2].

Lipsa de conştientizare a corpului

Deşi corpul nostru este important pentru noi, iar starea lui poate afecta măsura în care ne bucurăm de viaţă, mulţi dintre noi nu şi-l cunosc încă foarte bine. Dacă ai fi într-o încăpere plină de oameni, de exemplu, şi i-ai întreba dacă ştiu unde se află splina în corp, mulţi vor răspunde negativ. Atunci când nu ne cunoaştem corpul sau nu ni-l conştientizăm, nu ştim cum să ne îngrijim cel mai bine, mai ales în ceea ce priveşte prevenţia.

Trăim prea acaparaţi de simţuri

Ne putem simţi depăşiţi de situaţie şi dacă ne axăm prea mult pe lumea materială pe care o percepem cu ajutorul ochilor, nasului, gurii şi limbii, fără a acorda suficientă atenţie laturii spirituale şi energetice a vieţii aflate la baza ei. Lupta şi competiţia pot deveni un stil de viaţă. Dacă urmărim să avem bani, bunuri, cuceriri, statut şi putere, ne-am putea simţi neîmpliniţi. Cu toţii pierdem, facem greşeli şi îmbătrânim. Goana necontenită după succesul material poate duce la îmbătrânire prematură şi atacuri de cord. Putem deveni foarte obosiţi şi nefericiţi dacă alergăm după lucruri care sperăm că ne vor face fericiţi. O viaţă fără sensul ce poate fi aflat prin simţuri devine în cele din urmă nesatisfăcătoare, după cum spune limpede Lao Zi:

> Cele cinci culori orbesc ochii omului, iar cele cinci sunete îi asurzesc urechile; cele cinci gusturi îi strepezesc gura, iar goana-n lung şi-n lat şi vânătoarea călare îi smintesc sufletul: obiectele preţioase îl împing pe om la ucidere.
> Prin urmare, Omul Sfânt se îngrijeşte de pântece, iar nu de ochi. Aşadar, el leapădă acest din urmă lucru, alegându-l pe cel dintâi[3].

Dacă încercăm să nu dăm prea mare importanţă satisfacerii simţurilor şi să ne amintim că ele sunt doar filtre ale realităţii, şi nu realitatea în sine, poate că nu ne vom lăsa acaparaţi de luptele pentru putere cu persoanele şi situaţiile din viaţa noastră. Este mult mai uşor să creăm un mediu frumos şi cuprinzător în noi înşine decât să încercăm să-l cumpărăm.

Foto 2.5. „M-am plictisit. Ce mai urmează?”

Dacă ne axăm pe lucruri strălucitoare şi colorate, zgomotoase, gustoase şi frumos mirositoare pentru a fi fericiţi, am putea deveni obosiţi şi nefericiţi. Atunci când ne folosim prea mult simţurile, ele nu reuşesc să se odihnească. Cheltuim energie în încercarea de a gusta aceste desfătări senzoriale, însă de obicei, ulterior, nivelul energiei noastre scade brusc. Stimularea senzorială în exces ne poate înviora pe moment, dar ne epuizează mai târziu. Expunerea frecventă la stimulare excesivă poate face ca simţurile să fie indiferente la minunile din viaţa de zi cu zi şi poate duce la dependenţa de substanţe şi de activităţi palpitante. Acest fapt creează o spirală descendentă a depresiei, pe care o tratăm folosind stimularea, urmată de o prăbuşire când dispar efectele medicaţiei. Dacă de obicei îţi suprastimulezi simţurile, îţi va fi greu să apreciezi liniştea de zi cu zi.

Foto 2.6. „În sfârşit, am întâlnit o femeie stabilă, sănătoasă la cap, bună la suflet, atentă şi amuzantă. Doar că e tare plicticoasă.”

Adaptarea exagerată

Oamenii sunt făcuţi să se adapteze la circumstanţe. Pe măsură ce ne îndepărtăm de starea noastră naturală pentru a răspunde la cerinţele vieţii cotidiene, stresul, frustrarea şi suprastimularea inerente acestui stil de viaţă încep să pară fireşti. Un stil de viaţă mai lent, nu chiar extrem ni se pare plictisitor. Ne obişnuim cu un parcurs cu suişuri şi coborâşuri dramatice. Acest parcurs ne solicită foarte mult sistemele interne. Începem să simţim că ne oboseşte şi avem nevoie de senzaţii şi mai tari pentru a ne reface temporar forţele. Între timp, toxinele se acumulează pe măsură ce ne forţăm să ne depăşim limitele naturale.

Acţionăm împotriva firii

Pentru a ţine pasul cu ritmul frenetic şi aşteptările vieţii moderne, adeseori adoptăm un stil de viaţă nefiresc pentru corpul nostru. Mâncăm şi bem la repezeală în timpul mesei, ne trezim mai devreme decât ar vrea corpul nostru şi folosim substanţe excitante precum ţigările, cofeina şi alcoolul ca să ne prelungim activitatea chiar şi după ce corpul este epuizat. Drept rezultat, suntem mai vulnerabili ca oricând la surmenare, la depresie, la anxietate sau la sentimentul că suntem depăşiţi de situaţie.

Scoatem mai mult decât punem înapoi

Când ne stresăm, corpul ne pregăteşte pentru fugă ori pentru luptă. Aceasta este reacţia de tip „luptă sau fugi”. În asemenea momente, rinichii ni se contractă asemenea muşchilor, iar diafragma se încordează la baza cutiei toracice, în partea din faţă a corpului. Din această cauză, respiraţia completă devine dificilă. Partea superioară a cavităţii abdominale este contractată, astfel încât aerul nu prea are unde să intre. Chiar şi după ce trece ameninţarea, corpul tinde să rămână într-un fel de „cod galben”, respirând superficial. Poate rămâne în această stare săptămâni, luni sau chiar ani. Între timp, nu se curăţă adecvat şi de aceea toxinele şi tensiunea se acumulează în interior.

Foto 2.7. „Şeful nu poate aştepta până mâine. Cred că iar lucrez până târziu diseară.” Persoanele care se forţează prea mult recurg în cele din urmă la substanţe excitante ca să funcţioneze în continuare.

Într-un fel sau altul, mulţi dintre noi duc la extrem sensul unor principii precum „Ce ţie nu-ţi place altuia nu-i face” şi „E mai bine să dai decât să primeşti”, într-atât încât acestea au ajuns să însemne că este o dovadă de egoism să primeşti de la alţii sau să-ţi porţi de grijă. Însă a-i mulţumi pe alţii poate crea dependenţă. Acest lucru te epuizează şi cei pe care vrei să-i mulţumeşti nu mai reuşesc să înveţe să se descurce singuri. În cele din urmă, prea mult sacrificiu de sine te face să te consumi fizic, emoţional, mintal şi spiritual. Şi dacă o ţii tot aşa prea mult timp, nu vei mai fi în stare nici să-i ajuţi pe alţii. Ca să nu ajungi în această situaţie, programele în 12 paşi invocă adesea necesitatea unei abordări de tip „mai întâi sinele propriu”, şi nu de tip egoist.

Îndepărtarea de natură duce la deprinderi nefireşti

Viaţa modernă dominată de tehnologie ne ajută să ne protejăm de aspectele dure ale naturii, precum furtunile şi frigul, dar şi să ne rupem de natură în general. Cu excepţia evadărilor în weekend şi în vacanţe, de obicei nu avem contact cu natura. Dăm mulţi bani şi muncim pe brânci ca să evadăm din viaţa citadină, care ar fi trebuit să ne protejeze în faţa naturii. Atunci când ne întoarcem în natură, regăsim pacea şi ritmul vieţii. Când suntem departe de ea, uităm şi uneori recurgem la stimulente ca să ne mişcăm mai repede decât ciclurile vieţii, astfel încât să le-o luăm înainte. Din păcate, acest fapt duce deseori la nerăbdare, frustrare şi greşeli din neglijenţă, ceea ce ne intensifică dorinţa de „a evada”.

Foto 2.8. O viaţă echilibrată şi fericită presupune pauze regulate de la aspectele precipitate şi complicate ale vieţii noastre.

Prea obosiţi pentru a creşte şi pentru a urma un curs firesc în viaţă

Dacă ne forţăm să ne depăşim limitele fireşti în căutarea a ceea ce ni s-a spus că ne-ar face fericiţi, suportăm consecinţe care ne pot face să ne simţim îmbătrâniţi înainte de vreme. Ne-am putea simţi obosiţi, iar atunci, chiar dacă realizăm că trebuie să ne schimbăm stilul de viaţă, e posibil să nu avem rezerve de energie pentru a face schimbările necesare.

De asemenea, definirea succesului în funcţie de rezultatele externe ne afectează prioritătile. În mod conştient sau nu, dacă suntem prinşi în goana după bani, statut, avere şi faimă, în general credem că nu avem timp sau energie pentru a acorda atenţie corpului sau emoţiilor noastre. Dacă în perioadele dificile apelăm la „soluţii rapide" precum alcoolul, drogurile sau jocurile de noroc, căile noastre energetice se blochează cu toxine şi se umplu de energie slabă şi stagnantă, motiv pentru care ne e şi mai greu să ne atingem obiectivele.

Imaterialul devine material

Multe persoane nu ştiu despre toxinele care se acumulează în corp sau nu le acordă suficientă atenţie. Toxinele pot ajunge în noi prin aerul respirat, prin alimentele şi lichidele ingerate, prin emoţiile noastre şi emoţiile celorlalţi. Toate ocupă spaţiu energetic înăuntrul nostru. Toxinele ne înfundă meridianele, traseele energetice din corp. Din această cauză, ne simţim tot mai blocaţi şi mai afectaţi pe plan fizic, emoţional, mintal şi spiritual. Atunci apar diverse afecţiuni cronice. Ne simţim împovăraţi de viaţă şi ni se pare că mai e puţin şi trecem de pragul suportabilităţii. În cele din urmă, devenim mai temători şi mai iritabili şi, ca o ironie, acest fapt creşte probabilitatea ca toxinele emoţionale să se acumuleze. Intrăm într-un cerc vicios.

Şi capacitatea noastră de a gândi limpede şi rapid este afectată. Aparent, toţi ştim asta într-un fel sau altul. Când ne referim la persoane care nu gândesc cum trebuie folosim adeseori termeni ca „opac" şi „încuiat". Dacă nu înţelegi legătura dintre toxine şi sentimentele negative, eşti mai predispus să recurgi la ceva extrem, eventual care dă şi dependenţă, pentru a te simţi mai bine, iar astfel în sistemul tău se acumulează şi mai multe toxine.

Foto 2.9. Viaţa la extrem duce la acumularea toxinelor. Acumularea toxinelor duce la prestaţii şi rezultate mai slabe şi adesea la automedicaţie în încercarea de a face faţă sentimentelor negative.

Lipsa cultivării autodisciplinei

Cum deprindem moduri în care să ne relaxăm, să ne concentrăm şi să ne urmărim ideile? Asemenea abilităţi sunt rareori înnăscute. Dacă nu ne antrenăm în acest sens ori, mai rău, dacă ni se dau exemple necorespunzătoare de autodisciplină în copilărie, suntem mai predispuşi să recurgem la soluţii rapide. Dacă nu ne putem controla pe noi înşine, vom încerca să controlăm persoanele şi lucrurile din jurul nostru. Totuşi, nu numai că este imposibil să controlăm evenimentele din afara noastră, dar adesea oamenii se vor încăpăţâna şi vor face contrariul a ceea ce vrem. Astfel, ne vom simţi lezaţi, sentimente care se vor acumula înăuntrul nostru în timp.

Foto 2.10. „Linişteşte-te odată! Ce-i cu tine?" De multe ori, persoanele care nu au învăţat să se autodisciplineze încearcă să controleze persoanele şi situaţiile din jurul lor.

Stimularea în exces ne poate deprima

În societatea modernă, stimulentele sunt peste tot. Oamenii se folosesc de cofeină, nicotină, metamfetamină, jocuri de noroc, sex, cumpărături, cocaină şi de tot felul de reţete medicale pentru a-şi menţine stilul de viaţă frenetic. Bineînţeles, există şi reversul medaliei. Prăbuşirea resimţită după dispariţia efectelor stimulentelor te face să te simţi şi mai rău decât înainte de a le fi luat. De asemenea, dacă folosim stimulente constant, ajungem să le percepem tot mai puţin efectele dorite, până când nu le mai simţim deloc. Astfel se creează o altă spirală descendentă vicioasă, întrucât cauţi un sentiment care îţi scapă tot mai mult.

Foto 2.11. Ne adaptăm la nivelul de stimulare pe care o folosim pentru a fi funcţionali. Cu timpul, abia mai observăm efectele stimulentelor, de aceea avem nevoie de mai mult. Este foarte uşor să pierdem din vedere măsura în care stimulentele ne alimentează viaţa de zi cu zi.

Mass-media rapidă

Diverse tipuri de imagini şi de informaţii mediatice ne bombardează în lumea modernă. Informaţia ne este servită rapid şi în culori vii, ca să ne putem concentra asupra întregului mesaj fără a ne plictisi sau a ne distrage. În consecinţă, puterea de concentrare a multora dintre noi devine foarte slabă. Ne este greu să ne concentrăm la nevoie, ceea ce duce la rezultate mai slabe în îndeplinirea diverselor sarcini, iar astfel creşte riscul de a deveni deprimaţi, stresaţi, depăşiţi de situaţie. Obţinerea rapidă a lucrurilor are un preţ. Ne pierdem capacitatea de a aştepta şi de a ne concentra asupra a ceea ce vrem.

Lipsa cunoştinţelor despre gestionarea energiei sexuale

Sexul vinde. Toată lumea ştie asta. Prin urmare, o mare parte din mass-media foloseşte stimularea sexuală pentru a vinde produse şi a promova idei care alimentează cultura noastră materialistă. Sexul este unul dintre impulsurile noastre primare. E cea mai bună energie a noastră, cea care poate crea viaţă. Cu toate acestea, majoritatea dintre noi nu ştim cum să ne reglăm energia sexuală sau cum să o împărţim avantajos cu restul sistemelor noastre. Pentru mai multe informaţii despre cum se pot realiza aceste lucruri, citeşte unul dintre volumele dedicate temei de maestrul Mantak Chia, menţionat în bibliografie. Dacă nu ştiu cum să-şi regleze energia sexuală, oamenii sunt vulnerabili la campaniile mediatice care asociază stimularea şi satisfacţia sexuală cu diverse produse de care nu au nevoie, de fapt, pentru a fi fericiţi.

Lipsa cunoştinţelor despre dopamină

Dopamina este un neurotransmiţător care se formează în mod natural în creier, secretat atunci când suntem stimulaţi. Ajută la reglarea dispoziţiei. Totuşi, mulţi nu ştiu că, dacă ne îngăduim prea mult anumite activităţi, în creier se secretă mai multă dopamină decât avem nevoie. Excesele de mâncare, de jocuri de noroc, de sex, de conflicte interpersonale şi de cumpărături sunt exemple de activităţi care pot afecta nivelul de dopamină din creier. În cele din urmă, creierul va vrea mai mult din acea senzaţie plăcută. Dacă oamenii nu sunt conştienţi de această legătură, ar putea crede că nu e nimic rău în a-şi îngădui mai mult şi ar putea căpăta o dependenţă sau o adicţie. În plus, din cauza aceleiaşi lipse de informare, vor tinde să schimbe o dependenţă cu o alta, chiar dacă renunţă la a-şi îngădui prea mult dintr-o activitate care produce dopamină. Dacă nu realizează că alte activităţi au acelaşi efect, riscă să repete iar şi iar aceeaşi problemă. Adesea, cei aflaţi în această situaţie cred în mod eronat că au o personalitate cu tendinţe spre adicţie. Experienţa unui val de emoţie creat de un comportament extrem îi va încuraja pe oameni să trăiască în stil extrem.

Foto 2.12. Dacă nu ştiu cum se poate reduce, creşte şi satura nivelul de dopamină din corp, oamenii sar adesea de la o substanţă sau de la o activitate la alta în căutarea aceleiaşi stări euforice. În imagine, o familie aflată la shopping savurează îngheţată.

Gândirea liniară şi luptele pentru putere

De asemenea, ne putem simţi depăşiţi de situaţie din cauza viziunii noastre despre viaţă. Deşi logica şi raţionalitatea pot juca un rol important în viaţă, de exemplu, în matematică şi în afaceri, uităm cu uşurinţă că interacţiunile dintre indivizi şi mediu sunt guvernate mai degrabă de cicluri. Întrucât fiecare dintre noi poate să aibă o perspectivă unică asupra situaţiilor şi fiecare se poate concentra asupra unui anumit aspect dintr-o situaţie, oricare individ îşi poate forma o opinie unică despre un set de circumstanţe. Prin urmare, e simplu să ne certăm între noi în legătură cu cine are opinia corectă. E adevărat şi că două persoane pot să adopte poziţii opuse faţă de aceeaşi temă, dar să aibă dreptate amândouă.

De pildă, un cuplu se poate certa fiindcă unul dintre parteneri ar merge prea des la bar. Ca să nu complicăm descrierea, să presupunem că persoana acuzată în cazul de faţă este soţul. Soţul s-ar putea plânge că motivul pentru care merge la bar este că are o soţie foarte cicălitoare. La rândul ei, nevasta ar putea susţine că îl cicăleşte fiindcă el frecventează mereu barul. Cine are dreptate? Amândoi, probabil. Totuşi, ei se alimentează negativ reciproc. De fapt, fiecare contribuie la înrăutăţirea situaţiei şi se comportă ca şi cum ar exista un singur răspuns corect şi o singură soluţie, astfel încât fiecare încearcă să-şi învingă partenerul cu propria logică. Situaţia devine o luptă pentru putere pentru a stabili cine are dreptate, când, de fapt, nu greşeşte niciunul. În loc să coopereze pentru a repara legătura dintre ei şi pentru a-şi transforma fricile legate de ceea ce se întâmplă cu relaţia lor, fiecare reacţionează faţă de celălalt de pe o poziţie de autosuficienţă şi intră într-un ciclu vicios, fără ieşire. Pe măsură ce se luptă între ei, reacţiile lor la ce spune şi ce face celălalt devin extreme. În cele din urmă, dacă nu ieşi din această dinamică frustrantă, te vei simţi depăşit de situaţie.

E uşor să declanşezi o astfel de dinamică, dar greu să o înţelegi. Dacă vrei o experienţă similară, dar fără urmări neplăcute, ia o cutie de şerveţele de hârtie şi ţine-o de un capăt. Dă celălalt capăt al cutiei altcuiva. Explică-i că respectiva cutie reprezintă legătura dintre voi doi. Apoi, prefaceţi-vă că aveţi poziţii opuse într-o anumită chestiune. Amândoi aveţi argumente valabile pentru a vă susţine punctul de vedere şi amândurora v-ar plăcea să îl convingeţi pe celălalt să vă accepte viziunea asupra disputei. Pentru a ilustra fizic dorinţa de a vă convinge reciproc, fiecare va trage de cutia cu şerveţele şi va încerca să-l facă pe celălalt să vină spre el. Probabil că, imediat ce celălalt începe să tragă, vei trage şi tu mai tare de capătul tău, ca să nu-ţi pierzi poziţia. În consecinţă, şi celălalt va trage de cutie şi astfel intraţi într-o luptă pentru putere în care amândoi trageţi mai tare decât intenţionaţi la începutul exerciţiului. Nu uitaţi că acum vă bateţi pe o cutie de şerveţele şi că lupta pentru putere nu are o miză reală. E posibil ca la un moment dat cutia să se rupă din cauza tensiunii, ceea ce simbolizează ruperea legăturii dintre voi doi.

Foto 3.1. E uşor să intri în lupte pentru putere, dar adesea greu să le rezolvi paşnic.

De ce s-a întâmplat asta? Pentru că sunteţi oameni răi? Nu. Pentru că aveţi o mare nevoie, nerealistă, de control? Nu. S-a întâmplat pur şi simplu fiindcă amândoi sunteţi oameni. Cu toţii avem capacitatea de a ne concentra asupra unor aspecte diferite ale aceleiaşi chestiuni şi nu ne place să ni se spună cum să le privim. Acest tip de situaţie dificilă se poate manifesta în multe feluri. Oamenii se pot războ pe multe teme: dacă să se certe mai departe sau nu, dacă să se căsătorească sau nu, dacă să-i facă celuilalt reproşuri pe marginea comportamentului său, cine ar trebui să aibă controlul asupra banilor în gospodărie sau dacă ar trebui să facă sex sau nu. Luptele pentru putere pot fi şi interioare. Toţi avem stări contradictorii uneori. Putem întâlni un exemplu de luptă lăuntrică în cazul unei serate dansante pentru adolescenţi. Un tânăr nerăbdător să invite la dans o anumită fată se poate simţi constrâns să nu rişte şi să o invite pe alta de la care are mai multe şanse să primească un răspuns afirmativ.

Cum ieşi dintr-o luptă pentru putere? În cazul disputei legate de cutia cu şerveţele, dacă tragi mai tare, încercând să îl obligi pe celălalt sau partea din tine pe care vrei să o controlezi, probabil că lupta va continua. Dacă laşi cutia din mână – ceea ce în viaţa reală ar însemna să cedezi pur şi simplu în faţa celuilalt sau impulsului contrar din interiorul tău –, există riscul ca celălalt să-şi impună voinţa, iar tu să te retragi simţindu-te învins sau nemulţumit. Frica, mândria şi nevoia de control ne blochează. Acum încearcă să nu mai ţii cutia strâns. De obicei, şi celălalt va slăbi automat strânsoarea. Atunci te poţi relaxa mai mult, la fel şi celălalt, iar în cele din urmă amândoi veţi ţine cutia fără încordare. Cu alte cuvinte, sentimentele sunt esenţiale în interacţiunile umane, şi nu în a stabili cine are dreptate.

Exerciţiul de mai sus funcţionează în cazul unei lupte pentru putere pe o cutie cu şerveţele şi pe o problemă inexistentă, însă cum rezolvi situaţia când între tine şi cineva la a cărui părere ţii există o problemă reală şi personală? Vom trata mai detaliat această provocare când vom prezenta tehnica creată pentru declanşarea şi menţinerea sistemului natural de procesare internă. Deocamdată, să ne relaxăm, admiţând că nu este întotdeauna posibil să deţinem controlul, şi să căutăm căi pe care să acceptăm ideile altora, pe care să găsim punctele asupra cărora opiniile opuse pot cădea de acord şi pe care să facem compromisuri.

În general, mediul în care trăim nu ne specializează în dinamica relaţiilor. Învăţăm majoritatea informaţiilor despre cum să ne descurcăm în viaţă de la părinţi, şcoală şi prieteni, dar probabil că niciunul dintre aceştia nu înţelege cum funcţionează relaţiile interumane dacă nu lucrează în domeniul psihologiei. Dacă nu ştim ce rol joacă ciclurile şi paradoxurile în relaţiile noastre cu alte persoane şi cu natura, probabil ne vom simţi tot mai frustraţi în timp ce facem eforturi să cucerim firescul în loc să-l luăm ca atare. Ce faci, de pildă, dacă vrei să creezi o conexiune cu cineva pe o temă sensibilă şi, cu cât încerci să abordezi persoana respectivă în legătură cu tema, cu atât te respinge?

Gândirea în alb şi negru

Poate din cauză că, în general, simţim nevoia de a da răspunsul corect la şcoală şi la serviciu şi fiindcă părinţii ne-au învăţat cum „trebuie” să procedezi, ne formăm frecvent viziuni în alb şi negru asupra lumii. Din acest motiv, avem impresia că şi pentru rezolvarea problemelor interpersonale există tot o singură cale, ceea ce, bineînţeles, nu este adevărat. Acest tip de gândire poate duce la intoleranţă, la a-i judeca pe alţii şi chiar la bigotism. De asemenea, ne predispune la dezamăgire şi chiar la sentimentul că suntem depăşiţi de situaţie, deoarece ne vom confrunta inevitabil cu situaţii care ne vor pune sub semnul întrebării viziunea preconcepută asupra realităţii. Confruntarea cu excepţii de la regulă în viaţă şi cu zonele gri ale problemelor noastre poate fi o oportunitate de a evolua, însă numai dacă suntem dispuşi să acceptăm că ele pot exista.

Foto 3.2. Doar fiindcă un individ vede o situaţie în alb şi negru nu înseamnă că aşa o vor vedea toţi ceilalţi implicaţi.

De fapt, viaţa abundă în nuanţe şi paradoxuri, aşa cum arată Lao Zi în capitolul 2 din Tao te qing:

> Pe Pământ toţi ştiu că frumosul este frumos, astfel devine el urât! Toţi ştiu că bunul este bun: iată cum devine el potrivnicul său!
> Prin urmare, fiinţa şi nefiinţa se nasc una pe cealaltă, ceea ce este anevoios şi ceea ce este lesnicios se alcătuiesc reciproc, ceea ce este lung şi ceea ce este scurt se desluşesc unul prin celălalt, ceea ce este sus şi ceea ce este jos se sprijină unul pe celălalt, sunetele creează laolaltă muzica, iar ceea ce se găseşte înainte şi ceea ce se află înapoi îşi fac loc unul altuia.
> De aceea Omul Sfânt înfăptuieşte lucrările ce aparţin non-acţiunii şi făureşte învăţătura dată fără vorbe. „Cele zece mii de fiinţe şi lucruri" propăşesc, iar el nu se pune în calea lor; le naşte, însă nu caută să le stăpânească; le creează, însă nu atârnă de ele; îşi desăvârşeşte lucrarea, însă nu o ia în stăpânire: numai şi numai pentru că nu o ia în stăpânire, meritul său rămâne cu el[1].

În afară de tratatul Tao te qing sau de volume ca The Dance of Deception de Harriet Goldhor Lerner, găsim mai rar ghiduri utile despre paradoxuri şi cicluri.

Gândirea negativă

Suntem influenţaţi din multe direcţii – şcoala, părinţii, familia, prietenii şi mass-media – să identificăm problemele şi apoi să le căutăm cele mai eficiente soluţii. Identificarea problemelor devine o obişnuinţă şi poate duce la tendinţa de a ne concentra asupra aspectelor negative. Axarea pe aspectele negative poate crea depresie, anxietate şi sentimentul că suntem depăşiţi de situaţie, privându-ne de ocazia de a le vedea şi de a le experimenta pe cele pozitive.

Foto 3.3. Gândirea negativă ne poate priva de ocazia de a vedea şi de a experimenta partea pozitivă a situaţiilor din viaţa noastră.

Îi apreciem pe descurcăreţi, dar nu şi pe înţelepţi

În societatea modernă, mulţi oameni măsoară succesul în funcţie de banii şi de bunurile dobândite. Pentru multe grupuri, nu prea contează cum şi-au obţinut indivizii posesiile, atât timp cât le au. Înţelepciunea necesară pentru a trăi cu mai puţin şi pentru a fi recunoscători, pentru a le ierta celorlalţi greşelile faţă de noi şi pentru a acţiona astfel încât să ocrotim planeta nu este la fel de apreciată. Înţelepciunea spirituală nu există automat în noi. Trebuie să fie cultivată. Cei care nu trăiesc în circumstanţe ce încurajează creşterea spirituală au mai multe şanse să intre în goana după avere şi să fie vulnerabili la stresul şi la dezamăgirea inerente acesteia.

Foto 3.4. Adesea, ceea ce crezi că îţi trebuie ca să fii fericit şi ceea ce-ţi aduce fericirea sunt de fapt două lucruri foarte diferite.

După cum spune Lao Zi în capitolul 3:

> Dacă nu-i vom mai venera pe cei vrednici şi virtuoşi, îi vom face pe oameni să nu mai lupte pentru mărire.
> Dacă nu vom mai preţui obiectele greu de căpătat, îi vom face pe oameni să nu se mai dedea tâlhăriei; dacă nu vom lăsa vederii obiecte la care se poate râvni, vom face ca sufletele oamenilor să nu mai fie tulburate[2].

Confuzia dintre minte şi creier

De multe ori, în societatea modernă presupunem că mintea şi creierul sunt unul şi acelaşi lucru. Totuşi, numeroase practici antice şi chiar studiile moderne recunosc că mintea înseamnă mai mult decât creierul. Mintea reprezintă câmpul energetic al conştientului la care avem acces. Mintea şi trupul sunt legate între ele şi se pot influenţa reciproc. De asemenea, mintea se poate racorda la cunoaşterea universală. Carl Jung, unul dintre părinţii psihologiei moderne, a numit această cunoaştere universală „inconştient colectiv”. Când nu sunt conştienţi de conexiunea dintre propria minte şi cunoaşterea universală, oamenii îşi subapreciază sau îşi ignoră cunoaşterea intuitivă şi reacţionează în viaţă bazându-se exclusiv pe „fapte”, lucrurile pe care le pot percepe cu cele cinci organe de simţ. Acest fapt le limitează capacitatea de a trăi în armonie cu mediul înconjurător. Ei nu-şi dau seama că nu sunt eficienţi decât atunci când au dovezi evidente, astfel încât recunosc cu greu că trebuie să-şi schimbe abordarea.

Nu ne folosim îndeajuns ce de-al doilea creier

În lumea modernă, majoritatea dintre noi ne folosim mult creierul. Ne folosim creierul ca să ne amintim listele cu „lucruri de bifat” şi să ne dăm seama ce e de făcut în toate situaţiile pe care viaţa ni le scoate dinainte. Termenul burnout este utilizat frecvent în societatea modernă; înseamnă că stresul de zi cu zi ne-a obosit prea mult, fizic şi mental, pentru a ne îndeplini îndatoririle obişnuite. În prezent, ştim că activitatea creierului poate consuma până la 80% din energia corpului nostru.

Foto 3.5. „Nu pricep ce-i atât de grav în a bea şi apoi a te urca la volan. Am făcut-o de multe ori şi n-am avut niciun accident.”
Nu crede tot ce gândeşti.

Când ne zbatem să rezolvăm cât mai bine o situaţie, mulţi prieteni şi rude ne sugerează „să ne ascultăm instinctul”. În sistemul Tao Universal subliniem importanţa lucrului cu dan-tien-ul inferior, un centru energetic major situat la aproximativ două degete sub ombilic şi la trei degete în interiorul corpului. Studiile medicale occidentale curente confirmă că zona inferioară a abdomenului poate într-adevăr să funcţioneze ca un al doilea creier. Aparent, cortexul nostru cerebral este capabil să gândească, motiv pentru care îndeplineşte mai bine sarcini precum memorarea unor liste şi rezolvarea ecuaţiilor matematice. Acesta are tendinţa de a împărţi realitatea în bucăţi pentru a o înţelege.

Al doilea creier al nostru pare capabil să gândească, să simtă şi să intuiască; prin urmare, ar fi mai apt să aleagă modul în care reacţionăm la dificultăţile vieţii. Al doilea creier poate accepta realitatea fără a trebui să o divizeze. Concentrarea asupra celui de-al doilea creier canalizează energie în acest centru energetic major, reducând probabilitatea să ajungem în burnout. De asemenea, ne orientează atenţia şi energia spre centrul corpului, iar astfel ne simţim siguri şi echilibraţi. Pe de altă parte, ignorarea instinctului poate duce la confuzie şi la rezultate mai puţin satisfăcătoare. (Mai multe informaţii despre cel de-al doilea creier şi despre cum să lucrăm cu energia lui se găsesc în volumul Tan Tien Chi Kung de Mantak Chia.)

Foto 3.6. „Iar l-am prins înşelându-mă. Instinctul îmi zice să-i dau papucii, dar raţiunea îmi zice că nu voi găsi niciodată un bărbat perfect, mai ales la vârsta mea.” Ignorarea instinctului poate duce la confuzie şi la rezultate nesatisfăcătoare.

Procesele din subconştient ne pot distrage de la realitate

Cum funcţionăm

Stările noastre emoţionale sunt oarecum guvernate de inerţie. Odată ce ne-am pus în mişcare, tindem să o ţinem în aceeaşi direcţie. De exemplu, cei mai mulţi dintre noi au observat că, dacă începem să gândim negativ, de obicei găsim şi alte lucruri despre care să gândim negativ. În cele din urmă, acest tip de gândire creează o stare negativă. Dacă nu putem opri această tendinţă, negativitatea devine un mod de a privi lumea şi poate duce la furie, la depresie şi la resentimente. Repetiţia consolidează conexiunea dintre idei, stări şi experienţe. Imaginează-ţi-o asemenea unor fire întinse pe rând între o stare şi un gând negativ sau o activitate nesănătoasă care se repetă. Mănunchiurile mai groase sunt conexiunile stabilite mai frecvent.

Negarea

Mulţi dintre noi am fost educaţi să credem că nu e în regulă să avem sentimente negative sau că ele sunt un semn de slăbiciune. De aceea, ne reprimăm sentimentele şi încercăm să le ignorăm, sperând că vor dispărea. Însă ele nu dispar. Se acumulează înăuntrul nostru, creând frică, griji şi resentimente. Dacă nu ne dăm seama sau dacă uităm că nimic şi nimeni nu e perfect, tindem să ne ruşinăm de propriile sentimente negative şi încercăm să le ascundem. În public pretindem că ne simţim bine, dar ne întrebăm de ce nu suntem şi noi „normali”, aşa cum par să fie toţi ceilalţi.

Foto 3.7. Repetarea gândurilor şi deprinderilor nesănătoase le consolidează înăuntrul nostru. Cu timpul, ele pot deveni reacţii automate pe care nu le mai putem controla.

Negarea este de fapt un proces natural care ne ajută să controlăm cantitatea de informaţii primite simultan despre mediul nostru. Dacă nu ne simţim bine, e firesc să ne îndreptăm atenţia spre exterior. Sistemul nostru de negare acţionează ca o cutie de siguranţe. Cu cât primim informaţii pe care nu vrem să le acceptăm, cu atât se sting luminile. Sperăm că, atunci când dăm de necaz, ne vom trezi la realitate, însă frecvent se întâmplă exact invers. Adesea, cei dragi vor să te tragă de mânecă atunci când aluneci la vale într-o astfel de spirală, dar asta nu ar face decât să te apese şi mai mult şi să alimenteze spirala.

Foto 3.8. „Soţia mea a spus că mă părăseşte dacă nu petrec mai mult timp acasă. Sunt sigur că e doar obosită. Şi prima mea soţie voia la fel de mult când era obosită." Dacă nu suntem pregătiţi să vedem adevărul situaţiilor în care ne aflăm, probabil că vom avea parte de surprize neplăcute mai târziu.

În societatea de azi se dezvoltă şi ceva ce s-ar putea numi „negarea New Age". Aceasta presupune că individul acceptă numai aspectele pozitive ale vieţii sau pretinde că totul merge ca pe roate de teamă că acceptarea a ceva negativ va atrage energie şi rezultate negative. Această abordare poate crea rezultate ironice. Întrucât încearcă să vadă totul într-o lumină pozitivă, omenii nu sunt pregătiţi pentru lucrurile negative care se petrec inevitabil sau nu reacţionează eficient la ele. Negarea care-şi depăşeşte scopul firesc, de a ne feri de efectele dăunătoare ale întâmplărilor vieţii, va duce în cele din urmă la tipul de rezultate negative pe care încercăm de fapt să le evităm.

Nu vizualizăm suficient

Multă lume nu-şi dă seama că multe dintre lucrurile la care ne gândim trebuie transpuse în imagini înainte de a le putea înţelege la un nivel mai profund. O altă informaţie conexă pe care mulţi nu o au este că trupul nostru reacţionează la ceea ce vizualizăm ca şi cum lucrul respectiv ar fi real, indiferent dacă imaginile din mintea noastră corespund sau nu realităţii. Vrei dovezi? Imaginează-ţi un lac superb într-o zi însorită şi caldă. Apa reflectă razele soarelui. Auzi sunetele şi simţi miresmele naturii care te înconjoară. Simţi aerul şi razele soarelui pe trupul tău. Cum te simţi? Observă că n-a trebuit să pleci nicăieri ca să trăieşti starea de relaxare şi de mulţumire.

Când nu înţeleg cum funcţionează vizualizarea, oamenii o întrebuinţează adesea în moduri care de fapt le agravează problemele în loc să le amelioreze. De exemplu, mulţi oameni îşi spun să se „oprească" ori să evite să facă ceva – să nu mai consume alcool, droguri ilegale, să nu mai joace jocuri de noroc sau să nu mai facă exces de orice altceva. Atunci când gândeşti astfel, zonele mai profunde ale minţii realizează o imagine a activităţii pe care vrei să o eviţi sau să nu o mai faci. Apoi elimină imaginea respectivă pentru a finaliza comanda „stop" sau „nu face". Această modalitate de a transmite mesajul este derutantă şi declanşează tocmai lucrul nedorit, înainte ca intenţia completă a mesajului să fie comunicată. Repetarea constantă a acestei greşeli poate favoriza gândirea obsesivă sau o poate chiar declanşa.

Talentul de a vizualiza creează provocări

Dislexia este o problemă mult mai răspândită decât îşi închipuie multă lume. Majoritatea oamenilor ştiu că dislexicii întâmpină adesea probleme în a învăţa să citească în copilărie. Mulţi cred că există un singur tip de dislexie, cel care te face să încurci literele când scrii. Însă există numeroase tipuri de dislexie. Ronald Davis, autorul volumului The Gift of Dyslexia, arată că persoanele care suferă de dislexie au o capacitate de vizualizare puternică. Cum anumite cuvinte, de pildă, „un", „o" şi „nişte", nu au traduceri vizuale, ele îi blochează pe dislexici. Acest tip de dificultate poate crea frustrare pe tot parcursul vieţii pentru o persoană care nu înţelege de ce se chinuieşte şi cum să evite problema. Dacă aceste frustrări şi dezamăgiri nu sunt rezolvate, ele se pot acumula în interior într-atât încât povara lor emoţională devine copleşitoare.

Foto 3.9. Substanţele şi activităţile ce dau dependenţă sunt utile uneori persoanelor care au probleme de concentrare, însă, bineînţeles, pot crea ulterior probleme şi mai grave.

Aparent, unele substanţe şi activităţi ce dau dependenţă, de exemplu cocaina şi jocurile de noroc, le creează dislexicilor impresia că se concentrează mai bine. Senzaţia că te concentrezi mai bine poate întări ideea de a continua să recurgi la ele.

Înţelegerea greşită a transei

Din păcate, reprezentările transei în filme, în show-uri de televiziune şi în spectacole cu hipnoză pe scenă lasă publicului impresii false despre transă şi utilitatea sa. În general, lumea crede că se intră greu în transă şi că numai specialiştii în domeniu o pot face. Totuşi, oricine poate intra într-o stare de transă. De asemenea, se zice şi că hipnotizatorii au o putere nelimitată asupra subiecţilor lor. În realitate, orice hipnoză este autohipnoză, deci hipnotizatorul doar ghidează subiectul în procesul de atingere a unei stări de transă. Intri în transă atunci când nivelurile conştiente şi cele inconştiente ale conştiinţei se amestecă, nu numai atunci când le accesezi pe cele inconştiente. Întrucât mintea conştientă este în continuare accesibilă, nu vei face lucruri cărora li te opui, chiar dacă eşti în transă.

Foto 3.10. Dacă nu înţelegem cât de vulnerabili suntem când mintea ia o pauză, putem deveni vulnerabili la anumite activităţi ce dau dependenţă.

Unii cred că nu pot intra în transă deoarece sunt prea inteligenţi ori au o voinţă prea puternică, dar, de fapt, toţi intrăm în transă în fiecare zi. Un exemplu banal este momentul când suntem pe cale să adormim. Adeseori, în clipa respectivă ştim că aproape am adormit. Corpul nostru e relaxat şi încălzit, nu ne vine să ne mişcăm prea mult, iar mintea trece de la gândurile conştiente la un fel de flux al conştiinţei în vis. Aceasta este transa. Conştientul şi subconştientul se întrepătrund. Un alt exemplu banal este atunci când mergem undeva pe jos sau cu maşina, dar ne dăm seama că nu ne putem aminti tot ce am făcut pentru a ajunge acolo, fiindcă pe drum mintea noastră s-a dus spre altceva.

De fapt, este uşor să intri în transă. Conştientul nostru e făcut în aşa fel încât nu poate prelua decât între şapte şi nouă informaţii deodată. Dacă încercăm să-l încărcăm cu mai mult, de obicei mintea visătoare iese la suprafaţă şi atunci intrăm în transă. Să ne gândim la un copil pe care cantitatea de informaţii primite într-o oră de curs la şcoală îl copleşeşte. În cele din urmă, copilul începe să viseze cu ochii deschişi şi să se uite pe fereastră. Acum ne dăm seama cât de uşor pot intra oamenii în transă, având în vedere cantitatea de informaţii oferită de stilul nostru modern de viaţă. Odată intraţi în transă, suntem mai influenţabili, deci scade capacitatea noastră de a analiza critic mesajele primite de la alte persoane şi din mass-media. Dacă nu ştim cum să utilizăm transa pentru a ne antrena zonele mai profunde ale minţii să combată influenţele nedorite ori să ne propulseze spre obiectivele noastre, creşte probabilitatea să întâmpinăm dificultăţi când vrem să preluăm controlul asupra propriei vieţi într-un sens sănătos şi productiv.

Sănătate versus narcisism

În capitolul 24, Lao Zi ne aminteşte:

> Cel înălţat pe vârfuri nu va sta ferm, cel care calcă cu paşi mari nu va înainta.
> Cel care se scoate pe sine la iveală nu va fi cunoscut; cel ce socoate că are vreun merit nu va fi lăudat; cel ce socoate că este-nsemnat nu va dăinui.
> Dinaintea lui Tao, acestea sunt ca rămăşiţele de hrană, ori ca negii... Iată de ce omul înzestrat cu Tao se ţine departe[3].

Totuşi, pentru a nu fi acuzaţi că sunt egoişti sau că „umblă cu nasul pe sus”, mulţi dintre noi s-au obişnuit să nu-şi recunoască deschis cele mai bune calităţi sau realizări. Acest obicei ne poate face să ne minimalizăm sau să ne ignorăm automat momentele de glorie şi să respingem subtil sau direct laudele şi complimentele din partea celor din jur. Astfel, stima noastră de sine poate să scadă, iar probabilitatea de a recurge la o altă sursă exterioară care să ne ajute să ne simţim bine poate să crească. Multe dintre lucrurile pe care le cumpărăm şi pe care le facem vor deveni plictisitoare şi neplăcute cu timpul. Din acest motiv, am putea căuta încontinuu ceva nou care să ne facă să ne simţim bine în loc să ne bucurăm pur şi simplu că trăim şi să ne sărbătorim succesele.

Foto 3.11. Dacă nu ne putem îngădui să ne simţim bine în propria piele, tindem să adăugăm surse externe de amuzament şi de distracţie.

Foto 3.12. „Cum ai obţinut mărirea de salariu?" Celălalt spune: „I-am explicat la nesfârşit că sunt cel mai bun angajat din birou, până m-a crezut".

În lumea noastră competitivă şi materialistă, persoanele care se pricep să se laude au un avantaj. Persoanele modeste nu se pricep la fel de bine în acest sens. Narcisismul este răsplătit şi, în consecinţă, lăudabil. Narcisismul presupune un simţ supradezvoltat al sinelui, care maschează o nesiguranţă de fond. Avantajele materiale îi pot distrage pe narcisişti de la durerea emoţională care altminteri i-ar împinge să-şi reechilibreze eul.

Problema perfecţionismului

Mulţi oameni nu-şi dau seama că abordarea lor faţă de viaţă este una perfecţionistă. Ei cred că un perfecţionist este cel care face totul perfect. Acesta nu este un perfecţionist, ci o persoană perfectă. Perfecţionismul înseamnă să nu-ţi îngădui să te simţi satisfăcut şi nici să-ţi asumi meritul pentru propriile realizări până când nu le-ai dus la bun sfârşit sau nu le-ai desăvârşit.

Mulţi oameni sunt educaţi să creadă că cel mai bun mod de a se motiva pentru a-şi atinge obiectivele constă în a-şi da toată silinţa şi în a nu se simţi mulţumiţi până nu ating perfecţiunea într-un anumit domeniu. Aparent, această convingere e sănătoasă, dar nu-ţi permite să te bucuri de etapele parcurse pentru atingerea obiectivului şi nici să-ţi asumi meritul dacă nu se poate să-ţi realizezi scopul decât parţial. Perfecţionismul poate fi o capcană. Cei care adoptă o astfel de abordare vor constata inevitabil că nu pot face lucrurile perfect întotdeauna. Atunci, se află în pericolul de a-şi dezvolta o stimă de sine scăzută sau chiar ura faţă de sine, fapt care creşte probabilitatea ca în cele din urmă să cadă în depresie.

Foto 3.13. Tatăl ei zice: „Poate că la anul te descurci mai bine”. Ea îşi spune: „Niciodată nu voi fi suficient de bună”.

De asemenea, perfecţionismul te poate face să te simţi imperfect sau nevrednic în adâncul sufletului, chiar dacă ceilalţi consideră că ţi-ai pus ordine în gânduri; creşte nivelul de anxietate, pe care s-ar putea nici să nu-l observi. Din acest motiv, poţi fi critic faţă de alţii şi faţă de tine însuţi, deoarece cauţi cauza pentru care nu te simţi cum trebuie, indiferent cât ai încerca. Orientarea spre exterior te poate împiedica să-ţi conştientizezi sentimentele de ruşine adânc înrădăcinate. Din cauza ruşinii e dificil să fii responsabil, să înveţi lecţii din experienţele trăite.

Când ruşinea se combină cu perfecţionismul, simţi că se dă o luptă pentru putere între dorinţa de a fi perfect şi dorinţa de a nu schimba nimic. Tensiunea dintre aceste două extreme îţi poate bloca progresul. Te temi că vei greşi şi că nu eşti perfect. În plus, observi că nu faci progrese sau că nu-ţi iese perfect. Adesea, părerile negative pe care ţi le-ai format despre tine se consolidează astfel.

Înţeleptul descris de Lao Zi în capitolul 73 ne oferă un exemplu mai chibzuit:

> A şti, arătându-te neştiutor, înseamnă a fi desăvârşit. A nu şti, socotindu-te ştiutor, înseamnă a fi suferind. Numai şi numai socotind suferinţa drept un neajuns, astfel vei fi ferit de suferinţă. Omul Sfânt nu este suferind, căci el socoate suferinţa drept neajuns, iată de ce nu este suferind[4].

Trauma şi adicţia nu lasă oamenii „să trăiască bine”

Trauma experienţelor prea greu de acceptat

Ţi s-au întâmplat anumite lucruri în trecut care te supără şi acum, ceea ce te deranjează? Anumite energii sunt prea întunecate şi prea grele pentru a se risipi uşor. Uneori în viaţă trecem prin experienţe prea dure, prea bizare sau prea teribile pentru a le digera uşor. Anumite întâmplări din viaţă sunt „prea greu de înghiţit”, cum se zice. Din moment ce mulţi dintre noi nu ştiu nici măcar cum să-şi proceseze emoţiile eficient şi complet, este posibil şi ca acestea să se acumuleze de-a lungul timpului, creând o povară emoţională întunecată, grea, toxică, prea mare pentru a fi procesată, chiar dacă, iniţial, evenimentele acumulate nu erau extreme. E cert însă că, la un moment dat, în interior se blochează prea multă energie întunecată şi grea, suprasolicitându-ne sistemele naturale de procesare a emoţiilor.

Când ne simţim depăşiţi de situaţie, în interiorul nostru are loc o polarizare. Separăm automat incidentul de imaginea de sine. Facem distincţie între „eu” şi „nu eu”. Totuşi, în adâncul sufletului ne întrebăm sau credem adesea că, dacă am fi fost mai buni, problema nu ar fi apărut. Aparent, ne rămâne fie să facem în continuare diferenţierea şi să ne considerăm victime, cu învinovăţirea sau ruşinea de rigoare, fie să recunoaştem că problema a apărut pentru că avem anumite neajunsuri ca oameni. Niciuna dintre opţiuni nu este tentantă, de aceea, în multe cazuri, oscilăm între cele două fără să ne putem hotărî, crezând uneori că problema ne reflectă pe noi ca oameni, iar alteori considerându-ne victime. Nu mai reuşim să scăpăm de această dilemă fiindcă nu pare să existe un mod viabil de a o rezolva. Tot acest proces se derulează dincolo de conştientul nostru. Experienţa nedigerată ocupă spaţiu energetic în interior.

Foto 4.1. Unele experienţe sunt atât de dureroase şi de umilitoare, încât nu suntem în stare să le acceptăm.

Foto 4.2. Sentimentele toxice legate de evenimentele sfâşietoare din trecut pot deveni energie întunecată, grea în noi şi în jurul nostru.

De exemplu, în multe cazuri, copiii abuzaţi sexual se consideră răi sau murdari. Dacă persoanele importante pentru ei validează cu compasiune suferinţa provocată de abuz, îi vor ajuta să o proceseze şi să se considere „normali”. Pe de altă parte, dacă prietenii sau rudele importante le spun că nu s-a întâmplat sau că nu aşa s-a întâmplat, ori îi învinovăţesc, probabil că aceşti copii se vor simţi şi mai rău.

Ce ne spune apa

Masaru Emoto este un cercetător japonez celebru pentru cărţile lui despre mesajele apei. El a expus sistematic molecule de apă la înregistrări audio ale unor fraze fie pozitive, fie negative, apoi a fotografiat ce se întâmplă cu acestea. Schimbările petrecute în moleculele de apă sunt spectaculoase. Cercetările lui sugerează că ceea ce gândim despre noi înşine şi despre viaţă în general are un efect profund asupra funcţionării noastre la nivel molecular.

Foto 4.3. Corpul uman este alcătuit în principal din apă. Moleculele noastre de apă sunt afectate în mare măsură de ceea ce gândim despre noi înşine şi de felul cum vorbim cu noi înşine.

Polarităţi şi comparaţii

Pentru a înţelege cum procesăm experienţele şi cum se blochează în noi experienţele toxice sau care ne covârşesc, trebuie să introducem un concept nou – polarităţile. În taoism ele sunt exprimate prin yin şi yang, care se referă la dualitatea modului în care trăim realitatea. Percepem viaţa ca fiind alcătuită din diverse perechi de elemente opuse, de exemplu negru şi alb, pozitiv şi negativ, dur şi moale. Taoismul ne învaţă că ambele aspecte ale vieţii sunt inerente existenţei noastre. Avem nevoie de partea neagră pentru a aprecia şi a înţelege partea albă. Totuşi, puţini oameni au perspectiva utilă din Tao te qing, capitolul 28:

> Dacă vei cunoaşte tăria, păzind însă blândeţea, vei fi precum e valea pentru cele aflate sub Cer. Fiind vale pentru semeni, virtuţile veşnice ale lui Tao nu te vor părăsi şi te vei înapoia la pruncie.
> De vei cunoaşte partea-i albă, păzindu-i însă partea neagră, vei fi o pildă pentru cei aflaţi sub Cer. Fiind pildă pentru semeni, virtuţile veşnice ale lui Tao vor fi fără păcat, iar tu te vei înapoia la Unitate.
> De vei cunoaşte măreţia-i, păzindu-i însă umilinţa, vei fi precum e valea pentru cele aflate sub Cer. Fiind vale pentru semeni, virtuţile veşnice ale lui Tao vor fi atunci îndestulate şi te vei înapoia la începuturi.
> Când buşteanul este despicat, el se preschimbă-n lucruri; când Omul Sfânt este numit dregător, el devine mai-mare peste semeni. Astfel, domnia va fi desăvârşită, fără dezbinare[1].

Facem comparaţii pentru a înţelege lumea care ne înconjoară. Făcând comparaţii între trecutul şi prezentul nostru, între prezent şi viitor, între lumea ideală şi realitate, între sinele ideal şi cel concret, precum şi între toate celelalte experienţe, suntem capabili să găsim asemănări şi deosebiri. În timp ce oscilăm inconştient, asemenea unui pendul între cele două elemente, ne dăm seama prin ce se aseamănă şi prin ce se deosebesc, până când le percepem ca pe un nou concept ce poate fi comparat cu o nouă experienţă.

În paranteză fie spus, acest concept ne poate ajuta să înţelegem de ce, deşi există peste două sute de abordări psihoterapeutice recunoscute formal, numeroase cercetări au constatat că ele sunt, practic, la fel de eficiente. Conceptul de polarităţi poate sugera că fiecare dintre aceste abordări tratează, în mod conştient sau nu, o polaritate diferită. De pildă, se poate ca psihanaliza să se ocupe de polaritatea trecut-prezent, pe când terapia cognitiv-comportamentală să se axeze mai mult pe polaritatea gânduri-sentimente.

Polarităţile se formează între cunoştinţele pe care le avem deja şi experienţele noi. Tendinţa noastră naturală este de a încerca să explorăm noua experienţă până rezonează cu cunoştinţele existente. De exemplu, se întâmplă frecvent ca, atunci când ne facem o nouă cunoştinţă, să remarcăm prin ce ne deosebim de aceasta. Cu timpul, totuşi, pe măsură ce cunoaştem persoana respectivă, descoperim tot mai multe asemănări, până când „tu” şi „eu” arată mai mult ca un „noi”. Apoi, „noi” poate fi comparat cu persoane pe care le cunoaştem ulterior.

Simptomele unui bagaj emoţional prea mare

Când te simţi depăşit de ceva ce ţi s-a întâmplat ţie însuţi sau în jurul tău, ţi se modifică perspectiva asupra vieţii. De asemenea, se pare că tot atunci ţi se deschid alte niveluri de conştiinţă, dar adesea nu ştii cum să controlezi această conştiinţă. Eşti mai conştient de cât de fragilă este viaţa şi uneori poţi stabili cu alţii legături mai profunde decât cele realizate de majoritatea oamenilor. Acesta poate fi un adevărat dar, odată ce înveţi să îl accepţi şi să lucrezi cu el. Până atunci însă, te face să te simţi şi mai afectat de ce se întâmplă în jurul tău.

Persoanele care duc poveri emoţionale grele le simt greutatea. Adeseori se simt fragile, slabe şi excesiv de sensibile, oscilând între depresie şi anxietate în timp ce se zbat să se menţină în stare de funcţionare în viaţa de zi cu zi. La fel ca în cazul unei greutăţi fizice mari, în cele din urmă, oamenii se prăbuşesc sub greutatea energiei emoţionale. Chiar dacă mai târziu se vor reface, se pot simţi în continuare anxioşi deoarece ştiu că se pot prăbuşi din nou. Povara trecutului continuă să îi apese. Nu e vina lor. Nu au un defect şi nici nu sunt „bunuri cu defecte”. Pur şi simplu, simt efectele fireşti ale sentimentului că sunt depăşiţi de viaţă, iar costul emoţional al experienţelor lor a ajuns atât de semnificativ, încât a devenit fizic. Imaterialul a devenit material.

Foto 4.4. Sentimentele neclarificate ne supraîncarcă şi ne blochează sistemul de procesare emoţională.

Dacă acumulăm prea multe toxine, capacitatea noastră de a le transforma sau de a le elimina nu va mai funcţiona. Ajungem asemenea unui motor cu carburatorul înfundat sau asemenea unui râu îndiguit. În cele din urmă, ceea ce se petrece în interior devine insuportabil. Dacă nu ştim cum să facem faţă în alt mod situaţiei, începem să ne îndepărtăm atenţia de la propriul corp şi să ne concentrăm mai mult asupra gândurilor. Pierdem legătura cu ce se întâmplă în interiorul nostru şi recurgem tot mai mult la suprimarea şi la negarea emoţiilor şi durerii fizice pentru a ne gestiona lumea interioară.

Interacţiunea dintre traumă şi dependenţă

Spirala coboară tot mai adânc

De fiecare dată când o persoană care a suferit o experienţă traumatizantă trăieşte noi experienţe asemănătoare, energia negativă pare să se adauge în plan emoţional şi energetic la experienţa iniţială, creând un bagaj mai întunecat şi mai împovărător. Dacă acest lucru se întâmplă suficient de frecvent, persoana respectivă se va simţi apăsată emoţional, fizic şi spiritual. Astfel, poate ajunge la depresie clinică şi la tulburări de anxietate.

Dacă nu ştii sau nu înveţi cum să echilibrezi energia respectivă şi dacă descoperi o substanţă sau o activitate care dă dependenţă, ce pare să îţi înlăture temporar simptomele şi să te distragă de la amintirea incidentelor, atunci devii vulnerabil la a dezvolta şi o adicţie. Unii indivizi se îndreaptă spre stimulente ca jocurile de noroc, nicotina, cafeaua sau cocaina, pe când alţii preferă „sedative” ca alcoolul, analgezicele eliberate cu reţetă sau heroina. Efectul înlăturării subite a simptomelor face o impresie puternică asupra noastră. Este foarte convingător. Totuşi, e asemenea unui cal troian: la început soluţia pare grozavă, însă după dispariţia efectului cauzează mai multe probleme decât existau iniţial. Energia întunecată solicită întregul sistem energetic şi oamenii devin treptat tot mai obosiţi. Apoi creşte probabilitatea să se orienteze spre mai multe soluţii rapide.

Cu cât apelezi la ceva care dă dependenţă, cu atât creşte probabilitatea să alegi alte asemenea activităţi pentru a-ţi îmbunătăţi starea sufletească atunci când oboseşti şi te prăbuşeşti. Să ne gândim la exemplul extrem al oamenilor străzii. Adeseori îi vedem bând cafea, fumând şi mâncând fast-food. Oamenii sunt buni în esenţa lor dacă sunt sănătoşi şi curaţi, dar manifestă tot mai multe comportamente din sfera adicţiilor pe măsură ce sistemul lor energetic devine toxic.

Foto 4.5. O dependenţă se naşte dintr-un sistem toxic şi epuizat, ce are nevoie de tot mai multă stimulare pentru a se menţine în stare de funcţionare.

Dependenţa secătuieşte corpul

Ne naştem cu o cantitate limitată de energie. Jumătate din energia noastră e pusă deoparte ca energie cotidiană. Rinichii stochează 25% din energia noastră necesară vieţii. Restul de 25% este stocat în organele sexuale. Când eşti împovărat de emoţii şi de experienţe neprocesate, apoi foloseşti ceva ce dă dependenţă pentru a face faţă poverii, organele tale interne se dezechilibrează şi slăbesc. Corpul reacţionează la prezenţa substanţei ce dă dependenţă sau la efectele unei astfel de activităţi ca la o otravă şi emite un fel de cod galben de alertă care activează glandele suprarenale. Acesta induce în eroare corpul să creeze o reacţie de tip „luptă sau fugi”. Apoi, glandele suprarenale transmit rinichilor mesajul să producă mai multă energie. Pe moment, te simţi foarte bine, însă după ce această senzaţie dispare, te simţi epuizat.

Dacă nu ştii cum să-ţi recapeţi energia într-un mod sănătos ori dacă acest tipar s-a înrădăcinat prea adânc, vei reveni la substanţa sau la activitatea ce dă dependenţă. Acest ciclu te secătuieşte tot mai mult. Energia sexuală este prima care se epuizează. Apoi, după ce organele sexuale sunt secătuite de qi, energia este atrasă din rinichi. Când rinichii secătuiesc la rândul lor, energia va fi drenată din creier. Atunci îţi va fi greu să gândeşti limpede, ceea ce creşte probabilitatea să faci alegeri nesănătoase. Iată de ce atâtea celebrităţi din showbiz mor de tinere. Le aclamăm şi le sărbătorim când consumă enorm de multă energie pentru a ne distra. Totuşi, ele nu-şi pot menţine la nesfârşit un asemenea nivel de energie şi recurg inevitabil la stimulente artificiale pentru a da acelaşi randament energetic. Apoi, le pasc aceleaşi primejdii care pândesc pe toată lumea. Cum spune Lao Zi în capitolul 44:

> Ce este mai aproape, tu însuţi sau mărirea? Ce e mai însemnat, tu însuţi sau câştigul? Ce e mai demn de a îngrijora, a pierde sau a căpăta?
> Prin urmare, precupeţind peste măsură, vei îndura mari pierderi, negreşit; agonisind neîntrerupt, vei pierde, negreşit, la fel de mult.
> Dacă vei şti când este-ndeajuns, nu vei cunoaşte înjosirea; dacă vei şti când se cuvine să-ncetezi, primejdia te va ocoli – astfel vei vieţui îndelung[2].

Când în rinichi nu mai este energie, celelalte organe sunt atrase în ciclul distrugător până când toate se dezechilibrează şi se umplu de toxine. În această fază apar toate emoţiile şi stările negative produse de fiecare organ: graba, nerăbdarea, ura şi cruzimea din inimă; gândirea negativă, gândirea în exces şi îngrijorarea din splină; necazul, tristeţea, supărarea şi depresia din plămâni; frica, anxietatea, fobiile şi trauma din rinichi; furia, frustrarea, gelozia, invidia şi ruşinea din ficat. Acesta este grupul de tulburări de personalitate pe care programul în 12 paşi îl numeşte „Lunecos”: un termen care ne aminteşte că nu suntem aceeaşi persoană când avem un sistem curat, treaz şi echilibrat cu cea care are o dependenţă.

Când ai un declic din cauza unei persoane, a unui loc sau a unei situaţii care îţi aminteşte de starea legată de energia interioară nerezolvată, retrăieşti acele emoţii, care, la rândul lor, declanşează din nou codul galben de alertă. Acest proces poate să te ducă la un declin rapid şi să te împiedice să găseşti energia necesară pentru a face schimbări sănătoase numai prin puterea voinţei.

Figura 4.7. Ciclul distructiv al organelor interne

De asemenea, povara energiei indecise tinde să creeze o reacţie automată în care personalitatea se scindează pentru a te proteja de sentimentele şi amintirile nedorite. Apoi, experienţele copleşitoare se menţin doar într-o parte a identităţii, iar restul psihicului rămâne intact. Totuşi, scindările blochează comunicarea între aspectele diferite ale personalităţii. Din această cauză, comunici în moduri derutante şi suporţi consecinţe pe care nu le înţelegi.

În cele din urmă, acţiunile repetitive, gândurile obsesive şi impulsurile interioare, dacă sunt alimentate continuu, creează trasee energetice care devin mai dense şi mai puternice până când corpul le acceptă ca pe o nouă parte a sa. Astfel, în matricea ta energetică apare un fel de nou tatuaj energetic, ce are o nouă ordine de zi, bazată pe energia toxică a fiecăruia dintre organele dezechilibrate şi toxice. Spre deosebire de intenţiile persoanei în care s-a creat şi adesea în opoziţie cu acestea, holograma adicţiei minte, înşală, manipulează, fură şi acţionează în moduri autodistructive. În rândul celor care urmează programe de recuperare, aceste evenimente sunt considerate un comportament ce dă dependenţe. Sistemul de procesare emoţională controlat de organele noastre interne este dezechilibrat şi plin de toxine. Nu te poţi dezvolta din punct de vedere emoţional până când sistemul nu-şi recapătă sănătatea.

Prăbuşirea

În rândul celor care urmează programe de recuperare, a atinge punctul în care nu mai poţi suporta să trăieşti atât de nesănătos se numeşte de obicei „a ajunge în punctul cel mai scăzut”. Dacă încă îţi tratezi sentimentele cu substanţa sau cu activitatea ce dă dependenţă, nu ajungi să-ţi dai seama că este imperativ să faci nişte schimbări sănătoase. Între timp, nu te poţi maturiza emoţional, astfel încât, chiar dacă nu utilizezi activ ceva ce dă dependenţă, comportamentul tău pare inadecvat, haotic şi dezorganizat. Sistemul tău încearcă să elimine toxinele şi să se reechilibreze, ceea ce necesită un efort suplimentar. El creează fricţiune şi căldură. Căldura se ridică şi se blochează în creier. În consecinţă, persoanele astfel afectate au probleme în a se concentra ori în a se calma.

Foto 4.8. Dependenţa se agravează pe măsură ce o întreţii. În cele din urmă, îţi creezi un stil de viaţă în care recurgi în mod curent la stimulente şi la calmante pentru a-ţi regla stările.

Foto 4.9. Conexiunile energetice creează furtuni interioare pe măsură ce substanţele care dau dependenţă sunt folosite pentru tratarea sentimentelor, gândurilor şi amintirilor negative.

Neştiind cum să-şi gestioneze emoţiile în mod sănătos, oamenii tind să recurgă alternativ la substanţe şi activităţi ce dau dependenţă cu efect stimulativ şi cu efect calmant. Îşi fac un tipar sau un ritual al utilizării stimulentelor şi calmantelor de diverse tipuri, încercând să-şi creeze un cocktail al echilibrului. Acesta însă are efectul opus. Nu face decât să mărească amploarea pendulării între emoţii extreme. Putem observa cum începe să se dezvolte acest tipar în cazul unui individ care foloseşte ţigările sau cafeaua pentru a se energiza în timpul zilei şi alcoolul sau medicamentele eliberate cu reţetă noaptea, pentru a se calma şi a adormi.

Foto 4.10. Lumea îi judecă adesea pe cei care se luptă cu o dependenţă. Experienţa de a fi judecat nu face decât să intensifice ruşinea pe care aceştia încearcă să o trateze recurgând la ceva ce dă dependenţă.

Energia indecisă ne poate afecta la toate nivelurile. Ne creăm, adesea la un nivel nu cu totul conştient, păreri negative şi iraţionale despre noi înşine, ca: „Sunt un ratat”, „Nu merit să fiu fericit”, „Nu sunt bun de nimic”, „Nu-mi pot susţine afirmaţiile”, „A fost vina mea”. Această energie ne afectează şi emoţional, aşa că ne tulburăm când ne gândim la incidentele cu care e asociată şi ne simţim mai puţin conectaţi la viaţa de zi cu zi în restul timpului. Ne poate afecta fizic, în sensul că simţim durere sau tensiune în anumite puncte sau zone ale corpului de fiecare dată când ne amintim de problema respectivă.

De fiecare dată când trăieşti ceva similar cu amintirile păstrate de-a lungul căii dependenţei, poţi simţi necesitatea imperioasă de a reveni la adicţie, te poţi gândi la aceasta sau îţi poate lipsi. În rândul celor care urmează programe de recuperare, aceste evenimente sunt numite „declanşatori”. Când nu mai eşti capabil să te opui constant acestor impulsuri, eşti considerat dependent, iar pentru a ocoli calea dependenţei trebuie să-ţi revizuieşti complet stilul de viaţă. Dependenţa este şi un continuum. Cei care îşi alimentează dependenţa mai intens într-un interval mai lung de timp trebuie să facă şi mai multe eforturi pentru a-i inversa efectele suficient cât să-şi recapete controlul asupra vieţii.

Foto 4.11. Pe măsură ce devii tot mai dependent de ceva ce duce la adicţie, încrederea că altceva te-ar putea ajuta se şubrezeşte treptat.

Între timp, celor din jur le e greu să înţeleagă cum de respectivii indivizi au devenit atât de nesănătoşi şi de ineficienţi, iar de aceea tind să-i judece. De multe ori sunt numiţi „rataţi” şi „delăsători”. Oamenii simt că sunt judecaţi şi condamnaţi de cei din jur, chiar dacă se află într-o stare de dependenţă activă. Acest lucru însă nu îi trezeşte la realitate, cum ar spera ceilalţi. Dimpotrivă, le întăreşte sentimentele de învinovăţire şi de ruşine şi chiar le intensifică, fapt ce le creează un bagaj emoţional şi mai mare, de care trebuie să scape înainte de a deveni tipul de persoană care nu ar putea fi judecată în acest sens.

Acumularea de blocaje în sistem îţi limitează sentimentele de bunăstare şi de încredere în tine. Dacă nu ştii cum să-ţi refaci legătura cu tipul de credinţă pe care l-ai avut altădată sau dacă nici măcar nu ştii că trebuie să ţi-o refaci, te axezi tot mai mult pe soluţii externe. Axarea pe exterior duce la şi mai multe blocaje.

Dinamica dependenţei

Codependenţa

Persoanele îngrijorate pentru cineva care suferă de o dependenţă dezvoltă anumite tendinţe, mai ales dacă cel dependent le afectează viaţa în mod direct, prin consecinţele comportamentului său. „Codependenţa” se referă la tendinţa oamenilor de a pune nevoile altora înaintea nevoilor proprii şi de a încerca să-i controleze pe ceilalţi prin manipulare. De asemenea, persoanele codependente tind să se îngrijoreze pentru cele dependente, ceea ce devine un obicei.

Este ca şi cum ar călători în aceeaşi maşină cu persoana dependentă, care conduce haotic. Tendinţa firească a codependenţilor este de a încerca să apuce volanul sau de a ţipa la şofer să fie mai atent. În final, aceştia devin obsedaţi de o persoană la fel cum dependentul este obsedat de un drog sau de o activitate. În rândul celor care urmează un program de recuperare se spune că în spatele oricărui individ dependent există un codependent. Când stările le sunt modificate chimic, fiind dominaţi de negare, dependenţii cred că ceilalţi sunt sursa problemelor lor şi încearcă să-i facă să se schimbe. Bineînţeles, nu îi putem forţa pe oameni să se schimbe dacă nu vor s-o facă, deci această abordare e sortită eşecului şi, în cele din urmă, duce la şi mai multe griji, frustrări şi resentimente.

Foto 4.12. Dacă te concentrezi prea mult asupra altora şi dacă te neglijezi, vei avea resentimente. Acestea te consumă până când sistemul tău cere o destindere.

Cei care suferă de dependenţe dezvoltă şi tendinţa de a încerca să controleze lucruri care nu ţin de ei, izvorâtă frecvent din aşteptările lor cu privire la modul în care „ar trebui” să fie viaţa. Când viaţa nu este aşa cum cred ei – fapt întâlnit adesea –, indivizii se pot frustra şi pot dezvolta resentimente. Acestea pot eroda starea emoţională şi spiritul unei persoane ani de zile. Bineînţeles, în această situaţie, individul va dori, mai devreme sau mai târziu, să-şi alimenteze dependenţa ori să se întoarcă la ea pentru a se destinde.

„Gică contra”

Având căile energetice înfundate, întunecate şi lente şi organele atât de slăbite, oamenii ajung să acţioneze contrar tiparelor lor fireşti, chiar şi atunci când nu îşi alimentează activ dependenţele. De asemenea, iau atitudine atunci când alţii încearcă să-i determine să se schimbe. Sintagma „Gică contra” se referă la tendinţa persoanelor dependente de a face opusul a ceea ce li se spune să facă, mai ales dacă îndemnul vine din partea unor persoane aflate pe o poziţie de autoritate faţă de ele. Uneori, traumele care au jucat un rol în dezvoltarea dependenţelor la anumiţi indivizi au implicat o figură de autoritate. Unele persoane au un lung istoric în care alţii au încercat să le facă să fie ceea ce nu sunt, iar asta le doare. Acest tip de reacţie poate fi favorizat chiar de resentimentele faţă de cei care încearcă să le facă să caute ajutor atunci când nu sunt pregătite.

Unicitate cronică

Deşi individul dependent poate trece prin faze de negare, la un anumit nivel el este conştient că acţionează altfel decât multă lume din jur. Totuşi, adesea nu conştientizează faptul că toţi cei care suferă de o dependenţă sunt la fel de unici ca şi el. De asemenea, nu-şi dă seama că multe dintre efectele comportamentului său ce dă dependenţă pot fi inversate. După ce individul nu-şi mai alimentează dependenţele, refacerea celulelor poate dura chiar şi doi ani. Purificarea şi reechilibrarea adecvată a sistemelor îl pot ajuta să readucă virtuţile în organe. Dacă nu-şi dă seama de realitate, aşteaptă un tratament special sau unic din partea celor care îl ajută să facă faţă nevoilor lui „unice”. Astfel apar frustrarea şi resentimentele, existând posibilitatea să izbucnească şi certuri şi lupte pentru putere, ceea ce îl poate face pe dependentul în curs de recuperare să recurgă din nou la metode nesănătoase sau care creează dependenţă pentru a se simţi mai bine.

Foto 4.13. Sintagma „unicitate cronică” se referă la tendinţa persoanelor dependente de a crede că situaţia lor este prea diferită pentru ca tratamentele şi soluţiile utile în cazul altora să le fie de folos.

Nu îţi dai seama când „te joci cu focul”

„A te juca cu focul” este o altă expresie din comunitatea celor care urmează programe de recuperare în 12 paşi şi se referă la riscul de a declanşa impulsul de a reveni la activităţile ce dau dependenţă făcând lucruri aparent fără vreo legătură cu aceasta. De exemplu, când ai probleme cu jocurile de noroc, cum ar fi aparatele cu fise, presupui că poţi juca în siguranţă alte jocuri de noroc, ca loteria sau pocherul, deoarece nu ai o problemă legată de acestea. Dacă joci acele jocuri de noroc, nu vei avea neapărat o nouă problemă. Totuşi, între aparatele cu fise şi alte jocuri există o legătură conceptuală, ce se poate reactiva la un nivel inconştient dacă joci celelalte jocuri. Apoi, vrei să revii la aparatele cu fise.

Dacă nu înţeleg cum funcţionează acest mecanism, indivizii pot constata că recuperarea dintr-o dependenţă poate fi o luptă foarte derutantă. Adesea se învinovăţesc fiindcă alunecă din nou spre comportamentele adictive şi se consideră slabi sau proşti. Le e ruşine, iar astfel apare un alt sentiment negativ care se acumulează în interior. În mod ironic, această acumulare contribuie la dorinţa de a reveni la activitatea ce dă dependenţă, de a face ceva care să-i ajute să se simtă mai bine.

Foto 4.14. „Joaca cu focul" avertizează că înlocuirea unei dependenţe cu o alta, aparent mai puţin periculoasă, poate trezi dorinţa de a reveni la dependenţa iniţială.

Ignorarea sindromului de sevraj postacut

Detoxifierea după dependenţă poate implica durere fizică, senzaţie de greaţă, transpiraţie, dureri de cap, vomă, tulburări de somn, oboseală şi iritabilitate. Mulţi oameni cred că detoxifierea după dependenţă durează de la câteva zile la câteva săptămâni după încetarea adicţiei active. Totuşi, există efecte post-şoc ce continuă să apară timp de aproximativ doi ani. Aceste efecte şi momentele în care survin se numesc „sindrom de sevraj postacut”. Ele tind să apară la intervale de câte trei şi de câte şase unităţi de timp, după ce nu-ţi mai alimentezi dependenţa. Trei săptămâni, şase săptămâni, trei luni, şase luni, un an şi doi ani sunt în general momentele când percepi aceste efecte.

În astfel de momente, nu simţi întotdeauna nevoia directă de a reveni la dependenţă. În schimb, te simţi „decuplat”, iritabil şi nefericit. Odată ce conştientizezi acest concept, e uşor să-i observi efectele. Cu toţii cunoaştem persoane care s-au lăsat de fumat, de pildă, şi care într-o bună zi au spus: „Nu ştiu ce s-a întâmplat. A fost bine vreo trei săptămâni, apoi m-am apucat iar”. Programul în 12 paşi utilizează descrierea „neliniştit, iritabil şi nemulţumit”. Senzaţiile neplăcute caracteristice sindromului de sevraj postacut sunt temporare şi durează câteva zile, dacă ştii să le recunoşti şi să treci peste ele. Dacă nu înţelegi ce se întâmplă, poţi recurge din nou la dependenţă pentru a le face să dispară.

Renunţi la un val de senzaţii în schimbul altuia

Unii observă că stilul curent de viaţă le creează prea multe probleme şi hotărăsc să facă o schimbare. Totuşi, dacă nu înţeleg mecanismul prin care au fost condiţionaţi spre un comportament de dependent, nu fac decât să schimbe o activitate ce dă dependenţă cu alta. Unii au probleme cu alcoolul, apoi se dedică muncii ca să se îndepărteze de alcool, doar pentru a-şi da seama mai târziu că au devenit obsedaţi de muncă. Sau, de exemplu, te laşi de fumat şi apoi începi să mănânci prea mult. Acest tip de substituire nesănătoasă perpetuează acumularea toxinelor în corp. Oamenii nu-şi dau seama că, de fapt, toxinele trebuie eliminate mai întâi din sistem şi apoi corpul trebuie să se regenereze astfel încât să se obişnuiască cu stările euforice fireşti, de exemplu cele create de o porţie bună de râs, fără a încerca să înlocuiască un tip de euforie extremă cu un altul.

Figura 4.15. E uşor să eliminăm o dependenţă şi să creăm alta.

Lucrurile care pot da dependenţă sunt peste tot

Din păcate, cei care caută o sursă externă de pace lăuntrică chiar şi temporară au la dispoziţie diverse opţiuni accesibile imediat. Chiar dacă aici menţionăm numai alcoolul, substanţele ilegale, diverse tipuri de jocuri de noroc, cofeina şi ţigările, este evident că în societate există numeroase posibilităţi de a dezvolta o dependenţă. Această diversitate creşte probabilitatea ca la un moment dat oamenii să încerce ceva care le va da dependenţă şi, în cele din urmă, le va lua pacea interioară.

Genetica energiei

Rezultatele unor cercetări susţin ideea că poate exista o predispoziţie genetică la dependenţe, în special la dependenţa de alcool. Totuşi, aspectul genetic ar putea fi chiar mai complicat şi mai hotărâtor decât indică studiile. Prin cercetările sale sistematice, Bruce Lipton, autorul volumului The Biology of Belief, arată nu numai că genele ne afectează modul de gândire, ci şi că opiniile noastre ne pot afecta genele. Aplicând acest concept la dependenţe, putem afirma că punctele de vedere ale unui părinte dependent ar putea afecta opiniile copilului său chiar înainte ca acesta să se nască. Dacă afirmaţia noastră este valabilă, atunci efectele stilului de viaţă modern asupra părinţilor poate creşte şansele ca urmaşii lor să devină dependenţi.

Cum abordăm ciclurile traumei şi dependenţei

După ce ai citit totul despre ciclurile care pot contribui la crearea unei dependenţe, poate simţi că ţi se învârte capul şi te întrebi cum este posibil să scapi de ceea ce persoanele care urmează un program de recuperare în 12 paşi numesc „panta alunecoasă” spre dependenţă. Totuşi, dacă privim altfel lucrurile, faptul că ştim că am înaintat cât de puţin pe calea spre – sau înapoi spre – o dependenţă ne poate ajuta să nu ne lăsăm furaţi de un fals sentiment de invincibilitate sau de superioritate. Cu toţii trecem prin lucruri greu de depăşit. Nimeni nu e perfect sănătos. Nu putem spune pur şi simplu că o persoană fie este dependentă, fie nu e sau că fie este deprimată, fie nu e. Contează punctul în care ne aflăm fiecare pe calea spre dezvoltarea acestor probleme sau spre recăderea în adicţie.

În conversaţiile de zi cu zi, lumea nu înţelege de obicei toţi factorii şi nici dinamica implicate în aceste probleme. De asemenea, fiecare are propria viaţă de care să se preocupe şi nu vrea să se împovăreze cu problemele altora. Prin urmare, oamenii fac adesea afirmaţii precum „Of, nu te mai gândi” sau „De ce nu te opreşti pur şi simplu?”. Pare simplu, nu-i aşa? E uimitor cât de des facem asemenea afirmaţii fără a avea o metodă clară de a simplifica situaţia în practică precum în teorie.

O perspectivă fragmentată asupra naturii duce la rezolvarea ineficientă a problemelor Ni se oferă numeroase soluţii împotriva acumulării toxinelor în sistem, însă multe dintre ele reflectă aceeaşi mentalitate de tip „dezbină şi cucereşte” care a dus la această acumulare.

Necunoaşterea adevăratei naturi a realităţii

Te-ai putea întreba de ce, aparent, problemele enumerate până acum nu sunt recunoscute în general şi de ce nu există tratamente mai eficiente pentru ele. Este important să afirmăm că mare parte din societatea noastră funcţionează în continuare conform fizicii newtoniene. Mulţi uită că fizica cuantică este recunoscută încă de pe vremea lui Albert Einstein. Multe sisteme de gândire şi de vindecare, inclusiv Tao Universal, funcţionează de mii de ani conform fizicii cuantice. În pofida acestui fapt, în general societatea modernă tratează lumea înconjurătoare ca şi cum ar fi materie solidă, deşi ştim de aproape un secol că orice materie este energie, că materia poate acţiona ca o particulă sau ca o undă, în funcţie de aşteptările persoanei care o experimentează, şi că timpul şi spaţiul nu sunt decât concepte pe care le înţelegem datorită modului în care simţurile noastre interpretează realitatea.

Foto 5.1. De mii de ani există multe aşa-numite sisteme alternative de vindecare, însă, uneori, atenţia acordată de societatea noastră medicinei moderne ne face să trecem cu vederea beneficiile oferite de celelalte abordări.

Fără conştientizarea şi recunoaşterea pe scară largă ale adevăratei naturi a realităţii, continuăm să ne tratăm sănătatea ca pe o simplă reflexie a aspectelor concrete ale corpului nostru, iar sănătatea mintală ca pe o reflexie a funcţionării creierului. În consecinţă, soluţiile noastre presupun în general medicamente şi intervenţii chirurgicale. Utilizăm soluţii concrete pentru a aborda o versiune concretă a realităţii. Perpetuarea acestei viziuni concrete asupra realităţii lasă controlul asupra sănătăţii noastre în mâinile experţilor recunoscuţi şi ne reduce capacitatea de a hotărî pentru noi înşine şi de a lua măsuri preventive în viaţa cotidiană.

Lipsa de conştientizare a ştiinţei, spiritualitatea şi conexiunile dintre ele Ştiinţa şi spiritualitatea sunt de acord că toate lucrurile sunt legate între ele, că există o forţă organizatoare care le afectează pe toate şi că mintea noastră afectează energia din jurul şi din interiorul nostru. Aceste informaţii ne pot ajuta să înţelegem valoarea unor practici ca qi gong-ul, însă, dacă nu le avem, poate că nu vom şti de ce ar trebui să adoptăm o practică spirituală. Pentru mai multe informaţii despre această conexiune, vizionează DVD-ul What The Bleep Do We Know?!.

Figura 5.2. Spiritualitatea poate presupune studierea conexiunilor energetice dintre toate fiinţele vii şi a modului în care se poate lucra cu aceste energii.

Mulţi oameni consideră că spiritualitatea şi religia sunt unul şi acelaşi lucru. Dacă au avut experienţe neplăcute legate de religie, le pot respinge pe amândouă. Totuşi, ele nu coincid neapărat. Spiritualitatea poate presupune şi studierea conexiunilor energetice dintre toate fiinţele vii şi a modului în care trebuie lucrat cu aceste energii, fără a pretinde că se ştie cine sau ce le-a creat sau le controlează. Unii oameni consideră că se situează în tabăra oamenilor de ştiinţă şi resping spiritualitatea fără să realizeze că ştiinţa şi spiritualitatea pot indica realităţi similare. Dacă nu înţeleg acest lucru, nu se bucură de capacitatea lor de a-şi considera evenimentele din viaţă utile sau semnificative; nu dispun de un mijloc de a-şi privi viitorul cu speranţă şi cu încredere. Din această cauză, se pot simţi izolaţi şi victime ale evenimentelor dureroase aleatorii şi fără sens ale vieţii. Mai devreme sau mai târziu, acumularea de experienţe dureroase pe care nu le pot accepta sau cărora nu le pot da un sens îi va copleşi. În cele din urmă, vor trebui să găsească moduri prin care să se despovăreze, ajungând, de obicei, la ceva ce dă dependenţă.

Separarea dintre minte, corp şi spirit

În încercarea de a izola zonele pe care trebuie să le vindecăm sau să le îngrijim şi de a face procesul de vindecare mai simplu şi mai precis, profesioniştii şi laicii separă mintea, trupul şi spiritul pentru a se ocupa de fiecare individual. Totuşi, aceste părţi se influenţează reciproc. O abordare ce nu ţine cont de această interacţiune cauzează efecte secundare neanticipate în zonele conexe. De exemplu, persoanele accidentate grav fizic suferă adesea efecte emoţionale serioase mai târziu. Un alt exemplu ar fi faptul că adulţii care au trăit traume multiple în copilărie tind să sufere de dureri cronice. Persoanele dependente sunt afectate fizic, emoţional, mintal şi spiritual de suferinţa lor. Faptul că nu lucrează asupra tuturor nivelurilor şi a interacţiunilor dintre acestea lasă adeseori acumulări nerezolvate de energie toxică la diverse niveluri ale funcţionării corpului.

Figura 5.3. Mintea, corpul şi spiritul sunt conectate între ele.

Separarea Orientului de Occident

Aparent, convingerile orientale şi cele occidentale despre sănătate şi vindecare funcţionează în moduri conflictuale şi opuse. Occidentul se axează pe aspectele concrete ale realităţii, pe părţile pe care le putem detecta cu ajutorul simţurilor. Orientul acordă mai multă importanţă aspectelor energetice ale realităţii. Totuşi, ambele abordări sunt legitime. Este mai înţelept să ne dăm seama când şi cum să aplicăm fiecare abordare şi cum pot conlucra decât să încercăm să respingem una dintre ele. Însă, dacă nu realizează acest lucru, mulţi oameni utilizează doar cunoştinţele dintr-un singur sistem, chiar şi după ce acesta pare să-şi fi atins limitele în a-i ajuta. Dacă problemele sunt grave, vor ajunge la disperare, ceea ce îi poate duce spre măsuri extreme.

Foto 5.4. Medicina orientală şi cea occidentală au propriile specialităţi şi succese. Trebuie să le facem să coopereze, nu să încurajăm discriminarea oricăreia dintre ele.

Importanţa exagerată acordată cercetării cantitative

Când oferi o perspectivă sau o soluţie nouă la o problemă, de obicei ţi se răspunde: „Pe ce studii se bazează?”. În general, tipul de studii la care se referă lumea în astfel de situaţii sunt cercetările cantitative, care analizează problema în condiţii de laborator controlate şi care izolează sau manipulează părţi din ea pentru a testa o anumită teorie sau convingere. Acest tip de cercetare este cu siguranţă valoros şi de-a lungul anilor a produs numeroase descoperiri importante. Totuşi, nu este singurul tip de cercetare. Valoroase sunt şi feedbackul descriptiv al indivizilor incluşi în cercetarea calitativă, studiile de caz şi observaţia sistematică.

Diferitele tipuri de cercetare se pot verifica reciproc. Să nu uităm că cercetarea cantitativă nu este complet obiectivă. Nicio cercetare nu poate fi astfel. Cercetarea se bazează întotdeauna pe ipoteze. Ştim că aşteptările cercetătorului pot afecta rezultatele studiului, indiferent de numărul de elemente de control aplicate. Crearea unor situaţii artificiale şi condiţii controlate poate duce la rezultate ce nu se aplică în situaţii reale. Statisticile pot fi manipulate astfel încât să modifice complet concluziile unui studiu. În consecinţă, cercetările trag multe concluzii contradictorii.

Ca să ştim cum este mai bine pentru sănătatea şi pentru viaţa noastră, trebuie să nu acordăm atenţie numai rezultatelor cercetărilor cantitative. Dacă ne bazăm numai pe descoperirile metodelor de cercetare curente, pierdem din vedere beneficiile a mii de ani de investigaţii şi studiu. Probabil că, la un moment dat, cei care se bazează doar pe o abordare reducţionistă pentru a înţelege realitatea şi care preferă să utilizeze cercetările cantitative ca unic ghid în viaţă se vor simţi derutaţi şi frustraţi. În cele din urmă, acest tip de sentimente îi poate face pe oameni să se îndrepte spre soluţii nesănătoase pentru a le elimina.

Soluţii ineficiente

Cele mai des întâlnite metode de tratament sunt aplicate conform principalelor perspective asupra depresiei, anxietăţii, traumei şi dependenţelor. Astfel apar soluţiile ineficiente.

Narcisiştii pot să prospere

Într-o lume care preţuieşte datul din coate şi materialismul, este firesc să acceptăm oamenii al căror stil de viaţă reflectă sistemul. Nu lăudăm neapărat trăsături ca narcisismul, determinarea, lăcomia şi frauda, dar, aparent, măcar le tolerăm şi le trecem cu vederea, mai ales dacă persoanele la care le găsim sunt de succes conform standardelor moderne materialiste. Aceasta poate fi o sursă de frustrare şi de resentimente, care îi fac pe cei care nu sunt la fel de egoişti sau de lipsiţi de scrupule să se simtă deprimaţi şi depăşiţi de situaţie.

Foto 5.5. Persoanele ce reflectă aspectele materialiste şi de tip „eu şi numai eu” ale societăţii moderne par să profite de pe urma acestei atitudini.

Serviciile guvernamentale profită de pe urma durerii

Nevoia de multe servicii guvernamentale este alimentată de problemele create de dorinţele şi de nefericirea cetăţenilor. Oamenii au nevoie de permise de conducere şi de certificate de căsătorie. Au nevoie de medici şi de servicii sociale pentru a-şi trata suferinţele, leziunile, dependenţele, conflictele din relaţii şi din familie, traumele şi tulburările de stare. Poate că stilurile de viaţă care creează probleme grave nu provin din serviciile guvernamentale, însă frustrarea oamenilor cauzată de faptul că primesc asistenţă nesatisfăcătoare, derutantă, lentă sau ineficientă din partea acestor servicii, precum şi ideea că plătesc taxe pentru a le menţine pot constitui un alt nivel de bagaj emoţional care îi face să se simtă deprimaţi, anxioşi sau depăşiţi de situaţie.

Prea multă importanţă acordată diagnosticării

Multe dintre metodele moderne de vindecare presupun o evaluare şi o diagnosticare completă şi amănunţită a problemei înaintea oricărui tratament. Din punct de vedere teoretic, acest fapt este logic, însă în practică creează adesea atât de multe etape pe care trebuie să le parcurgi pentru a obţine ajutor, încât fie la un moment dat renunţi să mai încerci, fie simptomele se agravează pe parcurs. A-i învăţa pe oameni să fie sănătoşi pare să fie important, dar nu este o practică larg răspândită.

Foto 5.6. Diagnosticarea este un aspect important al evaluării, dar nu şi un substitut al tratamentului.

Soluţiile fac parte din problemă

Eficienţa soluţiilor liniare este limitată atunci când se încearcă rezolvarea unor probleme care presupun mai multe niveluri de cicluri şi paradox. De fapt, ele agravează adesea problemele în cauză. Soluţiile liniare implică divizarea problemei în părţi componente şi apoi tratarea simptomelor fiecărei componente cu o anumită soluţie sau set de soluţii. Ca orice alt aspect al naturii, fiecare soluţie va avea avantaje şi dezavantaje. Orice în viaţă are o parte bună şi una proastă. De exemplu, efectele secundare sunt o parte proastă a medicamentelor. O singură problemă poate fi împărţită în mai multe subprobleme, fiecare cu propriile soluţii şi dezavantaje. Drept urmare, soluţiile la o singură problemă creează noi probleme. Un exemplu evident este modul în care folosim tehnologia pentru a economisi timp, doar pentru a constata că trebuie să muncim mai mult pentru a ne putea cumpăra cele mai recente gadgeturi şi să învăţăm mai mult ca să ştim cum se folosesc. Un alt exemplu poate fi birocraţia necesară pentru a beneficia de servicii din partea unui departament guvernamental.

Fiindcă nu înţelegem caracterul ciclic al vieţii, creăm formule şi tipare ce s-au transformat într-un nou ciclu care ne împiedică să le vedem pe celelalte. Trebuie să învăţăm de la Lao Zi (capitolul 36):

De vei voi să micşorezi un lucru, întâi şi-ntâi să îl măreşti.
De vei voi ca să slăbeşti un lucru, întâi şi-ntâi să-l întăreşti.
De vei voi să îi stârneşti căderea, întâi şi-ntâi să îl ridici.
De vei voi să-l faci să piardă, întâi şi-ntâi să-i dăruieşti.
Iată ce se cheamă „profund” şi „limpede”.
Ceea ce este blând şi moale biruieşte ceea ce este tare şi puternic. Peştelui nu-i este cu putinţă să părăsească adâncurile; în ţară, armele ascuţite nu se cuvine să fie arătate oamenilor[2].

Este util să analizăm natura omului, dar este important şi să o reasamblăm în teoriile noastre, astfel încât întreaga experienţă să fie explicată. Altminteri, soluţiile noastre vor reflecta problemele inerente situaţiilor pe care încercăm să le rezolvăm. Să ne imaginăm, de pildă, că încercăm să folosim o formulă pentru a ne găsi sufletul-pereche.

Multe soluţii sunt derutante şi neplăcute

Mulţi experţi din sistemul liniar explică prin propriul jargon tehnic problemele existente şi cum trebuie rezolvate. Dacă pacienţii sau clienţii lor nu au aceeaşi pregătire, probabil că nu vor înţelege de ce au nevoie şi cum îi va ajuta tratamentul. Din cauza limbajului derutant, oamenii obişnuiţi nu mai ştiu cum să se trateze.

Adesea, remediile presupun administrarea unor substanţe cu gust neplăcut, tratamente foarte dureroase sau cu efecte secundare. Tratamentele sunt administrate în medii ce par sterile şi deprimante. Nu e de mirare că de multe ori sistemul corp-minte nici nu le tolerează.

Foto 5.7. Jargonul tehnic nu face decât să-i deruteze pe oameni şi riscă să le creeze impresia că nu ştiu ce este bine pentru ei.

Majoritatea soluţiilor actuale nu sunt suficiente pentru a rezolva probleme cronice

De multe ori, metodele moderne nu reuşesc să elimine afecţiuni ca depresia, anxietatea, dependenţele, cancerul şi durerea cronică. Aparent, acestea sunt influenţate de mai mulţi factori şi afectează mai multe niveluri ale funcţionării. Totuşi, nu toţi aceşti factori se tratează cu metode moderne – de exemplu, acumularea de toxine şi trauma suferită de ţesuturi după o intervenţie chirurgicală. Din moment ce problemele fizice pot fi create sau agravate parţial de condiţia psihică a persoanelor afectate, nu e de mirare că abordările reducţioniste care tratează doar simptomele fizice încă nu au găsit o cale de a vindeca definitiv asemenea afecţiuni.

Prea multe tratamente se axează mai degrabă pe simptome, şi nu pe sursa problemei. O metodă de tratament ce presupune să tratezi separat fiecare simptom sau arie de funcţionare necesită mult timp, efort şi bani. Gândiţi-vă cât de mulţi specialişti şi câte abordări ar fi necesare pentru a răspunde de toate aspectele interconectate ale omului.

Foto 5.8. Soluţiile funcţionează cel mai bine dacă nu te copleşesc pe parcursul tratamentului.

Lipsa sprijinului inspirat şi informat

În mod firesc, celor dragi le e greu să înţeleagă cum devii traumatizat sau dependent. Nu sunt conştienţi de toţi factorii implicaţi. De asemenea, sunt condiţionaţi de convingerea că sistemul curent funcţionează optim. Prin urmare, în loc să conteste şi să schimbe aspectele sistemului care contribuie la problemele cu care se confruntă cei dragi, ajung să-i judece pe cei care suferă din cauza efectelor adverse ale acestuia. Concomitent, persoanele pe care încearcă să le ajute par să se opună propriei ameliorări. Nu este simplu să încerci să oferi soluţii concrete unei persoane deprimate, traumatizate sau dependente, chiar dacă eşti plin de compasiune.

Multe afecţiuni nu sunt uşor de remediat cu ajutorul logicii. Ar fi bine dacă oamenii „s-ar deştepta”, „ar creşte”, „s-ar lumina” ori „s-ar trezi” pur şi simplu, însă povara dinamicii din trecut şi din prezent îi pune la pământ. Faptul că se simt neînţeleşi şi judecaţi de alţii intensifică adesea ruşinea resimţită de cei traumatizaţi şi dependenţi. Se simt imperfecţi la un anumit nivel şi de multe ori îşi formează convingerea greu de distrus că nu sunt la fel de buni sau de valoroşi ca toţi ceilalţi. Din acest motiv, le este greu să creadă că se pot schimba şi, bineînţeles, să acţioneze pentru a descoperi că sunt în stare să se schimbe.

Combinarea tehnicii EDMR cu qi gong-ul O nouă abordare holistă pentru rezolvarea problemelor emoţionale Capitolele anterioare ne oferă o imagine realistă a modului în care ciclurile negative pot inversa circulaţia firească în sistemul nostru energetic, generând un flux de energie întunecat, tulbure, lent, dens şi stagnant care blochează curgerea liberă a energiei de care avem nevoie pentru a ne simţi bine şi plini de viaţă. Dacă te afli în această situaţie, la un moment dat te simţi obosit, supărat, deprimat, anxios şi ai senzaţia vagă că îţi lipseşte ceva. Instinctul tău se împotmoleşte. Cum poţi preveni asta? Cum te poţi vindeca de un amestec atât de complex de probleme prezente la atât de multe niveluri funcţionale?

Noua noastră abordare a autovindecării ţine cont de ciclurile şi de acumulările energetice care pot apărea şi oferă instrucţiuni concrete, pas cu pas pentru a ne explora mecanismele naturale de vindecare, astfel încât să eliminăm şi să transformăm blocajele din traseele energetice, precum şi pentru a prelua controlul asupra propriei stări de bine. Această abordare nouă – pe care o numim „reciclarea emoţională taoistă” – rezultă din combinaţia între EMDR, desensibilizarea şi reprocesarea prin mişcări oculare, şi sistemul Tao Universal de principii şi practici qi gong.

Integrarea elementelor protocolului EMDR în sistemul qi gong Tao Universal permite un reglaj fin important al acestei tehnici. Noua abordare pune mai mult accent pe corp şi oferă un mod mai sistematic de procesare completă a bagajului emoţional stocat în cursurile de energie ale corpului. Abordarea e integrată clar şi formal în sistemul existent de cunoştinţe ce alcătuiesc Tao Universal.

Această integrare şi sinteză le permite practicienilor să înţeleagă mai bine cum funcţionează EMDR şi că utilizarea continuă a abordării în combinaţie cu alte obiceiuri sănătoase poate crea o stare de bine durabilă. Ca parte a unui stil de viaţă sănătos, noua abordare poate fi folosită individual, ca formă de autovindecare. Se potriveşte atât în prevenţie, cât şi în tratament. De asemenea, poate fi utilizată de practicieni ca metodă de tratament pentru clienţii lor. În contrast cu societatea modernă competitivă şi materialistă, sistemul qi gong Tao Universal îi învaţă pe oameni să trăiască în armonie cu natura, şi nu să încerce să o cucerească. Lucrul cu energiile vitale ale corpului oferă modalităţi viabile de rezolvare a unor chestiuni aparent ireconciliabile şi a unor cicluri distructive din noi.

Abordarea EMDR

Protocolul EMDR prevede paşi şi etape. Mai întâi, consilierul explică cum funcţionează EMDR, ce i se cere pacientului să facă şi ce se întâmplă pe parcurs. Clientului îi sunt prezentate diversele tipuri de procesare bilaterală pentru a-şi alege metoda preferată. Apoi, clientul efectuează două exerciţii preliminare ca exemplu concret a ceea ce face EMDR şi care îl pregătesc pentru munca mai dificilă ce urmează.

În continuare, terapeutul pune opt întrebări specifice despre problema aleasă de client în vederea tratării. Răspunsurile clientului la cele opt întrebări furnizează informaţiile necesare pentru organizarea următoarelor trei etape ale tratamentului.

1. Prima etapă a tratamentului este desensibilizarea. În cadrul acesteia sunt eliminate sentimentele sau impulsurile negative legate de problema specifică aleasă de client pentru tratament.
2. A doua etapă a tratamentului este instalarea pozitivă, ce presupune formarea convingerilor pozitive pe care clientul vrea să le aibă în legătură cu problema aleasă.
3. A treia şi ultima etapă a tratamentului prin EMDR este scanarea corporală. Această etapă se axează pe înlăturarea eventualelor tensiuni, dureri sau senzaţii fizice neobişnuite care persistă după încheierea primelor două etape.

Sistemul Tao Universal

Mâncare bună, apă bună, inimă bună, minte bună, intenţii bune.
Grădina Tao, Thailanda

Sistemul qi gong Tao Universal este un set integrat de practici taoiste antice. Odinioară, aceste practici erau rezervate popoarelor orientale, însă acum sunt împărtăşite cu lumea occidentală. Într-o perioadă din istoria umanităţii când avem puterea de a ne distruge planeta, este mai important ca oricând să ne împărtăşim cunoştinţele despre vindecare. În sistemul Tao Universal există practici ce trebuie executate stând jos, altele implică poziţia în picioare şi mişcarea, pe când altele se efectuează din poziţia întins pe podea. Spre deosebire de multe alte sisteme, Tao Universal acceptă natura puternică şi sacră a energiei sexuale şi ne învaţă cum să o folosim în avantajul sănătăţii şi stării noastre de bine.

Sistemul Tao Universal oferă practici utile pentru formarea unui stil de viaţă sănătos. Exerciţiile ne învaţă să ne îngrijim singuri în loc să ne bazăm pe un sistem guvernamental sau pe alte forţe exterioare. Exerciţiile includ relaxarea şi antrenarea concentrării. Practicarea qi gong-ului ne face să ne simţim bine, astfel încât este inclusă şi motivaţia de a continua practica şi de a deveni mai relaxaţi şi mai concentraţi. Aceste practici nu ne impun să ne retragem din societatea modernă ori să o refuzăm, ci ne însoţesc pur şi simplu.

Practicile Tao Universal ne învaţă cum să ne echilibrăm, să ne fortificăm şi să ne detoxifiem la toate nivelurile şi astfel să creăm un flux intern de energie care ne poate creşte şansele de a avea noroc. Când vorbim despre energie, lucrurile similare se atrag reciproc. Cultivarea energiei pozitive în noi înşine invită energia pozitivă în viaţa noastră. Efectuarea regulată a practicilor duce la o mai mare conştientizare de sine şi la mai multă autodisciplină. Automat, capacitatea de concentrare şi de relaxare se ameliorează.

Taoismul este un sistem filosofic care nu impune abandonarea propriului sistem de credinţe sau adoptarea unuia nou. Tao Universal aplică noţiunile taoiste în practici care creează în noi o energie echilibrată şi sănătoasă. Conceptele incluse în practici sunt relativ uşor de înţeles. Energia este un limbaj inteligibil pentru toţi. Oamenii fac referire adesea la starea propriei energii sau la energia pe care o simt din partea altei persoane sau a unui grup şi spun: „Mă simt secătuit”, „Discursul a fost electrizant” sau „Tipul ăla îmi transmite o stare negativă”. Pe scurt, Tao Universal este un sistem cuprinzător şi integrat de principii şi practici care pot furniza răspunsurile dorite celor care caută sănătatea şi vindecarea. Aceste practici ne oferă instrumentele necesare pentru a ne conecta la sursa propriei cunoaşteri şi existenţe; ne arată căile ce duc la sursă cât suntem încă în viaţă, precum şi după ce ne încetăm existenţa fizică.

„Dacă faci, înţelegi”

Spre deosebire de multe alte abordări psihologice şi practici terapeutice, beneficiile practicilor Tao Universal sunt accesibile oricui, chiar dacă eşti sceptic în privinţa validităţii lor. Factorul crucial pentru a cunoaşte beneficiile acestui tip de qi gong nu este credinţa, ci practica. Cu timpul, te vei armoniza tot mai mult cu energia din tine şi din jurul tău şi o vei simţi mai intens în corp.

Aceste practici au fost dezvoltate şi rafinate prin observaţie sistematică pe parcursul a mai bine de cinci mii de ani. În prezent, metodele actuale de cercetare verifică valoarea lucrului cu energia vitală din corp. Pentru mai multe informaţii despre acest subiect, vezi volumul The Energy Healing Experiments scris de Gary E. Schwartz. În plus, Daniel J. Siegel a scris volumul The Mindful Brain, în care examinează legătura dintre conştientizare şi starea de bine. O altă resursă pentru cercetări despre beneficiile qi gong-ului este site-ul www.daoistcenter.org. Pentru informaţii mai amănunţite despre practicile fundamentale ale sistemului Tao Universal, vezi bibliografia de la sfârşitul cărţii de faţă.

Concepte fundamentale ale taoismului

Conceptele taoiste ne oferă un mod mai clar de a înţelege cum sunt conectate toate aspectele vieţii şi cum să operăm eficient cu ele. Toate nivelurile realităţii conţin şi reflectă aspectele naturii. Conform unei vechi expresii, „Cele de sus sunt precum cele de jos”.

Sursa

Pe parcursul a mii de ani, taoiştii au înţeles că la un moment dat nu exista decât nimicul (denumit wu chi), care conţinea în sine potenţialul de a crea totul. La fel ca în teoria Big Bang, s-a produs o explozie şi energia potenţială originară s-a divizat de nenumărate ori, începând prin a se divide în două, etapă ce se referă la polaritatea yin-yang, care împarte existenţa în lumină versus întuneric, bun versus rău, activ versus pasiv, masculin versus feminin şi aşa mai departe. A urmat divizarea în trei (numită Cei Trei Puri). La final au fost create cele cinci elemente: pământul, focul, apa, metalul şi lemnul. Fiecăruia dintre cele cinci elemente îi corespunde o culoare, un gust, un miros, un sunet, o direcţie, un anotimp, un organ yin, un organ yang, un organ de simţ şi o planetă (figura 6.1).

Figura 6.1. Conexiunile dintre culori, sunete, organe, elemente, anotimpuri şi forţe

Acest proces este descris de Lao Zi în capitolul 42:

> Tao zămisleşte Unul, Unul zămisleşte Doiul, Doiul zămisleşte Treimea, iar Treimea zămisleşte „cele zece mii de fiinţe şi lucruri”.
> „Cele zece mii de fiinţe şi lucruri” îl poartă în spinare pe yin şi îl îmbrăţişează pe yang; vidul şi suflul alcătuiesc armonia.
> Ceea ce oamenii urăsc sunt numai şi numai pribegia, neînsemnătatea şi nevrednicia, însă cârmuitorii se slujesc de înţelesul lor pentru a se denumi pe ei înşişi. Iată de ce, între fiinţe, unele caută să descrească şi astfel sporesc, iar altele caută să sporească şi astfel descresc.
> Ceea ce oamenii ne învaţă, şi eu am să povăţuiesc: „Un despot va pieri înainte de vreme”. Voi face din aceasta un început pentru învăţătura mea[1].

Divizările au continuat până la crearea realităţii moderne, cu toate sunetele, mirosurile, gusturile, forţele, anotimpurile, personalităţile, direcţiile, culorile, texturile, plantele şi forţele pe care le cunoaştem acum (figura 6.2). Pe măsură ce divizările au continuat, s-au format anumite energii mai întunecate şi mai dense, dar care sunt tot energie. Totul este energie. Totul vibrează.

Figura 6.2. Progresia de la wu chi la cele zece mii de lucruri

Yin şi yang

Majoritatea oamenilor recunosc simbolul yin/yang din taoism, însă mulţi nu ştiu foarte bine ce înseamnă. În ansamblu, simbolul reprezintă dualitatea experienţei umane. Percepem viaţa ca fiind alcătuită din diverse perechi de contrarii: bărbaţi şi femei, adulţi şi copii, alb şi negru, activ şi pasiv, pozitiv şi negativ, dur şi moale, mare şi mic sunt doar câteva exemple.

Observăm însă în simbol (figura 6.3) că în jumătatea neagră există un punct alb, iar în cea albă, un punct negru. Ele ne amintesc că existenţa nu este niciodată complet neagră sau albă. Nicio situaţie nu este complet bună sau complet rea.

Figura 6.3. Simbolul yin/yang

De remarcat şi că cele două jumătăţi ale simbolului nu sunt separate printr-o linie dreaptă. Linia curbă reflectă modul în care funcţionează viaţa în timp ce ne îndreptăm în diverse direcţii. Pe măsură ce înţelegem mai bine una dintre laturile existenţei, ne putem da seama că nu mai suntem chiar atât de departe de cealaltă latură. De pildă, afirmăm adesea că diferenţa dintre genialitate şi nebunie este abia perceptibilă. Este important să nu uităm că linia dintre cele două jumătăţi reprezintă şi interacţiunea lor. În conversaţiile de fiecare zi facem referire adesea la „chimia” sau la „scânteile” dintre oameni.

Linia dintre yin şi yang ne aminteşte că acestea fac parte din viaţă şi că sunt necesare pentru a completa circuitul dintre noi şi celelalte persoane şi experienţe. Nu putem înţelege şi aprecia experienţele pozitive fără a înţelege contrariul lor: cele două tipuri de experienţă sunt necesare pentru a se completa reciproc. Latura întunecată nu este considerată o greşeală sau ceva care trebuie distrus. E acceptată ca parte a dualităţii naturii şi se admite faptul că ambele aspecte ale dualităţii naturii vor exista mereu. În taoism încercăm să ne împrietenim cu latura întunecată şi să facem astfel încât cele două jumătăţi ale întregului să coopereze între ele.

De asemenea, este important că linia de contur a simbolului yin/yang formează un cerc. Acesta indică mişcarea circulară necontenită a vieţii. Viaţa nu se opreşte niciodată. Schimbarea este inevitabilă şi continuă. Forma circulară reflectă şi ciclicitatea vieţii. Interacţiunile dintre noi şi cele cu natura sunt dinamice. Toate elementele naturii reacţionează între ele. Încearcă să cufunzi batoane de orez expandat în bolul de cereale, să-i faci baie pisicii sau să prinzi un fluture pe deget şi vei vedea şi singur.

Să ne lăsăm purtaţi de val

Proprietăţile şi acţiunile apei sunt invocate adesea pentru a ne ajuta să înţelegem cum să aplicăm conceptele taoiste. Apa e moale, adaptabilă şi flexibilă, dar nu poate fi distrusă. Ia forma oricărui recipient care o conţine. Indiferent la ce element este expusă, îşi schimbă starea pentru a se adapta mediului. De exemplu, dacă se răceşte prea mult, devine gheaţă.

Oamenii sunt alcătuiţi în proporţie de aproximativ două treimi din apă, aşa că se cuvine să înţelegem cum să trecem prin viaţă asemenea apei: „să ne lăsăm purtaţi de val” sau, cum spune Tao te qing în capitolul 80:

> Sub Cer, nimic nu este mai moale şi mai slab decât apa, însă ea învinge ceea ce este tare şi puternic, nefiindu-i nimeni mai presus. Nimic nu o va înlocui.
> Prin urmare, ceea ce este moale învinge ceea ce este tare, iar ceea ce este slab învinge ceea ce este puternic; sub Cer nu-i nimeni să nu ştie acest lucru, însă nimănui nu îi este cu putinţă să îl înfăptuiască.
> De aceea Omul Sfânt spune: „Cel care îndură umilinţele ţării, acela este cârmuitorul ţării, cel care îndură nenorocirile ţării, acela este Rege sub Cer”.
> Vorbele drepte se aseamănă cu potrivnicele lor[2].

Taoismul evidenţiază paradoxurile inerente şi ciclurile naturii, arătându-ne calea pentru a ne da seama cum să lucrăm cu ele în loc să luptăm împotriva lor. De-a lungul a mii de ani, taoiştii au observat îndeaproape natura, animalele şi copiii pentru a înţelege principiile energetice naturale ale universului şi modul în care trebuie să lucrăm cu ele. Animalele şi copiii acţionează într-o manieră mai puţin studiată. Nu se întreabă dacă ceea ce fac este „cool” sau potrivit. Fac în mod firesc ceea ce le place şi le convine. Această noţiune nu aparţine exclusiv taoismului. De exemplu, cei care urmează programe de recuperare în 12 paşi formulează acelaşi obiectiv în felul următor: „Trăim viaţa în condiţiile impuse de ea”.

Aşa cum între planete există forţe gravitaţionale, iar în râuri există curenţi care urmează anumite căi, în corpul uman există curenţi care, uneori, funcţionează în diverse puncte asemenea lacurilor, râurilor, pâraielor şi oceanelor. Uneori se înfundă din cauza tensiunii sau a toxinelor din corp. Sistemul Tao Universal furnizează instrumente utile pentru a absorbi energie din jur şi a o circula lin pe căile naturale ale corpului (numite „meridiane”). Divizările din interiorul nostru se dizolvă şi ne simţim mai înrădăcinaţi, mai conectaţi şi mai împăcaţi. De asemenea, ne simţim mai deschişi şi mai conectaţi la lumea exterioară. Experienţa fluxului lin, armonios ne permite să ne dăm seama când nu acţionăm în concordanţă cu această senzaţie în relaţiile cu alte persoane şi în situaţiile din afara noastră. În astfel de cazuri putem lua măsuri pentru a ne corecta atitudinile, convingerile şi acţiunile, astfel încât să nu ne mai blocăm într-o luptă de putere cu viaţa. Drept rezultat, energia din noi este mai uşoară, asemănându-se tot mai mult cu energia nedivizată, pură a Sursei, pe măsură ce continuăm să exersăm.

Energia densă devine mai uşoară – un proces interior

Cu toţii ştim că lumina violetă umple universul. Este mai concentrată în anumite zone. Steaua Polară are cea mai mare concentraţie din universul nostru (figura 6.4) . Lumina violetă este inteligentă. Conţine cunoaşterea universală. De asemenea, este programabilă.

Figura 6.4. Lumina violetă conţine cunoaştere universală.

Când nu avem suficientă iubire în inimă, pierdem legătura invizibilă cu lumina violetă. Apoi pierdem legătura cu cunoaşterea universală. Avem nevoie de această conexiune pentru a multiplica energia bună din interiorul nostru. Fără ea, începem să ne rătăcim. Celulele noastre nu se mai pot vindeca aşa cum trebuie. Acest fapt poate duce la dependenţă şi la cancer. Trebuie să ne curăţăm sistemul energetic şi să păstrăm conectarea la energia violetă pentru a ne vindeca şi a fi sănătoşi (figura 6.5). Trebuie să transformăm energia sexuală, cea mai înaltă vibraţie a noastră, în energie sufletească violetă inteligentă. Această acţiune include transformarea energiei întunecate şi tulburi rămase din experienţele trecute pe care nu reuşim să le acceptăm.

Figura 6.5. Purificarea sistemelor noastre energetice ne menţine conexiunea cu energia violetă.

În Tao credem că, dacă îţi transformi şi îţi rafinezi energia, dacă te conectezi la energia violetă, dacă te dăruieşti şi te goleşti, universul te va umple de cunoaştere vindecătoare şi universală (figura 6.6). Dacă nu eşti purificat, nu poţi primi. Nu poţi să dai gunoi şi să primeşti în schimb energie.

Figura 6.6. În taoism credem că nu putem primi ceea ce vrem şi avem nevoie cât timp nu lucrăm pentru a ne rafina energia şi nu o utilizăm pentru a-i ajuta pe alţii.

Practicienii învaţă modestia, deoarece practicile ne amintesc constant că suntem nişte picături minuscule într-un ocean de qi. Compasiunea creşte pe măsură ce aflăm cât de puţin ştie omul obişnuit despre cum să-şi gestioneze propria energie şi recunoaştem că, dacă judecăm pe cineva sau dacă îi purtăm pică, vom avea mai mult de lucru pentru a ne-o controla.

Avantajele noii abordări

Practicile Tao Universal ne arată cum să nu ne temem de părţile negative ale vieţii. Le putem accepta, transforma şi utiliza ca să creăm energie nouă şi sănătoasă pentru noi înşine. Putem primi în viaţa noastră energiile mai dense şi mai întunecate şi le putem modifica printr-un procedeu similar transformării cărbunelui în diamant. Într-un anumit sens, Tao Universal este un program antic de reciclare. Însă nu reciclăm numai hârtie, carton, metal şi plastic. Ne reciclăm şi emoţiile toxice. În loc să le lansăm prin cuvinte răutăcioase sau să le lăsăm să degenereze în mintea şi în corpul nostru, le transformăm şi le trimitem în pământ pentru a fi reciclate. Aşa cum inspirăm oxigen şi expirăm dioxid de carbon, iar pământul face opusul, ne putem trimite toxinele în pământ, care le transformă în energie ce ne poate fi returnată.

Detoxifierea şi echilibrul nu sunt activităţi de făcut o dată la câţiva ani, ca un soi de revizie a maşinii. Cu cât ne păstrăm sistemul mai curat, mai echilibrat şi mai puternic, cu atât ne putem menţine conexiunea la energiile formatoare mai pure şi mai luminoase ale universului şi la cunoaşterea universală care ne înconjoară.

Persoanele care practică qi gong elimină toxine în diverse moduri: strănutul, eructaţiile, vânturile, plânsul, suflatul nasului, defecaţia, urinarea şi vărsăturile. Dintr-o perspectivă bazată pe energie, nu considerăm aceste acte dezgustătoare sau neadecvate (deşi nu facem tot posibilul să ignorăm sau să sfidăm tradiţiile culturale locale). Oare chiar este mai bine să îţi ţii toate toxinele în interior, ca să nu le elimini, făcând ceva considerat nepoliticos de alţii? Dacă nu eliminăm toxinele emoţionale şi pe cele cauzate de mediu, ele vor acţiona în corp asemenea ruginii. Slăbim şi îmbătrânim înainte de vreme. Când canalele care ne distribuie energia în corp se înfundă, încep să-şi facă apariţia ridurile, părul alb şi durerile.

Sistemul Tao Universal are capacitatea sistematică şi cuprinzătoare de a-i învăţa pe oameni cum să se vindece, mai întâi punând accent pe corp, apoi pe emoţii şi în cele din urmă concentrându-se mai mult asupra spiritului. Aşadar, combinarea practicilor Tao Universal cu EMDR constituie o metodă mai cuprinzătoare şi mai eficientă de a elimina problemele emoţionale adânc înrădăcinate din propriul sistem decât aplicarea tehnicii EMDR simple.

1. Noua abordare nu necesită multe explicaţii în vederea pregătirii clientului.
2. Spre deosebire de tehnica EMDR simplă, conexiunile neconştientizate la problema tratată nu revin des în minte pe parcursul procesului, dar sunt abordate. În multe cazuri, acest aspect face ca experienţa să fie mai puţin emoţională şi mai potrivită pentru a fi efectuată ca autovindecare.
3. Pentru că organele interne sunt sursa sănătăţii mintale, emoţionale şi fizice, faptul că ne concentrăm mai mult asupra corpului şi în mod deosebit asupra organelor interne face ca efectele problemei să fie abordate fără a le identifica şi a le stabili ca obiectiv dinainte.

4. Te poţi concentra asupra problemei în orice mod vrei, în loc să alegi o imagine specifică din memorie. Nu toată lumea are amintiri vizuale legate de problema de tratat.
5. Abordarea se poate adapta cu uşurinţă pentru a fi utilizată în cadrul unui grup.
6. Construirea convingerilor pozitive – necesare abordării problemei dacă reapare – pare să se petreacă automat.
7. De obicei, nu oboseşti când efectuezi practicile.
8. Abordarea este suficient de simplă pentru ca, după o şedinţă sau două, majoritatea persoanelor să poată exersa singure ghidându-se după un rezumat scris.
9. Unele persoane care nu au reuşit să facă EMDR folosesc cu succes această practică combinată, deoarece conţine mai multe aspecte încorporate care le menţin calme pe parcurs.
10. Unele persoane simt că încărcătura din jurul problemei alese este eliminată după câteva seturi de procesare.

Elemente-cheie ale reciclării emoţionale taoiste

Descriem în continuare elementele esenţiale ale practicii care te pot ajuta să-ţi eliberezi şi să-ţi dizolvi sentimentele negative legate de întâmplări din viaţa ta şi peste care nu ai reuşit să treci singur.

Vizualizarea duce la actualizare

O veche zicală qi gong spune: „Mintea se mişcă şi qi-ul o urmează”. De asemenea, este adevărat şi că qi-ul se mişcă, iar sângele îl urmează. Qi-ul nu este o energie inteligentă, însă poate merge oriunde, străbătând ţesuturile, spaţiul şi timpul. Dacă ne concentrăm mintal şi ne conectăm la energia violetă, ne putem vindeca la toate nivelurile.

Armonizarea cu propriile organe

În sistemul nostru, conform teoriei medicinei chineze, credem că sănătatea noastră mintală, fizică, emoţională şi spirituală se creează în organele interne. Unele organe interne sunt solide. Ele sunt numite organe yin. Transformă energia provenită din alimentaţia şi din mediul nostru. Atunci când sunt în echilibru, ele creează virtuţi şi sănătate la toate nivelurile. Când sunt în dezechilibru, generează toxine, gânduri negative, sentimente negative şi degradare fizică. Fiecare organ yin este asociat unui organ yang, unui organ de simţ, unei direcţii, unei culori, unui anotimp, unui sunet şi unui element.

Organele sunt transformatoarele care ne permit accesul la aceste dimensiuni. Organele au memorie. Amintirile noastre sunt stocate în organele interne. Pe acest subiect s-au scris tomuri întregi. Un exemplu este cartea lui Paul Pearsall The Heart's Code, ce oferă relatări fascinante despre pacienţi care, după un transplant de inimă, au dobândit sentimentele, preferinţele şi chiar amintirile donatorilor de cord. Volumul susţine ideea taoistă conform căreia sănătatea noastră pe toate planurile este creată prin intermediul organelor interne, care o şi stochează.

Figura 6.7. Surâsul produce reacţii chimice care încălzesc energia din corp şi facilitează procesul de vindecare.

Atunci când zâmbim, în corp pot avea loc o serie de reacţii uimitoare (figura 6.7). Când surâdem şi ne concentrăm asupra unui anumit organ intern, putem direcţiona beneficiile energiei surâzătoare spre organul respectiv. Dacă surâdem organelor interne în ordinea corectă, cunoscută sub denumirea „ciclu creativ”, atunci transformăm energia toxică din toate organele rând pe rând, creăm virtuţile în fiecare organ şi le combinăm într-o ordine în care se completează reciproc. Laolaltă, aceste virtuţi se combină creând compasiunea. Detalii despre ordinea corectă se găsesc în capitolul următor, în cadrul exerciţiului Surâsul Interior.

Concentrarea asupra culorilor

Culoarea este o frecvenţă a energiei. Concentrarea asupra culorii corecte în timp ce te axezi pe fiecare organ intern creează frecvenţa corectă a qi-ului în organul respectiv, astfel încât să se echilibreze şi să se vindece, revenind la starea sa sănătoasă naturală (figura 6.8).

Culoarea corectă pe care trebuie să o vizualizezi când te concentrezi asupra inimii este roşul.

Vizualizarea splinei galbene te ajută să reglezi energia acestui organ.

Albul este culoarea corectă pe care trebuie să o vizualizezi când te concentrezi asupra plămânilor.

Vizualizarea culorii albastre atunci când te concentrezi asupra rinichilor îi va detoxifia şi îi va energiza.

Pentru a duce tipul corect de qi în ficat, trebuie să vizualizezi culoarea verde în jurul lui.

Surâde şi concentrează-te asupra culorii corespunzătoare fiecărui organ şi priveşte-l până când culoarea din jurul lui devine clară şi strălucitoare. Atunci când este întunecată şi tulbure, în organul respectiv încă se creează emoţii toxice. Surâzând corect fiecărui organ, poţi să transformi energia toxică şi să cultivi virtuţile în el.

Figura 6.8. Concentrarea asupra culorii corecte corespunzătoare fiecărui organ te ajută să-l acordezi cu frecvenţa corectă a vibraţiei.

Utilizarea mişcărilor oculare pentru a degaja energia blocată

Numeroase tradiţii recunosc legătura dintre ochi şi spirit. Se spune că ochii sunt oglinda sufletului. Programarea neurolingvistică recunoaşte că ochii noştri se concentrează în direcţii diferite atunci când ne gândim la trecut, la prezent sau la viitor. Medicina tradiţională chineză acceptă că ochii sunt conectaţi energetic la întregul corp, astfel fiind capabili să-i afecteze starea de sănătate. Taoismul recunoaşte de mii de ani puterea ochilor de a direcţiona qi-ul.

Pentru a înlătura blocajele energetice formate în sistemul nostru din cauza unora sau a tuturor factorilor negativi enumeraţi anterior, trebuie să le depistăm şi să utilizăm mişcările oculare într-un mod nou, pentru a le elimina. În acest sens, sunt necesare concentrarea minţii asupra problemei, culorii şi punctului corecte din corp, apoi mişcarea ochilor astfel încât să dizolve blocajul. Accesul la cunoaşterea universală de la Sursă devine mai simplu pe măsură ce blocajele se dizolvă. Nu fi surprins de ceea ce gândeşti, de ceea ce simţi la nivel emoţional, de percepţiile tale fizice sau de ceea ce îţi imaginezi pe parcurs. Nu eşti ciudat sau ţicnit. De fapt, dacă experienţele tale pe parcursul exerciţiului sunt neaşteptate şi derutante, probabil că îl efectuezi corect.

Mişcările oculare în diverse direcţii te pot ajuta să circuli energia în corp şi să obţii beneficii specifice. Mişcarea corectă a ochilor atunci când te axezi pe o experienţă bulversantă te poate ajuta să finalizezi procesarea şi să transformi emoţiile din jurul evenimentului respectiv în energie virtuoasă.

- Mişcările oculare dintr-o parte în alta, privind la stânga şi la dreapta, pot şterge legătura cu amintirile din trecut. Ele creează un curent electric alternativ ce poate descompune energia interioară.
- Mişcările oculare spiralate însoţite de gânduri, sentimente şi senzaţii corporale pozitive, conectate la energia fiecărui organ intern solid, te pot ajuta să reciclezi şi să transformi energia emoţională legată de o problemă din trecut (figura 6.9).

Efectuarea acestor mişcări spiralate în sens invers acelor de ceasornic, realizând spirale tot mai mari, scoate experienţa la exterior (adesea intensificând-o); dacă efectuezi aceste mişcări în sens invers, spre interior, cercurile tot mai mici colectează energia.

- Mişcările oculare după tiparul unui 8 vertical te ajută să te conectezi la energia eternităţii.
- Mişcarea ochilor după tiparul unui 8 orizontal te ajută să te conectezi la energia infinitului.

- Dacă îţi roteşti ochii înapoi, descriind un cerc, circuli energia din partea din faţă a corpului (Canalul Concepţiei) spre partea din spate, în jos (Canalul Conducător), ca să te menţii calm.
- Mişcarea ochilor în jos în partea din faţă şi în sus în partea din spate stimulează fluxul energetic în cealaltă direcţie, ceea ce te ajută să te energizezi şi să-ţi măreşti concentrarea.

Figura 6.9. Taoiştii utilizează de mii de ani mişcările oculare pentru a circula energia în corp în moduri eficiente, ca să stimuleze vindecarea.

În această tehnică, procesarea utilizează în general multipli de nouă mişcări. Nouă este un număr important în taoism. Simbolizează reîntoarcerea. De exemplu, nouă ori doi este egal cu optsprezece. Unu plus opt ne readuce la nouă. Nouă ori trei este egal cu douăzeci şi şapte. Doi plus şapte ne readuce la nouă.

Putem face analogie cu un calculator pentru a înţelege cum transformă această metodă energia legată de o traumă, de un factor declanşator, de o fobie sau de o durere din trecut. Atunci când vrei să ştergi un fişier din calculator, mai întâi accesezi fişierul respectiv, apoi apeşi butonul „şterge” şi îl trimiţi la coşul de gunoi, după care activezi funcţia „goleşte coşul de gunoi”, pentru a declanşa reciclarea şi procesul de transformare, creând astfel mai mult spaţiu. În practica descrisă, mişcările oculare înainte şi înapoi sunt folosite pentru ştergerea fişierului şi a legăturilor către acesta, iar mişcările în spirală şi de rotire – pentru reciclarea şi transformarea energiei, precum şi pentru crearea unei energii noi, pozitive.

Practici taoiste fundamentale pentru purificarea organelor Surâsul Interior, Orbita Microcosmică şi Cele Şase Sunete Vindecătoare Organele interne sunt transformatoarele sănătăţii noastre fizice, mintale, emoţionale şi spirituale. Când echilibrăm, detoxifiem şi fortificăm qi-ul din organele interne, ne putem ameliora sănătatea şi starea de bine pe toate planurile. Dacă este prea toxic sau în dezechilibru, orice organ intern poate crea anumite emoţii negative. Dar, dacă este curat şi în echilibru, poate crea virtuţi specifice.

Atunci când este toxică sau în dezechilibru, inima creează grabă, nerăbdare, ură şi cruzime. Echilibrarea energiei sale creează virtuţile bucuriei, fericirii şi iubirii. Ne ajută să fim optimişti cu privire la viitor.

Dacă nu este sănătoasă, splina poate crea îngrijorare, gândire negativă şi prea multe gânduri. Când energia ei este purificată şi în echilibru, ne ajută să ne simţim deschişi şi încrezători.

Atunci când sunt în echilibru, plămânii creează virtuţile curajului şi echităţii. Când se chinuie să funcţioneze, pot crea tristeţe, supărare şi depresie.

Frica, anxietatea, fobiile şi trauma se manifestă în rinichi, dacă aceştia sunt intoxicaţi. Blândeţea, calmul şi liniştea apar după înlăturarea sau după transformarea toxinelor. Rinichii sunt asociaţi cu emoţiile create de evenimente din trecut. Echilibrul în rinichi favorizează crearea sentimentelor de iertare şi pace interioară faţă de întâmplările din trecut.

Ficatul creează furie, frustrare, gelozie, invidie şi ruşine când energia sa este în dezechilibru. Generozitatea şi bunătatea apar atunci când i se echilibrează energia.

Surâsul Interior

Meditaţia Surâsului Interior, care aduce energie pozitivă în organele şi în glandele interne, este o practică taoistă de qi gong ce ne învaţă cum trebuie reinstalată corespunzător pacea în interiorul acestora. Ea deschide practica Orbitei Microcosmice, care asigură circulaţia sănătoasă a energiei în toate organele. În corp există două canale majore, Canalul Concepţiei şi Canalul Conducător. Canalul Concepţiei se află în partea din faţă a corpului, iar Canalul Conducător mai mult în partea din spate. Cele două canale sunt conectate, formând o orbită eliptică în jurul corpului. Punctele prezente de-a lungul orbitei se conectează cu celelalte canale de acupunctură din corp.

Meditaţia Surâsului Interior

Pentru a începe meditaţia Surâsului Interior, aşază-te pe marginea unui scaun, cu mâinile împreunate şi ochii închişi.

Partea din faţă: Canalul Concepţiei

1. Conştientizează energia cosmică surâzătoare din faţa ta şi inspir-o prin ochi.
2. Lasă energia surâzătoare să pătrundă prin punctul dintre sprâncene. Las-o să-ţi curgă în nas şi pe obraji şi să-ţi ridice colţurile gurii, în timp ce îţi duci limba în poziţie de repaus pe cerul gurii.
3. Surâde în jos spre gât, tiroidă, paratiroide şi timus.
4. Surâde în inimă, simţind că bucuria şi iubirea din ea se răspândesc la plămâni, ficat, splină, pancreas, rinichi şi organele genitale (figura 7.1).

Figura 7.1. Surâsul în partea din faţă: principalele organe vitale

Partea mediană: tractul digestiv

1. Adu energie surâzătoare în ochi, apoi în jos, spre gură.
2. Înghite-ţi saliva în timp ce surâzi în jos stomacului, intestinului subţire (duoden, jejun şi ileon), intestinului gros (colonul ascendent, colonul transvers şi colonul descendent), rectului şi anusului (figura 7.2).

Figura 7.2. Surâsul în partea mediană: tractul digestiv

Partea din spate: Canalul Conducător

1. Surâde şi priveşte la aproximativ 7,5 cm în sus, spre punctul dintre sprâncene şi spre glanda pituitară (figura 7.3).
2. Direcţionează surâsul în cea de-a Treia Sală, o cavitate mică situată adânc în centrul creierului. Simte sala cum se extinde şi creşte datorită luminii aurii strălucitoare din creier.
3. Surâde în talamus, glanda pineală (Palatul de Cristal) şi în emisfera stângă şi în cea dreaptă ale creierului.

4. Surâde mezencefalului şi trunchiului cerebral, apoi bazei craniului.
5. Surâde în jos celor şapte vertebre cervicale, celor douăsprezece vertebre toracice, celor cinci vertebre lombare, apoi sacrumului şi coccisului.
6. Reîmprospătează energia surâzătoare iubitoare, liniştitoare din ochi, apoi surâde succesiv în jos spre partea din faţă, spre partea mediană şi spre partea din spate. Acum surâde-le simultan, simţindu-te scăldat într-o cascadă răcoritoare sau într-o lumină strălucitoare de energie cosmică, surâsuri, bucurie şi iubire.

Figura 7.3. Surâsul în partea din spate: Canalul Conducător

Colectarea energiei în ombilic

1. Adună toată energia surâzătore în zona ombilicală – la aproximativ 4 cm în interiorul corpului. Roteşte această energie în spirală cu ajutorul minţii sau al mâinilor, din punctul central spre exterior. (Nu depăşi diafragma şi nici osul pubian.)
2. Bărbaţi: Du-ţi palmele deasupra ombilicului, stânga deasupra dreptei. Colectează energia şi roteşte-o mintal într-o spirală pornind de la ombilic spre exterior de 36 de ori în sensul acelor de ceasornic, apoi spre interior de 24 de ori în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic.

Femei: Du-ţi palmele deasupra ombilicului, dreapta deasupra stângii. Colectează energia şi roteşte-o mintal într-o spirală pornind de la ombilic spre exterior, de 36 de ori în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic, apoi spre interior de 24 de ori în sensul acelor de ceasornic.

3. Încheie stocând energia în siguranţă în ombilic.

Orbita Microcosmică

Orbita Microcosmică este fundamentul practicilor qi gong. Practicarea regulată a acestei străvechi metode ezoterice elimină stresul şi tensiunea nervoasă, energizează organele interne, reface sănătatea ţesuturilor vătămate şi dă o senzaţie puternică de stare de bine. Meditaţia Orbitei Microcosmice fortifică qi-ul originar şi te învaţă elementele de bază ale circulării qi-ului. Permite deschiderea punctelor din palme, din tălpi, a punctului dintre sprâncene şi a celui din creştetul capului. Aceşti centri specifici sunt principalele puncte prin care energia poate fi absorbită, condensată şi transformată în forţă vitală proaspătă.

Meditaţia Orbitei Microcosmice trezeşte, circulă şi dirijează qi-ul prin Canalul Conducător, care urcă în partea din spate a corpului de la coccis până la cap, apoi coboară în partea din faţă prin spaţiul dintre baza nasului şi buza superioară şi de-a lungul Canalului Concepţiei (numit şi Canalul Funcţional), care urcă în partea din faţă a corpului de la perineu până la spaţiul dintre bărbie şi buza inferioară (figura 7.4).

Figura 7.4. Orbita Microcosmică

Deschiderea punctelor prezente pe Orbita Microcosmică şi circularea energiei de-a lungul ei îţi dau energie şi concentrare dacă dirijezi energia de jos în sus în partea din spate a corpului, apoi de sus în jos în partea din faţă. Vei obţine relaxare dacă dirijezi energia în direcţia opusă, adică de jos în sus în partea din faţă şi de sus în jos în partea din spate. Folosim Orbita Microcosmică în aceste exerciţii pentru a ne simţi echilibraţi.

Meditaţia Orbitei Microcosmice

1. Concentrează-te asupra dan-tien-ului inferior (zona în care este stocat qi-ul originar, situată între ombilic, rinichi şi organele sexuale). Simte pulsaţia în această zonă, observă dacă zona este tensionată sau relaxată, rece sau caldă, dacă se dilată sau dacă se contractă. Observă eventualele senzaţii de qi: furnicături, căldură, dilatare, pulsaţii, senzaţii electrice sau magnetice. Lasă-le să crească şi să se extindă. Apoi lasă această energie să se reverse spre centrul ombilical.
2. Foloseşte-ţi intenţia (puterea minţii-ochilor-inimii) pentru a face o spirală în punctul ombilicului, ghidând şi mişcând qi-ul. Lasă energia să se reverse în jos, spre centrul sexual (Palatul Ovarian sau Spermal, ambele situate în osul pubian).
3. Circulă energia de la centrul sexual la perineu, apoi în jos, până la tălpi.
4. Atrage energia în sus, din tălpi spre perineu şi spre sacrum.
5. Atrage energia în sus, de la sacrum spre Poarta Vieţii (punctul de pe coloana vertebrală aflat în dreptul ombilicului).
6. Atrage energia în sus, spre punctul de la jumătatea coloanei vertebrale (vertebra T11).
7. Atrage energia în sus, spre baza craniului (Perna de Jad).
8. Atrage energia în sus, spre creştetul capului.
9. Dirijează energia în jos, din creştetul capului spre punctul dintre sprâncene.
10. Du-ţi vârful limbii spre cerul gurii, apasă şi relaxează de câteva ori; apoi atinge uşor cerul gurii, percepând senzaţia de electrizare sau de furnicături în vârful limbii. Dirijează energia în jos, de la punctul dintre sprâncene spre punctul de întâlnire dintre vârful limbii şi cerul gurii.
11. Dirijează energia în jos, din cerul gurii, prin limbă, spre centrul gâtului.
12. Dirijează energia în jos, din gât spre centrul inimii.
13. Du energia în jos, din inimă spre plexul solar, şi simte strălucirea unui mic soare.
14. Dirijează energia înapoi în jos, spre ombilic.
15. Dirijează energia prin toată această succesiune de puncte de cel puţin nouă ori. Odată deschise căile, îţi poţi lăsa energia să curgă continuu, ca un râu, fără a trebui să te opreşti în fiecare punct.

16. Încheie când vrei, colectând energia în ombilic (vezi indicaţiile specifice pentru bărbaţi şi femei de la p. 135, la finalul meditaţiei Surâsului Interior).

Cele Şase Sunete Vindecătoare

Fiecare organ intern poate fi răcorit şi detoxifiat ulterior prin utilizarea unui sunet specific. Poţi emite aceste sunete pentru a rămâne cât mai calm cu putinţă în timp ce lucrezi pentru a-ţi rezolva problemele. În cadrul exerciţiilor cu sunete descrise mai jos poţi emite sunetele fără să mişti mâinile. Totuşi, dacă stăpâneşti deja meditaţia completă a celor Şase Sunete Vindecătoare, poţi face şi mişcări ale mâinilor.

Sunetul plămânilor: primul sunet cosmic vindecător

Sunetul plămânilor este metalic. Seamănă cu vibraţia unui clopot şi activează qi-ul plămânilor.

Caracteristici

Organ asociat: intestinul gros Element: metal
Anotimp: toamna
Culoare: alb
Emoţii: mâhnire şi tristeţe
Virtuţi: curaj şi echitate
Simţuri asociate: olfactiv (nas) şi tactil (piele)
Gust: picant
Părţi ale corpului asociate: piept, partea interioară a braţelor, degetele mari
Sunet: sss-s-s-s-s-s (cu limba în spatele dinţilor) (figura 7.5)

Figura 7.5. Poziţia gurii pentru sunetul plămânilor. Apropie maxilarele astfel încât dinţii să se atingă. Trage colţurile gurii spre spate.

Postură şi exerciţiu

1. Stai aşezat, ţinând spatele drept, cu mâinile pe piept, în dreptul plămânilor, şi cu ochii închişi. Surâde plămânilor. Conştientizează calitatea energiei din plămâni (figura 7.7). Vizualizează o lumină albă, proaspătă şi pură ca energia munţilor, şi auzi sunetul metalic.
2. Inspiră adânc, deschide ochii şi întinde braţele înainte, cu palmele orientate spre plămâni (figura 7.7). Când mâinile ajung la nivelul ochilor, începe să roteşti palmele, ducându-le deasupra capului până când sunt orientate în sus şi spre exterior. Îndreaptă degetele de la mâini unele spre altele. Ţine coatele flexate şi răsucite spre exterior; nu îndrepta braţele (figura 7.8).

Apropie maxilarele astfel încât dinţii să se atingă uşor şi depărtează puţin buzele în timp ce expiri lent scoţând printre dinţi sunetul sss-s-s-s-s-s. La început poţi scoate sunetul plămânilor tare, dar în cele din urmă trebuie să îl exersezi muteşte. Simte că sunetul pune în mişcare qi-ul din plămâni şi că eventualele toxine şi exces de căldură sunt eliminate din plămâni în timp ce sacii care înconjoară plămânii se comprimă.

Figura 7.6. Conştientizează-ţi plămânii.

Figura 7.7. Adună energia în plămâni.

Figura 7.8. Scoate sunetul plămânilor.

Notă: Muteşte înseamnă că rosteşti atât de încet, încât doar tu poţi să auzi sunetul şi să simţi vibraţia în plămâni. Trebuie să expiri lent şi complet. De asemenea, termenul saci se referă la straturile de ţesut numit fascii, care înconjoară fiecare organ.

3. După ce ai expirat complet, roteşte palmele şi ia din lumina albă. Revarsă această lumină din creştetul capului în plămâni (figura 7.9). Lasă braţele în jos şi ţine palmele în dreptul plămânilor, radiind în ei lumina albă strălucitoare şi curajul.
4. Odihneşte-te, închide ochii şi conştientizează-ţi plămânii. Surâde-le şi imaginează-ţi că încă emiţi sunetul lor. Simte vibraţia sunetului cum mişcă şi curăţă energia din plămâni (figura 7.10). Respiră normal şi vizualizează-ţi plămânii radiind cu o lumină albă strălucitoare. Astfel îţi vei fortifica plămânii şi vei activa curajul din ei. Cu fiecare respiraţie, încearcă să simţi că energia metalică albă proaspătă înlocuieşte excesul de energie fierbinte, toxică şi deprimată.
5. Cultivă emoţiile bune. Aceasta este cea mai importantă parte a exerciţiului. Alocă tot timpul de care ai nevoie pentru a stabili o legătură cu organele. După ce te debarasezi de excesul de căldură şi laşi energia metalică albă să ajungă în plămâni, calităţile emoţionale vor avea loc unde să se dezvolte. Concentrează-te asupra sentimentelor de echitate şi curaj în timp ce transformi eventualele sentimente de tristeţe sau de mâhnire. Ridică-te drept în picioare ca să simţi curajul şi încearcă să menţii senzaţia sunetului plămânilor tot mai mult după fiecare exerciţiu şi în viaţa de zi cu zi.

Repetă sunetul plămânilor de 3-6 ori. În caz de tristeţe, depresie, răceli, gripă, dureri de dinţi, astm, emfizem sau depresie, repetă acest exerciţiu de 6, 9, 12 sau 24 de ori.

Figura 7.9. Revarsă energia în plămâni.

Figura 7.10. Surâde plămânilor.

Sunetul rinichilor: al doilea sunet cosmic vindecător

Sunetul rinichilor este un sunet de apă şi activează qi-ul rinichilor.

Caracteristici

Organ asociat: vezica urinară
Element: apă
Anotimp: iarnă
Culoare: albastru-închis
Emoţie: frică
Virtuţi: bunătate, calm şi linişte, vigilenţă
Părţi ale corpului: părţile laterale ale piciorului, interiorul coapselor, piept

Simţuri: auz (urechi), oase

Gust: sărat

Sunet: ciu-u-u-u-u (ca şi cum ai sufla într-o lumânare: buzele formează un „O”) (figura 7.11)

Figura 7.11. Rotunjeşte buzele, scoţând sunetul făcut când stingi o lumânare.

Postură şi exerciţiu

1. Aşază-te, ţine spatele drept, pune palmele deasupra rinichilor, închide ochii. Surâde rinichilor. Conştientizează calitatea energiei din rinichi. Imaginează-ţi o lumină albastră, soarele strălucind deasupra oceanului (figura 7.12).
2. Inspiră adânc, deschide ochii şi apropie picioarele, cu gleznele şi genunchii atingându-se. Apleacă-te în faţă şi împreunează degetele de la mâini în jurul genunchilor. Trage braţele întinse, aplecându-ţi trunchiul înainte (astfel, spatele se arcuieşte în zona rinichilor). Concomitent, ridică privirea înainte, continuând să tragi de braţe din partea inferioară a spatelui. Simte întinderea în coloana vertebrală. Rotunjeşte buzele şi expiră uşor scoţând sunetul ciu-u-u-u-u, ca şi cum ai stinge o lumânare (figura 7.13).

Figura 7.12. Surâde rinichilor.

Figura 7.13. Scoate sunetul rinichilor.

Concomitent, contractă-ţi abdomenul trăgându-l înspre rinichi. La început, poţi emite sunetul rinichilor tare, dar în cele din urmă trebuie să îl exersezi muteşte. Simte că sunetul pune în mişcare qi-ul din rinichi; eventualele toxine şi căldura în exces sunt eliminate din rinichi în timp ce sacii din jurul rinichilor se comprimă.

3. După ce expiri complet, stai drept, depărtează picioarele, du braţele deasupra creştetului şi ia cu mâinile din lumina albastră. Revarsă această lumină peste corp şi în rinichi. Coboară braţele şi ţine palmele deasupra rinichilor. Radiază lumina albastră, blândeţea şi liniştea în rinichi.
4. Du din nou mâinile la rinichi. Odihneşte-te, închide ochii şi conştientizează-ţi rinichii. Ascultă-ţi rinichii. Surâde-le şi imaginează-ţi că încă emiţi sunetul rinichilor. Simte că vibraţia sunetului se mişcă şi curăţă energia din rinichi (figura 7.14).

Figura 7.14. Du energia în jos, spre rinichi.

Respiră normal şi priveşte-ţi rinichii cum radiază o lumină albastră, răcoroasă. Acest exerciţiu îţi fortifică rinichii şi activează blândeţea şi liniştea în ei. Cu fiecare respiraţie, încearcă să simţi că energia apei albastre strălucitoare înlocuieşte energia fierbinte, toxică şi frica în exces (figura 7.15).

5. Cultivă emoţiile bune. Aceasta este cea mai importantă parte a exerciţiului. Alocă tot timpul de care ai nevoie pentru a stabili o legătură cu rinichii. După ce te debarasezi de excesul de căldură şi laşi energia apei albastre răcoroase să ajungă în rinichi, calităţile emoţionale vor avea loc unde să se dezvolte.

Figura 7.15. Adună energia în rinichi.

Concentrează-te asupra sentimentelor de blândeţe, linişte şi vigilenţă, în timp ce-ţi transformi frica rămasă. De asemenea, simte că blândeţea relaxează partea inferioară a spatelui. Încearcă să menţii senzaţia acestei energii tot mai mult după fiecare exerciţiu şi în viaţa de zi cu zi.

Repetă aceşti paşi de 3-6 ori. Poţi repeta exerciţiul de mai multe ori pentru a atenua frica, extenuarea, ameţeala, tinitusul sau durerile de spate.

Sunetul ficatului: al treilea sunet cosmic vindecător

Sunetul ficatului este sunetul lemnului şi activează qi-ul ficatului.

Caracteristici

Organ asociat: vezica biliară
Element: lemn
Anotimp: primăvara
Culoare: verde
Emoţie: furie
Virtute: bunătate
Părţi ale corpului: interiorul coapselor, zona inghinală, diafragmă, coaste
Simţuri: văz (ochii), lacrimi
Gust: acru
Sunet: ş-ş-ş-ş-ş-ş (limba în apropierea cerului gurii) (figura 7.16)

Figura 7.16. Pentru a scoate sunetul ş-ş-ş-ş-ş-ş, expiră ţinând limba în apropierea cerului gurii.

Postură şi exerciţiu

1. Aşază-te confortabil, cu spatele drept, mâinile stau relaxate deasupra ficatului, ochii închişi. Surâde ficatului până simţi că intri în contact cu el (figura 7.17). Conştientizează calitatea energiei din ficat. Imaginează-ţi o pădure mare şi verde. Priveşte soarele strălucind peste pădure, creând forţă vitală şi lumină verde.
2. Inspiră adânc, deschide ochii şi întinde braţele de o parte şi de alta a corpului, cu palmele orientate în sus. Ridică lent braţele din lateral spre creştetul capului, urmărind gestul cu ochii. Încrucişează degetele de la mâini şi roteşte mâinile împreunate astfel încât palmele să fie orientate în sus. Împinge palmele în sus şi întinde braţele din umeri; coatele ar trebui să împingă spre spate.

Figura 7.17. Surâde ficatului.

Înclină-te puţin spre stânga, trăgând uşor de ficat. Deschide ochii mai bine, deoarece ei sunt deschiderea ficatului. Expiră lent sunetul ş-ş-ş-ş-ş-ş tare, iar în cele din urmă muteşte (figura 7.18). Simte că sunetul pune în mişcare energia din ficat şi că toate toxinele şi căldura în exces sunt eliminate din ficat, în timp ce sacul din jurul lui se comprimă.

Figura 7.18. Scoate sunetul ficatului.

3. După ce expiri complet, stai drept, desparte mâinile şi ia din energia verde. Revarsă această lumină peste corp şi în ficat (figura 7.19). Coboară lent braţele, cu palmele orientate spre exterior, ia din nou lumină verde şi du ambele mâini în dreptul ficatului. Radiază lumina verde, energia pădurii şi bunătatea în ficat.

Figura 7.19. Ia lumină verde şi revars-o în ficat.

4. Du din nou mâinile la ficat. Închide ochii şi conştientizează-l. Surâde, priveşte în ficat şi imaginează-ţi că emiţi în continuare sunetul ficatului. Simte că vibraţia sunetului mişcă şi curăţă energia din ficat (figura 7.20).

Respiră normal şi priveşte-ţi ficatul strălucind cu lumina verde care îl reface. Astfel, îţi fortifici ficatul şi activezi bunătatea în el. Cu fiecare respiraţie, încearcă să simţi că energia strălucitoare a lemnului verde înlocuieşte energia fierbinte, toxică în exces, agresivitatea şi frustrarea.

5. Cultivă emoţiile bune. Aceasta este cea mai importantă parte a exerciţiului. Dedică tot timpul de care ai nevoie pentru a stabili o legătură cu ficatul. După ce te debarasezi de excesul de căldură şi laşi energia caldă, umedă şi verde a lemnului să ajungă în ficat, bunătatea va avea loc unde să se dezvolte. Concentrează-te pe virtutea bunătăţii şi a iertării în timp ce transformi furia şi agresivitatea rămase. Simte-te încălzit şi energic şi menţine această senzaţie cât mai mult după încheierea exerciţiului.

Figura 7.20. Adună energia în ficat.

Repetă aceşti paşi de 3-6 ori. Exersează mai mult pentru a elimina furia, pentru a limpezi ochii roşii sau înlăcrimaţi, pentru a înlătura un gust acru sau amar şi a detoxifia ficatul.

Sunetul inimii: al patrulea sunet cosmic vindecător

Sunetul inimii este sunetul focului şi activează energia inimii.

Caracteristici

Organ asociat: intestinul subţire Element: foc
Anotimp: vara
Culoare: roşu
Emoţii: grabă, aroganţă, cruzime
Virtuţi: bucurie, onoare, sinceritate
Părţi ale corpului: axile, partea interioară a braţelor
Simţuri: limbă, vorbire
Gust: amar
Sunet: ho-o-o-o-o-o (cu gura larg deschisă) (figura 7.21)

Figura 7.21. Sunetul ho-o-o-o-o-o

Postură şi exerciţiu

1. Aşază-te confortabil, ţine spatele drept, mâinile relaxate în dreptul inimii, ochii închişi. Surâde în jos inimii până când simţi că eşti în contact cu ea (figura 7.22). Conştientizează calitatea energiei din inimă. Imaginează-ţi un apus pe ocean, o lumină roşie.
2. Inspiră adânc, deschide ochii şi adoptă aceeaşi postură ca în cazul sunetului ficatului. Totuşi, spre deosebire de exerciţiul anterior, te apleci puţin spre dreapta, pentru a trage uşor de inimă, situată imediat la stânga de centrul pieptului.

Figura 7.22. Surâde în inimă.

Concentrează-te asupra inimii şi simte legătura dintre limbă şi gura deschisă, rotunjeşte buzele şi expiră lent scoţând sunetul ho-o-o-o-o-o tare, iar în cele din urmă muteşte. Simte că sunetul pune în mişcare energia din inimă şi că excesul de căldură şi de toxine este eliminat din inimă, în timp ce sacul din jurul ei se comprimă (figura 7.23).

3. După ce expiri complet, stai drept, desfă mâinile şi ia lumină roşie. Revarsă această lumină peste corp şi în inimă (figura 7.24). Coboară lent braţele, cu palmele orientate spre exterior. Ia din nou lumină şi ţine ambele mâini în dreptul inimii. Radiază lumina roşie, iubirea şi bucuria interioară în inimă.

Figura 7.23. Scoate sunetul inimii.

Figura 7.24. Adună energie în inimă.

4. Adu din nou mâinile în dreptul inimii. Odihneşte-te, închide ochii şi conştientizează-ţi inima. Surâde inimii şi imaginează-ţi că emiţi în continuare sunetul inimii. Simte vibraţia sunetului mişcând şi curăţând energia în inimă. Respiră normal şi priveşte-ţi inima cum străluceşte cu o lumină roşie ca focul.

Astfel, îţi fortifici inima şi activezi iubirea, bucuria interioară şi sinceritatea în inimă. Cu fiecare respiraţie, încearcă să simţi că lumina caldă roşie înlocuieşte energia fierbinte şi toxică în exces, precum şi graba, aroganţa şi ura din inimă (figura 7.25).

Figura 7.25. Orientează-ţi simţurile spre inimă.

5. Cultivă emoţiile bune. Aceasta este cea mai importantă parte a exerciţiului. Alocă tot timpul de care ai nevoie pentru a intra în contact cu inima (figura 7.26).

Figura 7.26. Energia iubitoare creşte în inimă.

După ce elimini excesul de căldură şi laşi energia roşie ca focul să se răspândească în inimă, calităţile emoţionale vor avea loc să se dezvolte. Simte cum iubirea, bucuria, onoarea şi respectul radiază spre exterior (figura 7.27).

Simte că ura, aroganţa sau nerăbdarea rămase se transformă în energie iubitoare în timp ce sinceritatea, onoarea şi respectul îţi cresc în inimă. Încearcă să menţii senzaţia sunetului inimii cât mai mult după încheierea exerciţiului.

Figura 7.27. Atunci când se uşurează de încărcătura şi stresul zilnice, toate organele zâmbesc.

Repetă aceşti paşi de 3-6 ori. Exersează mai mult pentru a atenua inflamaţiile gâtului, herpesul, gingiile sau limba umflate, nervozitatea, toanele şi afecţiunile cardiace.

Sunetul splinei: al cincilea sunet cosmic vindecător

Sunetul splinei este sunetul pământului şi activează energia stomacului, a pancreasului şi a splinei.

Caracteristici

Organe asociate: pancreas, stomac
Element: pământ
Anotimp: vară târzie
Culoare: galben
Emoţii: îngrijorare
Virtuţi: corectitudine, deschidere
Părţi ale corpului: buze, gură
Simţuri: gust
Gust: dulce, neutru
Sunet: hu-u-u-u-u-u (din gât, gutural) (figura 7.28)

Figura 7.28. Expiră emiţând sunetul hu-u-u-u-u-u.

Postură şi exerciţiu

1. Aşază-te confortabil, cu spatele drept, cu mâinile relaxate deasupra splinei şi cu ochii închişi. Surâde stomacului şi splinei până când simţi că eşti în contact cu ele. Conştientizează calitatea energiei din stomac şi din splină. Imaginează-ţi o lumină galbenă, lumina aurie saturată a verii târzii, o lumină stabilă (figura 7.29).

Figura 7.29. Surâde splinei.

2. Inspiră adânc, deschide ochii, du braţele în partea din faţă a corpului şi du cele trei degete din mijloc de la ambele mâini imediat sub stern, în partea stângă a cutiei toracice (figura 7.30).

Priveşte în sus şi apasă delicat cu degetele sub cutia toracică, împingând stomacul sau splina spre spate şi spre partea mediană a spatelui, spre exterior, în timp ce expiri, mai întâi rostind tare, apoi muteşte sunetul hu-u-u-u-u-u. Acesta este un sunet mai gutural, „mai din gât” decât sunetul rinichilor. Spre deosebire de sunetul scos când stingem o lumânare, acesta porneşte din piept, şi nu din gură.

Figura 7.30. Degetele plasate sub cutia toracică, în partea stângă, pregătindu-se să apese pe splină, pe pancreas şi pe stomac.

Simte că sunetul splinei face să vibreze corzile vocale (figura 7.31). Simte că sunetul pune în mişcare energia din stomac şi din splină şi că toxinele şi căldura în exces sunt eliminate din stomac şi din splină în timp ce sacul din jurul acestora se comprimă.

3. După ce ai expirat complet, du braţele spre înainte, îmbrăţişând pământul, şi ia din lumina galbenă. Revarsă această lumină în stomac şi în splină. Du braţele şi mâinile la stomac sau la splină. Radiază lumină galbenă, corectitudine, deschidere şi stabilitate în stomac şi în splină (vezi figura 7.32 de la p. 163).

Figura 7.31. Simte sunetul splinei vibrând.

4. Odihneşte-te, închide ochii şi conştientizează-ţi stomacul şi splina. Surâde-le şi imaginează-ţi că emiţi în continuare sunetul splinei. Simte că vibraţia sunetului mişcă şi curăţă energia din stomac şi din splină.

Respiră normal şi priveşte-ţi stomacul şi splina strălucind cu o lumină galbenă. Astfel, se fortifică cele două organe şi se activează deschiderea, corectitudinea şi stabilitatea în stomac şi în splină. La fiecare respiraţie, încearcă să simţi cum lumina galbenă şi caldă înlocuieşte energia fierbinte, toxică în exces şi grijile rămase în cele două organe.

5. Cultivă emoţiile bune. Aceasta este cea mai importantă parte a exerciţiului.

Dedică tot timpul de care ai nevoie pentru a stabili o legătură cu stomacul şi cu splina. Atunci când elimini excesul de căldură şi laşi energia galbenă a pământului să ajungă în stomac şi în splină, calităţile emoţionale au loc unde să se dezvolte. Simte corectitudinea, deschiderea, echilibrul şi armonia crescând în aceste organe, transformând grijile rămase în ele. Încearcă să menţii senzaţia sunetului splinei cât mai mult după încheierea exerciţiului.

Figura 7.32. Deschiderea şi corectitudinea se dezvoltă în splină.

Repetă aceşti paşi de 3-6 ori. Efectuează exerciţiul de mai multe ori pentru a elimina indigestia, starea de greaţă şi diareea.

Sunetul Triplului Arzător: al şaselea sunet cosmic vindecător

Sintagma Triplul Arzător se referă la cei trei centri energetici ai corpului: partea superioară (creier, inimă şi plămâni) este fierbinte; partea mediană (ficat, rinichi, stomac, pancreas şi splină) este caldă; iar partea inferioară (intestinele gros şi subţire, vezica urinară şi organele sexuale) este rece.

Sunetul hi-i-i-i-i-i (figura 7.33) echilibrează temperatura celor trei niveluri, ducând energia fierbinte în centrul inferior şi energia rece în sus, spre centrul superior. Mai precis, energia fierbinte din zona inimii este dirijată spre zona sexuală mai rece, iar energia rece din abdomenul inferior este dirijată în sus, spre zona inimii.

Figura 7.33. Rosteşte sunetul hi-i-i-i-i-i în timp ce expiri.

Postură şi exerciţiu

1. Întinde-te pe spate sau lasă-te pe spate în scaun (figura 7.34). Surâde, du braţele în sus pentru a colecta qi-ul (figura 7.35), apoi du braţele şi mâinile în dreptul feţei. În timp ce rosteşti sunetul hi-i-i-i-i-i expirând, du braţele lent în jos de-a lungul corpului, dirijând energia din creştetul capului spre picioare (figura 7.36).

Figura 7.34. Odihneşte-te respirând normal şi concentrează-te asupra sunetului Triplului Arzător.

Figura 7.35. Adună energia.

2. Inspiră adânc în toate cele trei cavităţi: piept, plexul solar şi abdomenul inferior, apoi expiră complet. Expiră emiţând sunetul hi-i-i-i-i-i muteşte, mai întâi aplatizând pieptul, apoi plexul solar şi în final abdomenul inferior. Imaginează-ţi un cilindru mare care te presează scoţându-ţi aerul din plămâni şi dirijează energia fierbinte în jos, în timp ce braţele se mişcă de lângă cap în jos, până la dan-tien-ul inferior (figurile 7.37-7.39).

Figura 7.39. Nivelul inferior

3. Odihneşte-te şi concentrează-te (figura 7.40). După ce expiri complet, concentrează-te asupra întregului tract digestiv.

Repetă aceşti paşi de 3-6 ori. Exersează de mai multe ori pentru a atenua insomnia şi stresul. De remarcat că poţi emite sunetul Triplului Arzător în poziţia culcat, pentru a adormi mai uşor.

Reciclarea emoţională taoistă
Exerciţii

Alege-ţi tema

Dacă aceasta este prima oară când încerci să exersezi, îţi recomandăm să parcurgi întregul proces fără să te gândeşti la o temă anume. De fapt, poţi folosi această tehnică de multe ori fără să te concentrezi întotdeauna intenţionat asupra unei anumite chestiuni. Poţi aştepta să vezi pur şi simplu ce apare pe parcurs şi, prin urmare, să lucrezi atât preventiv, cât şi pentru a trata. Te poţi folosi de exerciţii pentru a preveni supraîncărcarea ce duce la depresie, anxietate şi dependenţă.

Altminteri, gândeşte-te la o temă de abordat pentru început. Nu uita că, chiar dacă alegi o temă aparent inofensivă sau minoră, nu poţi şti dinainte câte alte teme cu încărcătură emoţională sunt legate de problema aleasă şi îşi vor face apariţia pe parcurs. Dacă îţi este greu să alegi dintre mai multe teme, este posibil ca unele sau toate să fie legate între ele, motiv pentru care nu este atât de important pe care o tratezi mai întâi. De asemenea, este important să înţelegi că toate problemele pot fi tratate în cele din urmă, aşa că prima nu trebuie să fie neapărat mai important decât altele.

Dacă tot nu reuşeşti să-ţi alegi o temă, parcurge setul de întrebări din subcapitolul „Întrebări deschise” din capitolul următor.

Alege de unde vrei să începi

Pentru a ajunge la problemă şi la echivalentul ei energetic din sistemul tău, trebuie să selectezi un aspect al problemei mai pregnant pentru tine; te vei axa pe acesta ca punct de plecare. Acesta poate fi o imagine care se evidenţiază sau, dacă nu ţi-e uşor să vizualizezi, un sentiment care te-a încercat la momentul respectiv, un gând despre tine pe care-l ai de când a apărut problema sau un sunet ori un miros pe care ţi-l aminteşti. „Mintea se mişcă şi qi-ul o urmează”, deci, indiferent ce alegi drept obiect al concentrării tale, energia va ajunge acolo, iar acesta este începutul procesului de transformare a experienţei respective în ceva mai plăcut.

Asigură-te că ai experimentat tu însuţi aspectul pe care alegi să te axezi şi că nu este o amintire despre incidentul respectiv, pe care nu ai trăit-o efectiv. De exemplu, dacă te poţi vedea în imaginea aleasă, înseamnă că nu este imaginea potrivită. Nu aveai cum să te vezi decât dacă te uitai în oglindă. Nu sări peste paşi şi nu încerca să accelerezi procesul. Este posibil să zăboveşti mult timp asupra anumitor zone ale corpului. Dacă problema este stocată în principal într-o singură zonă sau în câteva, nu are rost să te grăbeşti când treci prin zona respectivă. Acordă acelei părţi a corpului tău atenţia pe care o merită, ca să se poată vindeca.

Pregătirea

Pentru a fi pregătit să procesezi experienţele nerezolvate stocate în sistemul tău, trebuie să fii dedicat, relaxat şi detoxifiat. Deprinderea şi exersarea elementelor taoiste de bază descrise în capitolul anterior – Surâsul Interior, Orbita Microcosmică şi cele Şase Sunete Vindecătoare – garantează deschiderea principalelor căi energetice şi un nivel de qi suficient de puternic pentru a culege roadele acestor exerciţii. De asemenea, este recomandabil să ţii o piatră de împământare (de exemplu, obsidian negru) în mâna receptoare (opusul mâinii cu care scrii) pentru a fi calm pe parcurs şi pentru a-ţi menţine un nivel de energie suficient de ridicat ca să duci procesul la bun sfârşit.

Angajamentul

Cel mai eficient tip de angajament faţă de acest proces este cel neşovăielnic, fără rezerve. A vrea sau a spera că lucrurile se vor ameliora sau a-ţi spune că trebuie să parcurgi acest proces nu este la fel de eficient ca a te hotărî să faci orice pentru a garanta rezolvarea problemelor perturbatoare din viaţa ta. Mintea şi trupul tău sunt conectate. Când îţi iei acest tip de angajament, îţi pregăteşti deja energia blocată pentru a fi deconstruită.

Atitudinea potrivită

Ia-ţi angajamentul conştient de a fi pregătit să te detaşezi de problemă, chiar dacă emoţiile ivite pe parcurs sunt supărătoare. Convinge-te că nu trebuie să te agăţi de sentimentele negative asociate cu problema ta pentru a fi unic. Este posibil să ai emoţii negative imediat ce începi procesarea. De fapt, ele sunt un semn bun. De multe ori, emoţiile trebuie să iasă la suprafaţă înainte de a putea fi eliminate. Detaşarea nu este doar un proces emoţional. Se poate realiza şi fizic, prin lacrimi, căscat, eructaţii, flatulenţă şi prin orice alt proces care elimină reziduurile din corp.

Totuşi, impune-ţi să faci o pauză sau să te opreşti şi să cauţi îndrumarea unui expert dacă devii depăşit de situaţie pe parcurs. Acest proces poate fi neplăcut, dar ar trebui să ducă la vindecare, nu la distrugere. Scopul acestei tehnici este să te ajute să te debarasezi de sentimentele supărătoare, şi nu să îţi creeze mai multe. Dacă eşti sceptic că acest proces te va ajuta, lasă pur şi simplu scepticismul deoparte pe durata exerciţiului, ca să poţi crea cel mai bună atmosferă în care procesul să dea randament maxim. Fii gata să te laşi purtat într-o călătorie care nu va avea întotdeauna sens. Fii gata să treci prin acest proces, indiferent unde vei ajunge.

Detoxifierea

Stresul şi frica vin din rinichi, dacă aceste organe nu sunt în echilibru. Fricţionează delicat partea din spate a corpului în dreptul rinichilor, cu pumnii strânşi lejer, aproximativ 30 de secunde (figura 8.1). Bea apă pentru a-ţi curăţa rinichii şi a-i ajuta să se relaxeze. Clismele efectuate de un profesionist pot fi foarte utile. Elimină pe cât posibil din stilul tău de viaţă stimulente ca ţigările, cofeina şi substanţele ilegale, astfel încât sistemul tău să fie cât mai calm înainte de începerea procesului. Astfel, rişti mai puţin să fii copleşit de proces.

Figura 8.1. Fricţionează-ţi delicat rinichii pentru a favoriza detoxifierea.

Lumini, arome şi sunet

Pe durata exerciţiului, luminează slab încăperea sau stinge lumina. Dacă îţi face plăcere, utilizează aromaterapia pentru a-ţi menţine relaxarea. Aromele precum lămâiţa şi menta au efect calmant. Tămâia se potriveşte într-o zonă ventilată, însă fumul pe care îl produce te poate distrage dacă te afli într-un spaţiu mic, închis. Nu utiliza sunete pentru a te relaxa, cu excepţia sunetelor domoale din natură. Muzica poate fi relaxantă în alte momente, însă pe durata acestui exerciţiu ar putea îngreuna concentrarea minţii asupra amintirilor pe care încerci să le abordezi.

Dacă eşti instruit în practica taoistă a vindecării cosmice şi în qi nei tsang, poţi pregăti încăperea la fel ca pentru aceste practici, pentru a fi sigur de prezenţa forţelor vindecătoare şi că te afli într-un cerc ocrotit.

Încetineşte ritmul şi relaxează-te

Acordă-ţi suficient timp pentru a te linişti şi a-ţi destinde corpul înainte de a trece la paşii următori. Cu cât eşti mai calm înainte de a începe procesarea experienţelor trecute, cu atât mai mult spaţiu de procesare vei avea în interior. Dacă eşti pe punctul de a exploda de nervi înainte de a începe, va fi nevoie de foarte puţin pentru a te destabiliza. Relaxarea corpului înainte de a începe îţi creşte şansele de a reuşi să elimini toxinele închise în tine, conectate la tema pe care o abordezi. În cazul în care corpul îţi este încordat, te agăţi de problemă şi-ţi va ieşi mai greu din sistem.

Pentru a intra în starea potrivită pentru lucru, alege mai întâi un loc liniştit în care să stai, unde te simţi confortabil şi nu eşti întrerupt. Asigură-te că nu ai obligaţii sociale programate imediat după exerciţiu. Este posibil ca ulterior să te simţi obosit şi, probabil, te vei simţi mai în formă pentru a te dedica exerciţiului dacă ştii că este singurul lucru pe care îl ai de făcut o vreme lângă alte persoane. Respiră în abdomenul inferior. Respiră lent, lin şi delicat, dar profund. Inspiră şi expiră pe nas. Nu te forţa. Lasă-ţi pur şi simplu abdomenul să se umple şi să se golească de tot, aşa cum face un prunc abia venit pe lume. În timp ce respiri, îţi desfunzi sistemul şi îi transmiţi mesajul că totul este în regulă.

Postura şezând, de început

1. Stai pe marginea unui scaun, cu tălpile pe podea. Astfel, nu pierzi energie prin picioare; poţi trage energie din pământ şi o parte mai mică din corp va fi izolată de energia pământului.
2. Împreunează lejer mâinile în poală. Astfel, nu pierzi energie prin mâini (figura 8.2a).
3. Du uşor vârful limbii pe cerul gurii, în adâncitura din spatele gingiilor (figura 8.2b) şi ţine gura închisă. Astfel, uneşti energetic cele două jumătăţi ale maxilarului şi cele două canale din Orbita Microcosmică. Acum, corpul tău formează un singur mare circuit conectat cu pământul şi cu energia acestuia.

Figura 8.2. Postura şezând, de început, cu limba pe cerul gurii

Încălzeşte-ţi dan-tien-ul inferior şi rinichii

Pentru a-ţi proteja, a-ţi pregăti şi a-ţi vindeca rinichii, precum şi pentru a opri spirala descendentă de energie, trebuie să ai grijă ca rinichii şi intestinele să fie calde şi moi.

1. Pune mâinile în partea inferioară a abdomenului, ţinând o palmă deasupra celeilalte.
2. Roteşte palmele în spirală: bărbaţii în direcţia acelor de ceasornic şi femeile invers, descriind cercuri mici care se măresc progresiv. Continuă până când îţi simţi abdomenul şi rinichii plăcute, calde şi moi.
3. Roteşte o spirală de energie în dan-tien-ul inferior pentru a-l încălzi şi a-l pregăti pentru munca ce urmează.

Dacă vrei o metodă de relaxare mai cuprinzătoare şi mai sistematică, încearcă exerciţiul următor.

Trei minţi în una singură

1. Alege un loc confortabil şi liniştit în care să te aşezi. Stai cu toată talpa pe podea. Respiră delicat, dar adânc, în abdomenul inferior. Surâde asemenea Mona Lisei. Ridică puţin colţurile gurii şi ale ochilor.
2. Atinge-ţi uşor mijlocul frunţii (nu între sprâncene) cu vârfurile degetelor. Surâde, respiră şi concentrează-te asupra punctului în care se află degetele. Lasă această senzaţie să crească, să se extindă, ori să se concentreze. Degetele tale ating prima minte, Centrul Fericirii.
3. Apoi du lent degetele în jos, spre centrul feţei, urmărindu-le cu mintea. Astfel, degetele poartă cu ele o parte din energia din prima minte. Trece-ţi degetele peste nas, buze şi bărbie.
4. Du-le în jos, de-a lungul gâtului, apoi la stânga şi mai jos, spre inimă. Ţine vârfurile degetelor aici câteva clipe, în timp ce surâzi, respiri şi te concentrezi asupra inimii. Astfel, amesteci energia din prima minte cu energia din a doua minte, sacul din jurul inimii, Centrul Păcii (figura 8.3). Simte-ţi inima caldă şi înmuindu-se. Numim acest lucru „topirea gheţii”.
5. Acum, du degetele de la inimă spre linia mediană a corpului. Apoi du lent degetele în jos, de-a lungul corpului, urmărindu-le din nou cu mintea. Continuă să surâzi şi să respiri pe măsură ce înaintezi. Opreşte-te când ajungi cu degetele la aproximativ 4 cm sub ombilic. Aici se află a treia minte, Centrul Controlului. Acum amesteci energia din primele două minţi cu cea de-a treia minte.
6. Du mâinile, ţinând o palmă peste alta, deasupra celei de-a treia minţi. Surâde, respiră şi gândeşte-te la locul în care se găsesc mâinile tale. Lasă senzaţia să se răspândească. Observă că mâinile ţi se încălzesc repede.

Figura 8.3. Trei minţi

Stabilirea unor limite sănătoase pentru tratamentul tău

De regulă, o oră sau o oră şi jumătate este durata maximă de procesare recomandată unei persoane pentru o singură şedinţă. Nu uita că, dacă exersezi singur, te poţi opri oricând vrei, deci şedinţa de tratament poate dura şi numai zece minute dacă doar atât timp sau energie ai. Dar nu uita să rosteşti sunetul vindecător adecvat la sfârşitul sesiunii, ca să poţi încheia exerciţiul simţindu-te cât mai calm. Dacă foloseşti mişcări oculare în tratament, iar ochii te dor sau obosesc de la mişcări, închide ochii şi fricţionează delicat deasupra şi în jurul globilor oculari între seturile de tratament. Nu te obosi prea tare. Chiar dacă intenţiile tale de a te elibera de problemă sunt bune, este important să-ţi respecţi limitele. Altminteri, te poţi epuiza şi vei simţi că nu mai vrei să continui o lungă perioadă, poate mai lungă decât dacă ai fi abordat problema într-un ritm pe care să-l poţi susţine.

Înainte de a trece la următoarea parte a corpului, asigură-te că nu mai apare niciun sentiment negativ atunci când te gândeşti la imaginea de început. Dacă după procesare simţi mişcarea energiei, dar sentimentul nu este negativ, e bine. Poţi trece la următoarea activitate.

Dacă după încercări repetate nu poţi elimina complet sentimentele negative, probabil trebuie să cauţi în minte un eveniment anterior sau diferit, dar legat de primul, pe care să-l procesezi după ce faci tot ce poţi pentru a-l trata pe cel asupra căruia te concentrezi în prezent. Uneori, amintirile unor evenimente legate între ele par să fie stocate în locuri sau în moduri diferite, aşa că trebuie să le tratezi separat.

Lucruri de luat în considerare înainte de a începe procesarea problemei

Nu toată lumea se simte bine când efectuează mişcări oculare. Dacă le poţi efectua, dar constaţi că te dor ochii la începutul exerciţiului sau periodic pe parcursul tratamentului, din când în când te poţi opri ca să închizi ochii şi să fricţionezi uşor globii oculari pentru a destinde muşchii care fac mişcările oculare. Dacă nu le poţi efectua din cauza ameţelii sau a altor afecţiuni, pune palmele, una deasupra celeilalte, pe fiecare parte a corpului şi mişcă-le în direcţiile în care ai fi mişcat ochii. Nu trebuie să-ţi apeşi mâinile pe corp, însă trebuie să-l atingi. Cei instruiţi în vindecarea cosmică taoistă pot încerca să rotească energia în spirală, fără a atinge corpul. Dacă poţi, mişcă ochii şi palmele împreună. Astfel, te poţi concentra din două unghiuri senzoriale asupra materialului pe care încerci să-l neutralizezi.

Nu uita că fiecare individ are reacţii unice la acest exerciţiu. Se poate ca în timpul procesării să nu observi nimic deosebit. Asta nu înseamnă că exerciţiul nu funcţionează. Nu fi surprins dacă, în timp ce-l efectuezi, apar şi alte probleme. Noile probleme pot fi legate clar de punctul de plecare sau pot să nu aibă, aparent, nicio legătură. Tot ce se iveşte pe parcurs este procesat, aşa că bucură-te că apare.

Uneori, vei observa că imaginea asupra căreia te-ai concentrat la început se înceţoşează sau se estompează cu timpul. Acesta este un semn bun.

De asemenea, nu te îngrijora dacă nu poţi să menţii imaginea de început sau dacă nu te poţi concentra încontinuu asupra părţii corpului şi asupra punctului de plecare. Concentrarea la început este importantă pentru a pregăti terenul pentru vindecare, însă odată ce începi mişcările mâinilor sau ale ochilor procesul decurge de la sine. Nu-l opri.

Mişcările ochilor şi ale mâinilor pot părea dificile la început. Pe lângă faptul că acest proces este nou pentru tine, mişcările sunt dificile fiindcă problema este încă întunecată, densă şi grea. Pe măsură ce lucrezi pe problema aleasă, o vei simţi mai clară, mai uşoară şi mai moale, iar astfel, mişcările mâinilor şi ale ochilor vor deveni mai simple.

În sfârşit, nu te concentra prea mult asupra numărului de seturi sau de repetiţii ale fiecărei părţi a exerciţiului. Dacă te axezi prea mult pe numărat, îţi scade capacitatea de a te concentra asupra problemei şi astfel ai putea limita beneficiile exerciţiului. Numărul exact al mişcărilor nu este crucial pentru succesul sau pentru eşecul acestei metode. Gândeşte-te, de exemplu, că ai încerca să mişti mâna în apa dintr-o chiuvetă. De câte ori trebuie să o treci prin apă înainte şi înapoi înainte ca aceasta să se mişte singură? Nu există un număr exact sau magic pentru aşa ceva. Acelaşi tip de gândire se aplică şi atunci când roteşti ochii şi mâinile în spirală. Aşa că, mai ales în timpul primelor exersări, încearcă să nu te concentrezi prea mult asupra detaliilor tehnice. Lasă pur şi simplu exerciţiul să curgă.

Procesarea în Centrul Fericirii

Atunci când faci acest exerciţiu de reciclare emoţională taoistă, ochii se mişcă la stânga şi la dreapta şi în spirală, în sincronie cu mişcările în spirală ale mâinilor. În timp ce mişti ochii şi roteşti mâinile în spirală, este important să-ţi laşi mintea şi corpul să facă ce vor, fără a încerca să-ţi dirijezi reacţiile spre ceva ce are sens pentru tine. Nu contează nici măcar dacă reacţiile sau amintirile declanşate de exerciţiu sunt exacte. Ai încredere că mintea şi corpul tău ştiu cum să gestioneze cel mai bine situaţia.

Fii atent la ce gândeşti, la ce simţi, la ce îţi imaginezi sau la ce percepi în corp pe măsură ce continui exerciţiul. Dacă nu observi nimic sau dacă ameţeşti, probabil că faci spiralele prea rapid.

După fiecare serie de mişcări oculare, fă pauză, până te simţi suficient de calm pentru a continua, însă nu-ţi lăsa mintea să hoinărească prea departe de ce ai trăit în timpul mişcărilor oculare pe care tocmai le-ai încheiat.

Deschide-te în faţa problemei

1. Respiră în abdomenul inferior. Surâde. Ridică colţurile ochilor şi gurii la fel ca Mona Lisa.
2. Gândeşte-te la aspectul problemei asupra căreia ai ales să te concentrezi pentru a începe. Adu-l în memorie cât de viu poţi. Foloseşte-ţi simţurile interioare pentru a-l vedea, a-l auzi, a-l mirosi, a-l atinge şi a-l gusta.
3. Surâde inimii. Simte energia mişcându-se deasupra capului. Aşa vei şti că cei nouă munţi energetici de deasupra capului sunt deschişi şi conectaţi cu lumina violetă.

Procesează-ţi problema

1. Închide ochii, concentrează-te asupra mijlocului frunţii şi pune-ţi acolo, mintal, ce vrei să procesezi din problemă. Dacă foloseşti mâinile, aşază-le una peste alta, cu palmele orientate spre frunte.
2. Mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile la stânga şi la dreapta, privind la stânga şi la dreapta în sus, în creier. Efectuează aproximativ 18 seturi. Mişcările ochilor la stânga şi la dreapta, câte o dată în fiecare direcţie, alcătuiesc un set.
3. Ţinând în continuare ochii închişi, roteşte lent în spirală ochii şi/sau mâinile, continuând să te concentrezi asupra problemei în mijlocul frunţii. Fă cercuri mici care se lărgesc, rotind în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic (figura 8.4), adică direcţia este ascendentă la stânga şi descendentă la dreapta. Ideal ar fi să faci 36 de rotiri, dar funcţionează orice multiplu de 9. Mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile foarte lent. Fiecare rotire a spiralei ar trebui să dureze câteva secunde.
4. Inversează apoi direcţia spiralei, descriind cercuri care se micşorează progresiv (maximum 24 de rotiri). Funcţionează orice multiplu de 6.

Figura 8.4. Procesarea problemei în Centrul Fericirii

5. Odihneşte-te un minut. Ia-ţi mintea de la problemă. Apoi repetă mişcările stânga-dreapta şi în spirală. La începutul fiecărui set te poţi concentra tot asupra punctului iniţial sau asupra gândului, imaginii, sentimentului sau senzaţiei corporale cu care ai încheiat setul anterior.
6. Odihneşte-te. Continuă repetiţiile până când nu mai simţi nicio reacţie negativă în mijlocul frunţii atunci când te concentrezi asupra imaginii, sentimentului sau sunetului de început. Dacă după încheierea unui set de mişcări oculare şi/sau ale mâinilor crezi că este posibil ca problema să se fi neutralizat în frunte, închide ochii şi concentrează-te asupra punctului de plecare. Dacă mintea sau corpul nu au reacţii la punctul de plecare, poţi trece la următoarea zonă corporală de procesat.
7. Verifică dacă mai ai convingeri negative despre tine – ca „Sunt rău”, „Sunt nevrednic” sau „Nu-mi pot lua apărarea” – când te gândeşti la problemă. Dacă mai ai, concentrează-te asupra convingerii respective şi a punctului de plecare de la începutul exerciţiului şi efectuează mai multe seturi de mişcări la stânga şi la dreapta şi apoi în spirală, la fel ca înainte, până când convingerea nu ţi se mai pare valabilă.

Odată ce sentimentele negative dispar, vei observa probabil că începi să ai automat sentimente pozitive. Acest pas te ajută să te asiguri că problema respectivă nu îţi mai zdruncină încrederea în tine.

Dacă ai prea multe emoţii sau simţi prea multă căldură în creier în timpul exerciţiului, opreşte-te şi emite sunetul plămânilor (sss-s-s-s-s-s) încet. Inspiră lent şi adânc şi emite sunetul în timp ce expiri complet. Apoi aşteaptă. Apoi emite-l din nou. Repetă de câteva ori până când te răcoreşti şi te calmezi. De asemenea, emite sunetul din nou înainte de a trece la următoarea parte a tratamentului.

Activează-ţi şi transformă-ţi Centrul Păcii

Chiar dacă nu percepi supărare, tensiune sau durere în corp după ce transformi energia în Centrul Fericirii, trebuie să duci totuşi exerciţiul până la capăt. În timp ce lucrezi cu organele individuale interne, vei observa probabil că mai multe emoţii negative conectate la problema aleasă s-au stocat în organe, însă nu le vei simţi până când nu te concentrezi corect asupra lor.

1. Concentrează-te asupra aceluiaşi punct de plecare pe care l-ai folosit când ai eliminat emoţia din Centrul Fericirii.
2. Surâde şi concentrează-te asupra inimii. Vizualizeaz-o în corp. Vezi culoarea roşie din jurul inimii. La început, culoarea roşie poate fi întunecată, înceţoşată sau tulbure. Continuând să surâzi şi să te concentrezi asupra inimii, culoarea va deveni de un roşu mai deschis şi mai strălucitor. Întunericul din culoarea roşie este energie toxică. Când surâzi, o transformi în energie sănătoasă, virtuoasă. Transformi graba, nerăbdarea, ura şi cruzimea în bucurie, fericire şi iubire.
3. Continuă să surâzi în inimă până când culoarea roşie nu se mai deschide sau nu străluceşte şi mai tare (figura 8.5).
4. Pune o palmă deasupra celeilalte şi du-le în dreptul inimii. Gândeşte-te la aspectul problemei alese şi du-l mintal în inimă sau deasupra ei.
5. În timp ce te concentrezi asupra chestiunii din inimă, închide ochii şi mişcă-i lent şi/sau mişcă mâinile dintr-o parte în alta, de la stânga la dreapta, efectuând aproximativ 18 seturi.

Figura 8.5. Activează-ţi şi transformă-ţi Centrul Păcii.

6. Ţinând ochii închişi şi continuând să te concentrezi asupra problemei în inimă, roteşte lent ochii şi/sau mâinile în spirală, făcând cercuri mici care se lărgesc progresiv, în sens invers acelor de ceasornic, adică faci mişcări ascendente pe partea stângă şi descendente pe dreapta. Ideal ar fi să faci 36 de rotaţii, dar funcţionează orice multiplu de 9. Mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile foarte lent. Fiecare rotaţie a spiralei ar trebui să dureze câteva secunde.
7. Apoi inversează direcţia spiralei, descriind cercuri care se micşorează progresiv, realizând maximum 24 de rotaţii. Funcţionează orice multiplu de 6.

8. Odihneşte-te un minut. Ia-ţi mintea de la problemă. Apoi repetă mişcările stânga-dreapta şi în spirală. La începutul fiecărui set te poţi concentra tot asupra punctului iniţial sau asupra gândului, imaginii, sentimentului sau senzaţiei corporale cu care ai încheiat setul anterior.
9. Odihneşte-te. Continuă repetiţiile până când nu mai simţi nicio reacţie negativă în minte sau în inimă atunci când te concentrezi asupra imaginii, sentimentului sau sunetului de plecare. Dacă după încheierea unui set de mişcări ale ochilor şi/sau mâinilor crezi că este posibil ca problema să se fi neutralizat în inimă, închide ochii şi concentrează-te asupra punctului de plecare. Dacă mintea sau corpul nu au reacţii în acest punct, poţi trece la următoarea zonă corporală de procesat.
10. Verifică dacă mai ai convingeri negative despre tine – ca „Sunt rău", „Sunt nevrednic" sau „Nu-mi pot lua apărarea" – când te gândeşti la problemă. Dacă mai ai, concentrează-te asupra convingerii respective şi a punctului de plecare de la începutul exerciţiului şi efectuează mai multe seturi de mişcări la stânga şi la dreapta şi apoi în spirală, la fel ca înainte, până când convingerea nu ţi se mai pare valabilă.

Odată ce sentimentele negative dispar, vei observa probabil că începi să ai sentimente pozitive.

Ori de câte ori simţi că devii supărat în timpul exerciţiului, emite sunetul vindecător corespunzător inimii (ho-o-o-o-o-o) pentru a-ţi răcori inima şi a-ţi păstra calmul. Emite-l de câteva ori după încheierea mişcărilor în spirală din acest exerciţiu.

Rupe legătura dintre Centrul Păcii şi Centrul Fericirii

Pe lângă neutralizarea energiei emoţionale a problemei alese în zona inimii, vrem să ne asigurăm că legăturile rămase între problemă şi inimă sunt eliminate. Să ne gândim din nou la un calculator. Acum vrem să facem ceva similar cu ruperea legăturii dintre hardware (mintea, care controlează accesul la programe) şi software (organele, care procesează şi transformă materialul în forme noi). În cazul de faţă, software-ul este inima.

Întoarce-te la frunte şi încheie exerciţiul concentrându-te din nou asupra Centrului Fericirii. Astfel se elimină legătura dintre creier şi inimă. De obicei, pentru asta este nevoie de un singur set de mişcări ale mâinilor şi/sau ochilor.

Neutralizarea problemei în splină

1. Acum du mâinile în partea stângă, sub coaste. Acolo se află splina. Pune palmele una peste cealaltă, apoi du mâinile în dreptul splinei. Surâde şi concentrează-te asupra splinei. Priveşte înăuntru şi vizualizeaz-o.
2. Vizualizează culoarea galbenă în jurul splinei. În timp ce surâzi splinei, transformi energia toxică în energie virtuoasă. Transformi gândurile negative, gândurile în exces şi grijile în deschidere şi încredere. Faptul că surâzi splinei permite culorii închise şi tulburi din acest organ să devină mai deschisă şi mai strălucitoare.
3. Continuă să surâzi splinei până când culoarea galbenă devine curată (figura 8.6). Apoi, du-ţi cu mintea problema în splină sau deasupra ei.
4. Acum închide ochii, mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile la stânga şi la dreapta, aproximativ 18 seturi, în timp ce te concentrezi asupra problemei în splină. Odihneşte-te.

Figura 8.6. Neutralizează problema în splină.

5. Ţinând ochii închişi, roteşte lent în spirală ochii şi/sau mâinile, continuând să te concentrezi asupra problemei din splină. Fă cercuri mici care se lărgesc progresiv, rotind în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic, ascendent pe stânga şi descendent pe dreapta. Ideal ar fi să faci 36 de rotiri, însă funcţionează orice multiplu de 9. Mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile foarte lent. Fiecare rotaţie a spiralei ar trebui să dureze câteva secunde.
6. Apoi inversează direcţia spiralei, descriind cercuri care se micşorează progresiv, realizând maximum 24 de rotaţii. Funcţionează orice multiplu de 6.
7. Odihneşte-te un minut. Ia-ţi mintea de la problemă. Apoi repetă mişcările stânga-dreapta şi în spirală. La începutul fiecărui set te poţi concentra tot asupra punctului iniţial sau asupra gândului, imaginii, sentimentului sau senzaţiei corporale cu care ai încheiat setul anterior.
8. Odihneşte-te. Continuă repetiţiile până când nu mai simţi nicio reacţie negativă în splină atunci când te concentrezi asupra imaginii, sentimentului sau sunetului de plecare. Dacă după încheierea unui set de mişcări ale ochilor şi/sau mâinilor crezi că este posibil ca problema să se fi neutralizat în splină, închide ochii şi concentrează-te asupra punctului de plecare. Dacă mintea sau corpul nu au reacţii aici, poţi trece la următoarea zonă corporală de procesat.
9. Verifică dacă mai ai convingeri negative despre tine – ca „Sunt rău”, „Sunt nevrednic” sau „Nu-mi pot lua apărarea” – când te gândeşti la problemă. Dacă mai ai, concentrează-te asupra convingerii respective şi a punctului de plecare de la începutul exerciţiului şi efectuează mai multe seturi de mişcări la stânga şi la dreapta şi apoi în spirală, la fel ca înainte, până când convingerea nu ţi se mai pare valabilă.

Odată ce sentimentele negative dispar, vei observa probabil că începi să ai sentimente pozitive.

Foloseşte sunetul vindecător corespunzător splinei (hu-u-u-u-u-u) pentru a o calma şi a o răci în timp ce lucrezi pe ea. Emite sunetul inimii de câteva ori după încheierea mişcărilor în spirală din acest exerciţiu înainte să treci la următorul.

Rupe legătura dintre Centrul Fericirii şi splină

Acum revino asupra frunţii şi foloseşte mişcările la stânga şi la dreapta şi cele în spirală pentru a elimina eventualele reacţii apărute de când ai început să lucrezi cu splina. Astfel, rupi legătura dintre splină şi creier corespunzătoare acestei probleme.

Transformarea problemei la nivelul plămânilor

1. Du o palmă în dreptul fiecărui plămân. Surâde plămânilor. Priveşte în corp şi vizualizează plămânii. Vizualizează culoarea albă în jurul plămânilor. Nu te alarma dacă albul are un aspect întunecat, înceţoşat sau tulbure. Aceste nuanţe sunt doar energie toxică pe care o poţi transforma în energie virtuoasă. Surâzând plămânilor, vei reuşi să transformi toxinele şi să preschimbi emoţiile toxice ca mâhnirea, tristeţea, pierderea şi depresia în virtuţile curajului şi echităţii (figura 8.7).

Figura 8.7. Transformă problema la nivelul plămânilor.

2. După ce transformi cât mai mult din această energie cu puterea energiei surâzătoare concentrate, axează-te pe aspectul problemei alese şi du-l mintal înăuntrul sau deasupra unuia dintre plămâni.
3. Închide ochii, mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile la stânga şi la dreapta; fă aproximativ 18 seturi.
4. Tot cu ochii închişi şi continuând să te concentrezi asupra problemei în plămâni, roteşte lent, în spirală ochii şi/sau mâinile, făcând cercuri mici care se lărgesc progresiv, în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic, ascendent pe partea stângă şi descendent pe partea dreaptă. Ideal ar fi să efectuezi 36 de rotaţii, însă funcţionează orice multiplu de 9. Mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile foarte lent. Fiecare rotaţie a spiralei ar trebui să dureze câteva secunde.
5. Apoi inversează sensul spiralei, făcând cercuri ce se reduc progresiv, efectuând maximum 24 de rotaţii. Funcţionează orice multiplu de 6.
6. Odihneşte-te un minut. Ia-ţi mintea de la problemă. Apoi repetă mişcările stânga-dreapta şi în spirală. La începutul fiecărui set te poţi concentra tot asupra punctului iniţial sau asupra gândului, imaginii, sentimentului sau senzaţiei corporale cu care ai încheiat setul anterior.
7. Odihneşte-te. Continuă repetiţiile până când nu mai simţi nicio reacţie negativă în plămânul în care ai plasat problema atunci când te concentrezi asupra imaginii, sentimentului sau sunetului de plecare. Dacă după încheierea unui set de mişcări ale ochilor şi/sau mâinilor crezi că este posibil ca problema să se fi neutralizat în plămâni, închide ochii şi concentrează-te asupra punctului de plecare în exerciţiu. Dacă mintea sau corpul nu au reacţii în acest punct, poţi trece la următoarea zonă corporală de procesat.
8. Verifică dacă mai ai convingeri negative despre tine – ca „Sunt rău”, „Sunt nevrednic” sau „Nu-mi pot lua apărarea” – când te gândeşti la problemă. Dacă mai ai, concentrează-te asupra convingerii respective şi a punctului de plecare de la începutul exerciţiului şi efectuează mai multe seturi de mişcări la stânga şi la dreapta şi apoi în spirală, la fel ca înainte, până când convingerea nu ţi se mai pare valabilă.

Odată ce sentimentele negative dispar, vei observa probabil că începi să ai sentimente pozitive.

Pentru a-ţi menţine plămânii reci şi pentru a-ţi păstra calmul, în timpul exerciţiului emite sunetul vindecător corespunzător plămânilor (sss-s-s-s-s-s), între seturile de mişcări în spirală. Emite sunetul de cel puţin câteva ori la finalul acestei secţiuni înainte de a trece la următoarea.

Rupe legătura dintre Centrul Fericirii şi plămâni

Revino încă o dată asupra frunţii şi elimină problema din această zonă, aşa cum ai făcut şi anterior. Astfel, rupi legătura dintre creier şi plămâni aferentă problemei.

Eliminarea emoţiilor negative din rinichi

1. Surâde şi concentrează-te asupra rinichilor. Du o palmă pe fiecare rinichi pentru a stabili un contact cu ei. Priveşte rinichii în interiorul corpului. Vizualizează o culoare albastră în jurul rinichilor. Este posibil ca la început culoarea albastră să nu fie deschisă şi strălucitoare, dar se va lumina pe măsură ce surâzi rinichilor.
2. După ce culoarea s-a luminat prin puterea surâsului interior, concentrează-te asupra aspectului pe care l-ai ales din problemă şi du-l mintal în/pe unul dintre rinichi (vezi figura 8.8).
3. Închide ochii, mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile la stânga şi la dreapta, efectuând aproximativ 18 seturi, în timp ce priveşti în interiorul rinichiului la partea din problema aleasă.
4. Menţine ochii închişi. Roteşte lent în spirală ochii şi/sau mâinile, continuând să te concentrezi asupra problemei din rinichi. Fă cercuri mici care se lărgesc progresiv, rotind în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic, ascendent pe partea stângă a corpului şi descendent pe partea dreaptă. Ideal ar fi să faci 36 de rotaţii, însă funcţionează orice multiplu de 9. Mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile foarte lent. Fiecare rotaţie a spiralei ar trebui să dureze câteva secunde.

Figura 8.8. Elimină emoţiile negative din rinichi.

5. Apoi inversează sensul spiralei, făcând cercuri care se micşorează progresiv, efectuând maximum 24 de rotaţii. Funcţionează orice multiplu de 6.
6. Odihneşte-te un minut. Ia-ţi mintea de la problemă. Apoi repetă mişcările stânga-dreapta şi în spirală. La începutul fiecărui set te poţi concentra tot asupra punctului iniţial sau asupra gândului, imaginii, sentimentului sau senzaţiei corporale cu care ai încheiat setul anterior.
7. Odihneşte-te. Continuă repetiţiile până când nu mai simţi nicio reacţie negativă în minte sau în rinichiul unde ai plasat problema atunci când te concentrezi asupra imaginii, sentimentului sau sunetului de plecare. Dacă după încheierea unui set de mişcări ale ochilor şi/sau mâinilor crezi că este posibil ca problema să se fi neutralizat în rinichi, închide ochii şi concentrează-te asupra punctului de plecare. Dacă mintea sau corpul nu au reacţii în acest punct, poţi trece la următoarea zonă corporală de procesat.

8. Verifică dacă mai ai convingeri negative despre tine – ca „Sunt rău", „Sunt nevrednic" sau „Nu-mi pot lua apărarea" – când te gândeşti la problemă. Dacă mai ai, concentrează-te asupra convingerii respective şi a punctului de plecare de la începutul exerciţiului şi efectuează mai multe seturi de mişcări la stânga şi la dreapta şi apoi în spirală, la fel ca înainte, până când convingerea nu ţi se mai pare valabilă.

Odată ce sentimentele negative dispar, vei observa probabil că începi să ai sentimente pozitive.

Îţi vei menţine calmul şi rinichii reci pe durata procesării în acest exerciţiu emiţând sunetul vindecător corespunzător rinichilor (ciu-u-u-u-u-u). Emite sunetul de cel puţin câteva ori la finalul exerciţiului.

Rupe legătura dintre rinichi şi Centrul Fericirii

Revino asupra frunţii şi elimină problema din această zonă, la fel cum ai procedat şi anterior. Astfel, rupi legătura dintre creier şi rinichi, conectată la problemă.

Reechilibrarea şi purificarea energiei din organele sexuale

1. Pune o palmă peste cealaltă şi du mâinile în dreptul organelor sexuale. Surâde organelor sexuale. Vizualizează-le înconjurate de o culoare roz. Culoarea roz va deveni tot mai deschisă şi mai strălucitoare pe măsură ce surâzi organelor, deoarece toxinele se transformă în virtuţile emanate de acestea. Astfel, anumite traume pot fi transformate, iar vitalitatea generală refăcută.
2. Odată ce culoarea roz a devenit cât se poate de deschisă şi de strălucitoare datorită surâsului către organele sexuale, poţi duce mintal în ele aspectul ales din problema ta (figura 8.9). Vizualizează-l sau simte-l în interiorul sau deasupra organelor sexuale. Nu te îngrijora dacă problema pe care lucrezi nu este de natură sexuală. Lucrăm în această zonă deoarece dorim să neutralizăm conţinutul emoţional afectat de problemă rămas în organele sexuale.

Figura 8.9. Reechilibrarea şi purificarea energiei în organele sexuale.

3. Acum închide ochii şi mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile spre stânga şi spre dreapta, efectuând aproximativ 18 seturi. Observă ce se petrece înăuntrul tău.
4. Ţinând în continuare ochii închişi, roteşte lent în spirală ochii şi/sau mâinile, concentrându-te asupra problemei din organele sexuale. Fă cercuri mici care se lărgesc progresiv, rotind în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic, ascendent pe partea stângă a corpului şi descendent pe partea dreaptă. Ideal ar fi să faci 36 de rotiri, însă funcţionează orice multiplu de 9. Mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile foarte lent. Fiecare rotaţie a spiralei ar trebui să dureze câteva secunde.
5. Apoi inversează sensul spiralei, făcând cercuri ce se reduc progresiv, realizând maximum 24 de rotaţii. Funcţionează orice multiplu de 6.
6. Odihneşte-te un minut. Ia-ţi mintea de la problemă. Apoi repetă mişcările stânga-dreapta şi în spirală. La începutul fiecărui set te poţi concentra tot asupra punctului iniţial sau asupra gândului, imaginii, sentimentului sau senzaţiei corporale cu care ai încheiat setul anterior.

7. Odihneşte-te. Continuă repetările până când nu mai simţi nicio reacţie negativă în minte sau în organele sexuale când te concentrezi asupra imaginii, sentimentului sau sunetului de plecare. Dacă după încheierea unui set de mişcări ale ochilor şi/sau mâinilor crezi că este posibil ca problema să se fi neutralizat în organele sexuale, închide ochii şi concentrează-te asupra punctului de plecare. Dacă în acest punct nu există reacţii ale minţii sau ale corpului, poţi trece la următoarea zonă corporală de procesat.
8. Verifică dacă mai ai convingeri negative despre tine – ca „Sunt rău", „Sunt nevrednic" sau „Nu-mi pot lua apărarea" – când te gândeşti la problemă. Dacă mai ai, concentrează-te asupra convingerii respective şi a punctului de plecare de la începutul exerciţiului şi efectuează mai multe seturi de mişcări la stânga şi la dreapta şi apoi în spirală, la fel ca înainte, până când convingerea nu ţi se mai pare valabilă.

Odată ce sentimentele negative dispar, vei observa probabil că începi să ai sentimente pozitive.

Nu există un sunet vindecător special pentru organele sexuale, însă poţi emite sunetul Triplului Arzător (hi-i-i-i-i-i), care acţionează asupra întregului corp, pentru a nu te încălzi şi a nu te tulbura prea tare în timpul exerciţiului. Dacă nu este necesar să-l emiţi în timpul exerciţiului, emite-l cel puţin de câteva ori la final, astfel încât să fii cât mai pregătit pentru a trece mai departe.

Rupe legătura dintre organele sexuale şi Centrul Fericirii

Revino asupra frunţii şi procesează din nou problema în această zonă, la fel cum ai făcut şi anterior în acest exerciţiu. Astfel, rupi legătura dintre organele sexuale şi creier corespunzătoare problemei.

Digerarea şi reciclarea energiei negative în ficat

1. Ficatul este un organ mare, de formă triunghiulară, situat în partea dreaptă a corpului, sub coaste. Pune palmele una peste alta şi du-le în dreptul ficatului. Surâde ficatului. Vizualizează-l în interiorul corpului. Vizualizează în jurul lui o culoare verde. În timp ce surâzi ficatului, transformi energia toxică din el. Transformi furia, frustrarea, gelozia şi invidia în generozitate şi în bunătate. Surâde ficatului şi priveşte culoarea verde cum devine cât se poate de strălucitoare şi de deschisă (figura 8.10).

2. Concentrează-te asupra aspectului ales din problema ta şi du-l mintal în ficat sau deasupra lui.
3. Acum închide ochii, mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile spre stânga şi spre dreapta, efectuând aproximativ 18 seturi. Observă ce se petrece.
4. Ţine în continuare ochii închişi şi concentrează-te asupra problemei din ficat, roteşte lent în spirală ochii şi/sau mâinile, făcând cercuri mici care se lărgesc treptat în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic, ascendent pe partea stângă a corpului şi descendent pe partea dreaptă. Ideal ar fi să faci 36 de rotaţii, însă funcţionează orice multiplu de 9. Mişcă ochii şi/sau mâinile foarte lent. Fiecare rotire a spiralei ar trebui să dureze câteva secunde.

Figura 8.10. Digeră şi reciclează energia negativă din ficat.

5. Apoi inversează sensul spiralei, făcând cercuri care se micşorează progresiv, efectuând maximum 24 de rotaţii. Funcţionează orice multiplu de 6.
6. Odihneşte-te un minut. Ia-ţi mintea de la problemă. Apoi repetă mişcările stânga-dreapta şi în spirală. La începutul fiecărui set te poţi concentra tot asupra punctului iniţial sau asupra gândului, imaginii, sentimentului sau senzaţiei corporale cu care ai încheiat setul anterior.

7. Odihneşte-te. Continuă repetiţiile până când nu mai simţi nicio reacţie negativă în minte sau în ficat atunci când te concentrezi asupra imaginii, sentimentului sau sunetului de plecare. Dacă după încheierea unui set de mişcări ale ochilor şi/sau mâinilor crezi că este posibil ca problema să se fi neutralizat în ficat, închide ochii şi concentrează-te asupra punctului de plecare în exerciţiu. Dacă mintea sau corpul nu au reacţii la acest punct, poţi trece la următoarea zonă corporală de procesat.
8. Verifică dacă mai ai convingeri negative despre tine – ca „Sunt rău", „Sunt nevrednic" sau „Nu-mi pot lua apărarea" – când te gândeşti la problemă. Dacă mai ai, concentrează-te asupra convingerii respective şi a punctului de plecare de la începutul exerciţiului şi efectuează mai multe seturi de mişcări la stânga şi la dreapta şi apoi în spirală, la fel ca înainte, până când convingerea nu ţi se mai pare valabilă.

Odată ce sentimentele negative dispar, vei observa probabil că începi să ai sentimente pozitive.

Emite sunetul vindecător corespunzător ficatului (ş-ş-ş-ş-ş-ş) de câteva ori la sfârşitul exerciţiului, după ce închei mişcările în spirală. De asemenea, îl poţi emite pe parcursul exerciţiului dacă devii prea tulburat.

Rupe legătura dintre ficat şi Centrul Fericirii

Revino asupra frunţii şi şterge, reciclează şi transformă din nou în această zonă, la fel cum ai procedat anterior. Astfel, rupi legătura dintre creier şi ficat corespunzătoare problemei pe care ai tratat-o.

Curăţă restul corpului

1. Acum gândeşte-te la problema pe care o tratezi şi verifică-ţi întregul corp. Oriunde simţi încă ceva negativ, du palmele deasupra punctului respectiv şi elimină energia nedigerată, aşa cum ai procedat cu toate organele.
2. După neutralizarea punctului ce reacţionează în continuare la problemă, gândeşte-te din nou la aceasta şi verifică încă o dată corpul pentru a vedea dacă o nouă zonă reacţionează la ea.
3. Dacă percepi o zonă de disconfort, du palmele deasupra locului respectiv şi elimină energia nedigerată, la fel cum ai procedat pentru toate organele.
4. Parcurge aceşti paşi până când nu mai simţi nicio zonă tensionată, neplăcută sau dureroasă atunci când te gândeşti la problemă. Dacă faci exerciţiul cu mâinile, este posibil să ai nevoie de o persoană care să le rotească în spirală în locul tău în cazul în care disconfortul se mută în partea din spate a corpului, în zone la care nu poţi ajunge. Încearcă să pui palmele pe sacrum şi pe ceafă, chiar dacă nu simţi niciun fel de disconfort acolo. Aceste zone tind să stocheze emoţii legate de evenimente din trecut.

Orbita Microcosmică

1. Foloseşte meditaţia Orbitei Microcosmice descrisă în capitolul 7 pentru a circula energia transformată (vezi figura 8.11). Trimite energia de-a lungul orbitei pentru a hrăni toate canelele şi a răspândi vindecarea în tot corpul.
2. Pentru a te energiza, dirijează energia în sus pe partea din spate a corpului şi în jos pe partea din faţă; dacă eşti obosit, dirijeaz-o în sens invers.
3. Pentru a te relaxa, vizualizează un 8 vertical între jumătatea superioară şi cea inferioară a corpului tău, pentru a te conecta cu eternitatea, iar pentru a te conecta cu infinitul vizualizează un 8 orizontal, pornind din centrul corpului. Nu face nimic altceva decât să-ţi concentrezi mintea şi să mişti energia lent de-a lungul traseului ales.

Figura 8.11. Poţi folosi Orbita Microcosmică pentru a dirija în tot corpul energia sănătoasă pe care ai creat-o şi pentru a te conecta cu energia din jurul tău.

Roteşte în spirală pentru a transforma şi a stoca energia virtuoasă în Centrul Controlului

1. Du palmele deasupra dan-tien-ului inferior, la aproximativ 4 cm mai jos de ombilic (figura 8.12).
2. Bărbaţi: Acoperă ombilicul cu ambele palme, cu stânga deasupra dreptei. Masează făcând o mişcare în spirală în jos, spre dreapta (în sensul acelor de ceasornic), de 36 de ori (figura 8.13).

Figura 8.12. Colectarea şi stocarea energiei

Bărbaţii colectează energia rotind o spirală de la ombilic spre exterior de 36 de ori în sensul acelor de ceasornic.

Apoi rotesc o spirală spre interior de 24 de ori în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic, încheind la ombilic.

Figura 8.13. Cum colectează bărbaţii energia

Femei: Acoperă ombilicul cu ambele palme, cu dreapta deasupra stângii. Masează făcând o mişcare în spirală în jos, spre stânga (în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic), de 36 de ori (figura 8.14).

Bărbaţi şi femei: Inversează sensul şi roteşte înapoi spre ombilic în spirală de 24 de ori. (Bărbaţii rotesc spirala în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic; femeile rotesc spirala în sensul acelor de ceasornic). Cu fiecare cerc, apropie-te de ombilic.

Femeile colectează energia rotind o spirală de la ombilic spre exterior de 36 de ori în sens contrar acelor de ceasornic.

Apoi rotesc o spirală spre interior de 24 de ori în sensul acelor de ceasornic, încheind la ombilic.

Figura 8.14. Cum colectează femeile energia

Odihneşte-te şi refă-ţi forţele

După ce ai încheiat exerciţiul sau după ce ai terminat cât poţi face într-o singură zi, nu te agita în restul zilei. Este posibil ca exerciţile să te epuizeze. Te vei simţi bine a doua zi dacă te odihneşti cum trebuie. Poţi continua să foloseşti Orbita Microcosmică pentru a facilita reechilibrarea energiei.

Cum îi ajutăm pe alţii

Dacă finalizezi instructajul şi obţii un atestat în această tehnică, poţi urma aceleaşi proceduri pentru a-i îndruma pe alţii să facă paşii spre vindecare. Respectă întru totul procedurile. Nu sări peste niciun pas. Toţi sunt importanţi.

Practicile qi gong Tao Universal au fost rafinate şi modificate de-a lungul a mii de ani. Nu este nimic greşit în a experimenta noi modalităţi de a face anumite lucruri, cu condiţia ca experimentul să se desfăşoare într-un mod responsabil. Dacă vrei să modifici exerciţiile, discută mai întâi cu persoana sau cu persoanele care te-au instruit. Comunică-le clienţilor că vrei să încerci ceva nou cu ei, dar numai dacă îşi dau consimţământul formal în acest sens.

În continuare facem o serie de recomandări de care trebuie să ţii cont dacă intenţionezi să-i ajuţi pe alţii cu această abordare.

Vindecă-te mai întâi pe tine

Odată ce îşi dau seama cum pot vindeca, mulţi oameni vor să-i ajute pe alţii. Totuşi, pentru a ajuta pe cineva cât mai eficient, este important ca cei care acordă ajutor să se vindece mai întâi pe ei înşişi. Unul dintre motive ar fi faptul că energia celui care ajută va afecta persoana supusă procedurii. Dacă în cel care ajută există energie toxică, ea va afecta câmpul din jurul persoanei pe care încearcă să o vindece.

Un alt motiv ar fi acela că problemele nerezolvate ale celui care ajută i-ar putea afecta negativ perspectiva asupra modului în care trebuie să se vindece suferindul şi l-ar putea face să ofere îndrumare nepotrivită. De exemplu, dacă cineva care are probleme nerezolvate legate de abuz încearcă să ajute pe altcineva care încearcă să se vindece de acelaşi tip de probleme, este posibil ca cel dintâi să aibă o viziune diferită asupra iertării decât cineva fără un asemenea istoric sau răni emoţionale. Acest fapt l-ar putea face pe cel care ajută să îndepărteze persoana de iertare sau să pună întregul proces de vindecare sub semnul întrebării.

Lasă-ţi mândria personală deoparte

Oricine încearcă să ofere îndrumare altora în acest proces trebuie să se asigure că o face din motivele corecte. Dacă ghidul vrea să-l impresioneze pe client cu cât de deştept sau de puternic este, va ascunde faptul că puterea acestei abordări stă în proces, nu în persoană. De asemenea, în acest caz este afectat câmpul energetic ce înconjoară persoana care încearcă să vindece şi, în consecinţă, procesul de vindecare poate fi împiedicat.

Alege-ţi cu grijă cuvintele

Un aspect important al tratării eficiente a reziduurilor energetice din trecutul nostru constă în a înţelege cum ajungem în cercuri vicioase şi în situaţii paradoxale. Totuşi, dispoziţia şi capacitatea oamenilor de a recunoaşte contribuţia acestor factori la starea lor variază. Prin urmare, în calitate de îndrumător, este important să-ţi formulezi observaţiile, teoriile şi sugestiile ca pe nişte propuneri.

În primul rând, chiar dacă cineva pare că ţi-a cerut părerea în legătură cu propria situaţie, este util să întrebi dacă-i poţi oferi feedback înainte de a-l rosti. Când ţi se răspunde „nu”, respectă răspunsul. Dovedeşte prin comportamentul tău că intenţionezi să ajuţi, şi nu să arăţi câtă dreptate ai. Dacă ţi se răspunde „da”, atunci interlocutorul tău va fi mai deschis, indiferent ce ai de spus, în virtutea faptului că răspunsul lui a făcut loc feedbackului. Cu alte cuvinte, dacă eşti de acord să primeşti feedback, îl accepţi mai uşor.

De asemenea, este important să laşi loc îndoielilor. Chiar dacă eşti convins că ai dreptate, asta nu înseamnă că şi ai. În plus, receptorului îi va fi mai uşor să-ţi ia în considerare feedbackul dacă îl oferi ca pe o sugestie. Feedbackul nu sună ca o acuzaţie, ci ca o simplă observaţie supusă luării în considerare. Dacă începi feedbackul cu formule ca „S-ar părea că…” „Se zice că…” şi „Mă întreb dacă…”, va suna ca o invitaţie la discuţie, şi nu ca o afirmaţie ce nu poate fi contestată. Nu uita că nu este obligatoriu ca ceea ce a funcţionat în cazul tău să funcţioneze şi în cazul altcuiva.

Pregăteşte-te pentru posibilitatea ca în primele şedinţe cu persoanele care vin la tine pentru ajutor doar să discutaţi. Nu poţi fi sigur că toţi cei pe care îi întâlneşti vor fi gata să se încreadă suficient de mult în procesul de tratament pentru a-l începe imediat.

Întrebări deschise

Pentru a-i ajuta pe oameni să aleagă problema şi aspectele problemei asupra cărora să se concentreze în exerciţiu, este util să folosim întrebări deschise. Întrebările închise sunt cele de tipul la care se răspunde uşor cu „da” sau „nu”. Exemple de întrebări închise sunt „Vrei să te concentrezi asupra copilăriei?” sau „Tatăl tău ţi-a făcut asta?”. După cum poţi ghici probabil, acest tip de întrebări te poate face să te simţi restricţionat în privinţa lucrurilor la care ai voie să te gândeşti şi chiar poate da impresia că faci sugestii, în loc să pui întrebări.

Întrebările deschise sunt cele la care este mai greu de răspuns cu un simplu „da” sau „nu” şi încep în general cu „cine”, „ce”, „când” şi „unde”. „De ce” nu se foloseşte în mod obişnuit, întrucât adesea te face să intri în defensivă. Exemple de întrebări deschise pe care le-ai putea folosi pentru a ajuta pe cineva să aleagă tema asupra căreia să se concentreze în acest exerciţiu sunt:

Care dintre experienţele tale încă te mai supără şi ai vrea să nu te mai deranjeze?

Ce-ţi vine în minte când te gândeşti la acea problemă?

Ce concluzii negative ai tras despre tine din cauza problemei respective?

Cât de mult te afectează (încă) problema când te gândeşti la ea acum?

În ce parte a corpului simţi o reacţie atunci când te gândeşti la ea?

Abilităţi reflexive

De multe ori, oamenii se tem că vor fi judecaţi sau înţeleşi greşit dacă dezvăluie experienţe negative din trecutul propriu. Utilizarea abilităţilor reflexive te poate ajuta să-i asiguri că îi înţelegi şi că nu le judeci istoricul. Când cineva te întreabă „ştii ce vreau să zic?”, acesta este un indiciu că trebuie să începi să foloseşti acest tip de abilitate de comunicare. Abilităţile reflexive pot fi divizate în trei părţi:

1. Spune cu cuvintele tale ce ţi-a spus interlocutorul.
2. Spune de ce crezi că interlocutorul a adus în discuţie respectivul subiect sau aspect al unui subiect.
3. Întreabă: „Aşa este?”.

De exemplu, o persoană pe care o ajuţi ţi-ar putea spune: „Sunt un idiot pentru că am lăsat să mi se întâmple aşa ceva”. Utilizând abilităţile reflexive, vei rezista tentaţiei de a reacţiona la această afirmaţie şi vei spune, în schimb, ceva de genul: „Te învinovăţeşti deoarece crezi că exista ceva ce ai fi putut face ca să nu se întâmple aşa ceva. Aşa este?”.

Cu ajutorul structurii tripartite a abilităţilor reflexive te asiguri că îi transmiţi interlocutorului mesajul că nu tragi niciun fel de concluzii certe despre el înainte de a vă verifica împreună percepţiile. Nu te descuraja dacă este nevoie să foloseşti de câteva ori abilităţile reflexive înainte ca interlocutorul să afirme că îl înţelegi complet. Faptul că faci încercări sincere dovedeşte că eşti hotărât să înţelegi fără a judeca şi fără a te pripi să tragi concluzii.

Câteva sfaturi privitoare la procedură: verificarea

1. Între seturile de exerciţii, întreabă-ţi clientul ce s-a întâmplat.
2. Ascultă şi observă dacă clientul suferă de dureri de ochi, dacă devine prea obosit sau prea tulburat.
3. Încurajează-l să-ţi împărtăşească orice disconfort şi ia toate măsurile necesare pentru a face procesul realizabil.
4. Întreabă-ţi periodic clientul dacă vrea să-l îndrumi în legătură cu începerea şi cu încheierea fiecărui tip de mişcare oculară. După o vreme, unele persoane vor să ia singure această decizie.
5. Validează şi normalizează reacţiile clientului în timp ce efectuează procesarea. Linişteşte-l spunându-i că este firesc să aibă gânduri, imagini, sentimente şi reacţii corporale derutante.

6. Evită să vorbeşti mult pentru a explica reacţiile clientului în timpul tratamentului. Lasă acest tip de discuţie pentru sfârşitul şedinţei. Altfel, poţi ajunge să pierzi timp vorbind şi dând informaţii, în loc să-ţi laşi clientul să se vindece.

Dacă clientul se blochează sau se simte depăşit de situaţie

Dacă clientul se simte depăşit de situaţie pe parcurs, fă o pauză şi îndrumă-l în meditaţiile Surâsului Interior, Orbitei Microcosmice şi celor Şase Sunete Vindecătoare pentru a-l ajuta să se calmeze şi să se stabilizeze.

Dacă după câteva încercări clientul nu se poate detaşa de sentimentele negative legate de chestiunea tratată, atunci ai trei posibilităţi:

1. Să readuci clientul la prima imagine utilizată pentru a accesa problema şi să începeţi din nou procesarea din acel punct.
2. Să te concentrezi asupra senzaţiilor corporale şi să încerci să le procesezi înainte de a reveni la imaginile şi la convingerile legate de problemă.
3. Să oferi un alt mod de a privi situaţia şi să-i ceri clientului să se concentreze asupra lui atunci când începeţi următoarea rundă de procesare.

Utilizarea altor practici Tao Universal

Conectarea vindecătoare cosmică

Persoanele instruite în vindecarea cosmică taoistă pot aduce energie vitală suplimentară în procesul de vindecare. De asemenea, poţi să loveşti uşor cu degetele sau cu palmele picioarele clientului pentru a facilita procesarea, însă nu uita că energia ta va interacţiona cu cel pe care încerci să-l ajuţi. Energia ta trebuie să fie curată şi puternică înainte de a încerca să ajuţi pe cineva în acest fel. În timp ce aplici loviturile uşoare, dă-i clientului din energia ta prin intermediul palmelor (figura 9.1).

Figura 9.1. Combinarea reciclării emoţionale taoiste cu vindecarea cosmică taoistă

Qi nei tsang şi diagnosticarea corpului

Dacă eşti practician atestat de qi nei tsang, abilităţile tale de diagnosticare te pot ajuta în acest tratament. Le poţi utiliza pentru a-ţi ajuta clienţii să-şi dea seama asupra a ce trebuie să se concentreze în ultima parte a exerciţiului, când se elimină reziduurile de energie negativă stocată în corp. Poţi să verifici limba, ochii, pielea, părul, unghiile şi ombilicul clientului. De asemenea, poţi căuta semne de căldură sau de energie toxică ce emană din corp, poţi să-i iei pulsul la încheietura mâinii şi să verifici celelalte pulsuri ale corpului.

Această tehnică şi qi nei tsang se completează. Poţi alterna cele două metode pentru a obţine maximum de beneficii pentru clienţi. De exemplu, poţi ajuta un client să transforme energia negativă din jurul unei chestiuni, apoi să lucrezi manual pe sistemul său energetic utilizând qi nei tsang, în timp ce clientul se concentrează asupra problemei. Apoi revii la metoda descrisă în cartea de faţă pentru a te asigura că nu mai există emoţii, convingeri sau disconfort fizic reziduale apărute după ce ai aplicat qi nei tsang.

Aplicaţii pentru afecţiuni specifice

Neglijarea

Poate fi complicat să decizi pe care dintre aspecte să te axezi când problema aleasă are legătură cu neglijarea, deoarece neglijarea presupune absenţa a ceva. O poţi face, totuşi. Încearcă să te concentrezi asupra locului în care s-a petrecut neglijarea. De exemplu, dacă ai impresia că părinţii te-au neglijat, poţi începe vizualizând o încăpere din casa familiei tale.

Hiperactivitatea

Diafragma se află deasupra majorităţii organelor interne. Când suntem stresaţi, acest muşchi tinde să se încordeze şi nu se destinde întotdeauna după ce stresul a trecut. Dacă diafragma rămâne încordată, poate să restricţioneze toate organele interne şi, prin urmare, să-ţi afecteze starea emoţională. Poate duce şi la blocarea unei cantităţi mari de căldură în jumătatea superioară a trunchiului, ceea ce poate agrava hiperactivitatea.

Concentrează-te asupra muşchiului diafragmei după ce ai reechilibrat pe rând toate organele interne.

Adicţiile

1. Identifică persoanele, locurile şi situaţiile (numite de obicei „factori declanşatori”) care par să te împingă spre utilizarea a ceva ce dă dependenţă. Este posibil ca pe parcurs să iasă la suprafaţă mai mulţi factori declanşatori, fapt ce poate accelera procesul de vindecare. Foloseşte fiecare factor declanşator drept temă distinctă de tratat cu ajutorul exerciţiilor.

2. Dacă ai sentimente de ruşine sau de vinovăţie din cauza unei adicţii, acestea trebuie considerate factori declanşatori specifici.
3. Factorii declanşatori pot fi şi pozitivi. Axează-te pe cele mai plăcute experienţe din trecut legate de adicţia ta, pentru a le anula puterea de a te face să revii la obiceiurile care dau dependenţă.

Fobiile

1. Alcătuieşte o listă cu toate versiunile obiectului sau situaţiei de care îţi este frică. Clasifică-le de la cea mai puţin înspăimântătoare la cea mai înspăimântătoare.
2. Apoi tratează pe rând fiecare versiune cu ajutorul procedurii, începând de la cea mai puţin înspăimântătoare şi lucrând sistematic până la cel mai înspăimântător scenariu.

Durerea

Multe dureri fizice sunt provocate sau agravate de stările emoţionale.

1. Alcătuieşte o listă cu toate situaţiile în care durerea se agravează.
2. Apoi clasifică-le de la cele care provoacă cea mai mică intensificare a durerii până la cea care o înrăutăţeşte cel mai tare.
3. Concentrează-te asupra fiecărei situaţii şi parcurge întreaga procedură, începând cu situaţia care provoacă cea mai mică intensificare a durerii şi procesând sistematic până la situaţia care îţi creează cea mai mare durere.
4. De asemenea, poţi să te concentrezi direct pe zona dureroasă şi să efectuezi procesarea.

Mărturii

Mă numesc Orlando Canages. Am 54 de ani. Am crescut în El Salvador. Trăiesc de 24 de ani în provincia canadiană Columbia Britanică. Am fugit din El Salvador pentru a scăpa de presiunea de a alege o tabără şi de a mă alătura războiului de 12 ani din ţara mea. Totuşi, după ce m-am mutat în Canada, am constatat că cele întâmplate în jurul meu pe când eram în ţara natală continuau să mă afecteze. Aveam amintiri şi coşmaruri despre război. Uneori reacţionam la zgomotele puternice de parcă urma să fiu atacat. Îmi amintesc că odată mă plimbam pe o stradă şi o maşină a dat un rateu. M-am trântit la pământ. Credeam că cineva trage cu pistolul în mine. Lumea din jur s-a oprit şi mă privea. Am început să consum alcool ca să-mi uit trecutul. La un moment dat ajunsesem să dau gata o sticlă de alcool de 800 de grame în fiecare seară.

Mulţi mi-au sugerat să merg la consiliere psihologică, însă nu voiam. Mulţi dintre prietenii mei făcuseră consiliere pentru aceleaşi probleme; unii se duseseră ani la rând, dar nu păreau să se schimbe în bine. Când Doug mi-a descris reciclarea emoţională taoistă, nu ştiam la ce să mă aştept, însă am constatat repede că această metodă este foarte diferită. Când am început procesarea emoţiilor concentrându-mă asupra frunţii, am simţit că emoţiile dispar repede. După câteva seturi mă simţeam total relaxat. Mă simţeam de parcă urma să merg la culcare. Nu am lucrat decât o jumătate de oră, însă mă simţeam deja mult mai bine. Doug m-a învăţat cum să continui să lucrez singur până la următoarea şedinţă. Am încercat de câteva ori şi am reuşit să scap complet de sentimentele legate de acea problemă. Simţeam că problema se îndepărta tot mai mult de mine de fiecare dată când lucram pe ea.

La următoarea şedinţă, Doug mi-a explicat că urma să începem lucrul pe organele interne şi de ce era important să facem asta. Nu ştiam la ce să mă aştept. Am lucrat pe inimă şi pe splină şi n-am avut cine ştie ce reacţii, în afară de o senzaţie tot mai puternică de pace interioară. Cu lucrul pe plămâni a fost altă poveste. La primul exerciţiu pentru plămâni am avut o reacţie emoţională atât de puternică de tristeţe şi de mâhnire, încât nu o puteam opri să se reverse în afară. Era ca o explozie. Am discutat despre faptul că ceea ce se întâmpla era explicabil, dat fiind că plămânii sunt asociaţi cu mâhnirea şi cu tristeţea. N-a mai fost nevoie decât de două seturi de exerciţii pentru a elimina complet emoţia respectivă. Apoi am trecut la rinichi. Am simţit din nou o reacţie emoţională puternică în timpul procesării, dar nu la fel de intensă ca la plămâni. Doug mi-a explicat că rinichii sunt asociaţi cu frica şi cu neliniştea şi am priceput de ce am avut o altă reacţie tocmai în acea zonă. Sunt foarte uimit de cât de repede şi de bine funcţionează această tehnică. Sunt recunoscător că beneficiez de ea.

Din clipa în care i-am trecut pragul lui Doug Hilton căutând ajutor pentru problemele care mă măcinau, viaţa mi s-a schimbat pentru totdeauna. Am consultat numeroşi profesionişti din toate domeniile ce ţin de sănătatea mintală şi niciodată n-am obţinut rezultatele dobândite după ce m-a consultat Doug. După câteva şedinţe, Doug mi-a sugerat o concepţie şi o metodă foarte diferite pentru a mă ajuta să depăşesc obstacolele care îmi afectaseră serios calitatea vieţii.

Doug a reuşit să-mi explice teoria şi procesul într-un mod cu adevărat interesant şi intrigant. Deşi nu ştiam la ce să mă aştept sau cum ar fi putut să funcţioneze, aveam deja încredere în Doug. Aşa că după câteva întrebări foarte simple Doug a creat un plan pentru punerea în practică a acestui proces uluitor şi l-am început. Procesul a fost foarte simplu şi uşor de realizat. Ne-am concentrat asupra problemei, începând cu inima. Trecând prin diferite organe, puteam simţi diferenţa în ceea ce priveşte impactul asupra corpului meu. În unele organe era foarte intens, iar în altele mai slab. Unele reacţii au fost surprinzătoare. Utilizarea anterioară a EMDR fusese foarte utilă, însă de această dată straturile parcă dispăreau unul câte unul, iar cu mişcarea circulară a ochilor percepeam parcă eliminarea sentimentelor toxice pe o conductă. Am observat, de asemenea, că nu eram epuizată după fiecare şedinţă, aşa cum mă simţeam după EMDR. Ca să fiu sinceră, a fost atât de uşor, încât în timp ce utilizam tehnica nici nu eram sigură că se întâmplă ceva. Am încheiat şedinţa şi Doug m-a instruit cum să exersez singură, ceea ce mi-a fost de mare ajutor, fiindcă m-am putut ocupa de probleme aşa cum le simţeam sau mi le aminteam. Am plecat plină de speranţă, dar şi cu o oarecare doză de scepticism.

Acum nu mai sunt sceptică! De când fac aceste şedinţe, am remarcat că problemele de durată pe care am lucrat şi sentimentele puternice legate de ele s-au redus aproape la zero. Asta nu înseamnă că m-am simţit amorţită, că am uitat experienţa sau lucrurile învăţate din evenimentele traumatice; toate astea au devenit mai degrabă gânduri pe care le controlez şi la care reflectez. Aceste amintiri nu-mi mai provoacă atacuri de panică, căderi şi incapacitatea de a-mi continua treburile. Singurul lucru care-mi mai umple ochii de lacrimi este recunoştinţa faţă de Doug, fiindcă m-a ajutat şi mi-a arătat cum să mă eliberez din „închisoarea" în care am trăit în fiecare zi din viaţa mea. Oricui caută o abordare nouă şi un avânt nou îi recomand sincer să încerce terapia prin tehnica reciclării emoţionale taoiste.

Dena Esary

Am făcut EMDR cu Doug în trecut şi de aceea credeam că ştiu ce mă aşteaptă când s-a oferit să-mi prezinte reciclarea emoţională taoistă. Experienţa a fost totuşi diferită faţă de ceea ce observasem când făcusem EMDR. De această dată, Doug mi-a dat o explicaţie scurtă şi a lămurit pe parcurs alte aspecte ale modului în care funcţionează tehnica. Când am făcut EMDR, a existat o explicaţie lungă la început. Nu au fost nici exerciţii preliminare şi nici un set de întrebări la care să răspund înainte. La fel ca EMDR, procesul a avut efect. După ce am terminat, nu am mai simţit niciun fel de emoţie legată de problemă. Totuşi, procesul a fost mai rapid. În total, ne-a luat vreo oră să parcurgem toţi paşii noii tehnici. Când i-am făcut, nu m-am simţit asaltată de o grămadă de alte amintiri sau senzaţii ca atunci când foloseam EMDR, însă celelalte amintiri legate de problemă păreau oricum să se fi rezolvat. La sfârşitul procesului nu m-am simţit obosită, ca atunci când am făcut EMDR. După şedinţă m-am dus direct la muncă şi m-am simţit bine. Singura reacţie observată şi care mi s-a părut neobişnuită a fost că, la un moment dat, am transpirat mult pe spate.

Problema pe care am lucrat este una în desfăşurare. Există încă în viaţa mea. Însă, după ce am tratat-o cu ajutorul tehnicii, nu mă mai simt atât de furioasă când îşi face apariţia. Experienţele pe care le-am tratat folosind reciclarea emoţională taoistă nu au mai revenit după ce am lucrat cu ele. La sfârşitul şedinţei, Doug m-a învăţat cum să aplic singură tehnica. Am reuşit să fac asta deja de câteva ori şi am încredere că o pot aplica şi la alte probleme din viaţa mea.

Tina Wong

Mă numesc Selina Su. N-am mai făcut niciun tip de consiliere înainte. Când Doug mi-a recomandat să încerc reciclarea emoţională taoistă, nu ştiam ce se va întâmpla. Mi-a explicat procesul în câteva minute. Părea să aibă o logică. Mi-a spus să aleg un subiect asupra căruia să mă concentrez, ceva din trecut care mă deranjează încă. Am ales o problemă care mă deranja de câţiva ani. Dintr-un motiv sau altul, problema mă deranja în continuare mult, deşi persoana implicată nu mai este în viaţa mea.

Când am parcurs paşii tehnicii, procesul mi s-a părut lung, dar nu complicat. La sfârşitul orei, problema nu mă mai deranja deloc. Eram calmă şi aveam energie. În seara aceea m-am dus acasă şi m-am uitat la fotografiile persoanei asupra căreia mă concentrasem când am făcut tratamentul. De-abia dacă m-au mai afectat în vreun fel. Nici măcar nu mă concentrasem asupra respectivelor fotografii în timpul exerciţiului. Doug m-a învăţat cum să aplic singură tehnica şi mi-a sugerat să mă concentrez asupra fotografiilor respective sau asupra oricăror altor aspecte legate de problema pe care lucrasem şi care nu se rezolvaseră complet din prima încercare. Acum ştiu cum să aplic tehnica şi o voi face dacă am nevoie, însă până în momentul de faţă nu mi se pare necesar.

Doug s-a oferit să ne arate mie şi soţului meu o tehnică nouă pentru a scăpa de sentimentele negative legate de lucruri întâmplate în trecut. Am vrut să vedem despre ce este vorba.

Doug ne-a făcut o scurtă introducere în ceea ce urma să facem, apoi am trecut repede la lucru, ocupându-ne de problema pe care o aleseserăm. Am ales aceeaşi problemă deoarece ne supăra pe amândoi. Am început procesarea pe frunte, iar emoţia din jurul problemei respective a dispărut repede. Eu (Miranda) am simţit o uşoară durere de cap. Doug mi-a dat nişte apă şi mi-a explicat că uneori, la început, căldura creată de mişcarea energiei provoacă dureri de cap. Durerea de cap a dispărut. Apoi am lucrat pe inimă, ceea ce mi s-a părut destul de uşor. Amândoi ne-am simţit împăcaţi şi bine după ce am lucrat acea zonă. Când am lucrat pe splină a fost cu totul altă poveste. Amândoi am reacţionat. Doug a explicat că splina poate fi asociată cu grija, cu îngândurarea şi cu gândirea negativă. Eu tind să mă gândesc prea mult, iar Robert tinde să se îngrijoreze, aşa că e explicabil de ce am avut o reacţie mai intensă când am lucrat acolo.

La sfârşitul şedinţei, Doug ne-a învăţat cum să efectuăm singuri exerciţiile pe care ni le arătase. A părut destul de simplu. Vom încerca dacă ne va supăra ceva pe viitor.

Despre autori

Mantak Chia

Mantak Chia a studiat viziunea taoistă asupra vieţii încă din copilărie. Stăpânirea acestor cunoştinţe străvechi, desăvârşită de studierea altor discipline, a dus la elaborarea sistemului Tao Universal, predat în prezent peste tot în lume.

Mantak Chia s-a născut în 1944 în Thailanda, din părinţi chinezi. La vârsta de şase ani a învăţat de la călugării budişti cum „să liniştească mintea”. În timpul liceului a învăţat box thailandez tradiţional şi în scurt timp a atins un nivel considerabil de măiestrie în aikido, yoga şi tai chi. În perioada studenţiei, în Hong Kong, a început să aprofundeze studiile despre stilul de viaţă taoist, ajungând în cele din urmă să stăpânească diverse discipline ezoterice, sub îndrumarea mai multor maeştri, printre care I Yun, Meugi, Cheng Yao Lun şi Pan Yu. Pentru a înţelege mai bine mecanismele aflate în spatele energiei vindecătoare, a studiat de asemenea anatomia şi ştiinţele medicale occidentale.

Maestrul Chia şi-a predat sistemul de vindecare şi de practici energizante câtorva zeci de mii de studenţi şi a pregătit peste două mii de instructori şi practicieni în toată lumea. A înfiinţat centre de studii taoiste în multe ţări. În iunie 1990 a primit în cadrul Congresului Internaţional de Medicină şi Qi Gong titlul de Maestrul Qi Gong al Anului.

Doug Hilton

Doug Hilton este instructor şi practicant Tao Universal. De asemenea, lucrează ca psihoterapeut într-un cabinet privat din Burnaby, Columbia Britanică, Canada. În cariera sa de peste douăzeci de ani ca terapeut, Doug a lucrat cu copii, cu adolescenţi, cu adulţi şi cu vârstnici cu afecţiuni psihiatrice, traume şi dependenţe. Dacă vrei să afli mai multe despre serviciile lui Doug, vizitează pagina lui web: www.fullcirclehealing.ca.

Sistemul şi centrul de instruire Tao Universal

Sistemul Tao Universal

Scopul ultim al practicii taoiste este transcenderea limitelor fizice prin dezvoltarea sufletului şi spiritului omenesc. Acesta este şi principiul călăuzitor în Tao Universal, un sistem practic de autodezvoltare care le permite oamenilor să-şi desăvârşească evoluţia armonioasă a corpului fizic, a celui mental şi a celui spiritual. Printr-o serie de exerciţii chineze antice de meditaţie şi ale energiei interne, practicantul învaţă cum să-şi sporească energia fizică, să elibereze tensiunea, să-şi amelioreze sănătatea, să practice autoapărarea şi să dobândească abilitatea de a se vindeca pe sine sau pe alţii. În timp ce îşi face o bază solidă pentru sănătate şi bunăstare în corpul fizic, practicantul creează totodată baza pentru dezvoltarea propriului potenţial spiritual, învăţând să utilizeze energiile naturale ale Soarelui, Lunii, Pământului, stelelor şi ale altor forţe din natură.

Practicile Tao Universal derivă din tehnici străvechi înrădăcinate în procesele naturii. Au fost colectate şi integrate într-un sistem coerent şi accesibil pentru bunăstare ce lucrează direct cu forţa vieţii, qi-ul, care circulă prin sistemul de meridiane al corpului.

Maestrul Chia a petrecut ani la rând elaborând şi perfecţionând tehnici de predare a acestor practici tradiţionale pentru studenţi din toată lumea prin intermediul cursurilor, atelierelor, instrucţiei private şi şedinţelor de vindecare, dar şi al cărţilor, înregistrărilor video şi audio. Mai multe informaţii se găsesc pe www.universal-tao.com.

Centrul de instruire Tao Universal

Grădina şi Centrul de instruire Tao din nordul Thailandei sunt casa maestrului Chia şi sediul global al activităţilor Vindecare Universală prin Tao. Acest centru integrat pentru bunăstare, sănătate holistică şi instruire se întinde pe 32 de hectare, înconjurate de dealuri pitoreşti, în apropierea fortăreţei istorice Chiang Mai. Aici sunt grădini cu flori şi plante medicinale ideale pentru meditaţii, pavilioane în aer liber pentru a practica qi gong şi un centru pentru sănătate şi fitness.

Centrul oferă cursuri pe toată durata anului şi posibilitatea de retragere vara şi iarna.

Poate găzdui două sute de practicaţi şi sunt disponibile oferte de grup. Pentru informaţii despre cursurile din toată lumea, cărţi, produse şi alte resurse, vezi datele de mai jos.

Universal Tao System Overview.....Overview 1—38

About the Author

Mantak Chia

Master Mantak Chia

Master Mantak Chia is the creator of the Universal Tao System and is the director of the Universal Tao Center and Tao Garden Health Resort and Training Center in the beautiful northern countryside of Thailand. Since childhood he has been studying the Taoist approach to life. His mastery of this ancient knowledge, enhanced by his study of other disciplines, has resulted in the development of the Universal Tao System which is now being taught throughout the world.

Mantak Chia was born in Thailand to Chinese parents in 1944. When he was six years old, Buddhist monks taught him how to sit and "still the mind." While still a grammar school student, he learned traditional Thai boxing. He was then taught Tai Chi Chuan by Master Lu, who soon introduced him to Aikido, Yoga and broader levels of Tai Chi.

Years later, when he was a student in Hong Kong excelling in track and field events, a senior classmate named Cheng Sue-Sue introduced him to his first esoteric teacher and Taoist Master, Master Yi Eng (I Yun). At this point, Master Chia began his studies of the Taoist way of life in earnest. He learned how to circulate energy through the Microcosmic Orbit and, through the practice of Fusion of the Five Elements, how to open the other Six Special Channels. As he studied Inner Alchemy further, he learned the Enlightenment of the Kan and Li, Sealing of the Five Senses, Congress of Heaven and Earth and Reunion of Heaven and Man. It was Master Yi Eng who authorized Master Chia to teach and heal.

When Mantak Chia was in his early twenties he studied with Master Meugi in Singapore, who taught him Kundalini, Taoist Yoga and the Buddha Palm. He was soon able to clear blockages to the flow of energy within his own body. He learned to pass the life force energy through his hands also, so that he could heal Master Meugi's patients. He then learned Chi Nei Tsang from Dr. Mui Yimwattana in Thailand.

A while later, he studied with Master Cheng Yao-Lun who taught him the Shao-Lin Method of Internal Power. He learned the closely guarded secret of the organs, glands and bone marrow exercise known as Bone Marrow Nei Kung and the exercise known as Strengthening and Renewal of the Tendons. Master Cheng Yao-Lun's system combined Thai boxing and Kung Fu. Master Chia also studied at this time with Master Pan Yu, whose system combined Taoist, Buddhist and Zen teachings. Master Pan Yu also taught him about the exchange of Yin and Yang power between men and women, and how to develop the Steel Body.

To understand the mechanisms behind healing energy better, Master Chia studied Western anatomy and medical science for two years. While pursuing his studies, he managed the Gestetner Company, a manufacturer of office equipment and became well acquainted with the technology of offset printing and copying ma

Using his knowledge of Taoism, combined with the other disciplines, Master Chia began teaching the Universal Tao System. He eventually trained other Instructors to communicate this knowledge and he established the Natural Healing Center in Thailand. Five years later, he decided to move to New York, where in 1979, he opened the Universal Tao Center. During his years in America, Master Chia continued his studies in the Wu system of Tai Chi with Edward Yee in New York.

Since then, Master Chia has taught tens of thousands of students throughout the world. He has trained and certified over 1,200 instructors and practitioners from all over the world. Universal Tao Centers and Chi Nei Tsang Institutes have opened in many locations in North America, Europe, Asia, and Australia.

In 1994, Master Chia moved back to Thailand, where he had begun construction of Tao Garden, the Universal Tao Training Center in Chiang Mai.

Master Chia is a warm, friendly and helpful man who views himself primarily as a teacher. He presents the Universal Tao System in a straightforward and practical manner, while always expanding his knowledge and approach to teaching. He uses a laptop computer for writing and is totally at ease with the latest computer technology.

Master Chia estimates that it will take thirty five books to convey the full Universal Tao System. In June 1990, at a dinner in San Francisco, Master Chia was honored by the International Congress of Chinese Medicine and Qi Gong (Chi Kung), who named him the Qi gong Master of the Year. He is the first recipient of this annual award.

In December 2000, the Tao Garden Health Resort and Universal Tao Training Center was completed with two Meditation Halls, two open air Simple Chi Kung Pavilions, indoor Tai Chi, Tao Tao Yin and Chi Nei Tsang Hall, Tai Chi Natural Swimming Pool, Pakua Communications Center with a complete Taoist Library, Internal World Class Weight Lifting Hall and complete 8 Court Recreational Facilities.

In February 2002, the Immortal Tao practices will be held at Tao Garden for the first time using the Dark Room technology creating a complete environment for the higher level Taoist practices.

Acknowledgements

I thank foremost those Taoist Masters who were kind enough to share their knowledge with me, never imagining it would eventually be taught to Westerners. I acknowledge special thanks to Marcia Kerwit for her written contributions, sharing her experiences and candid opinions concerning the practice of Healing Love.

I thank the artist, Juan Li, for his illustrations throughout the book.

I also thank Suzanne Gage, illustrator of the book A New View of a Woman's Body, for her ground breaking work in illustrating women's anatomy which provided inspiration for some of the drawings in this book.

I thank the many contributors essential to the book's final form; Gunther Weil, Ph.D., Rylin Malone, and many of my students for their feedback, particularly Michael Winn and Juan Li for their recommendations; Valeric Meszaros for editing the book, copy editing, and proofreading; Helen Stites for proofreading, and editing and copy editing assistance; and John-Robert Zielinski and Adam Sacks, our computer consultants. Special thanks are extended to David Miller for overseeing design and production and to Felix Morrow for his valuable advice and help in editing and producing this book, and for his work as publisher of Universal Tao Books.

Without my mother and my son, Max, the book would have been academic—for their gifts, my gratitude and love.

Words of Caution

The practices described in this book have been used successfully for thousands of years by Taoists trained by personal instruction. Readers should not undertake the practice without receiving personal transmission and training from a certified instructor of the Universal Tao, since certain of these practices, if done improperly, may cause injury or result in health problems. This book is intended to supplement individual training by the Universal Tao and to serve as a reference guide for these practices. Anyone who undertakes these practices on the basis of this book alone, does so entirely at his or her own risk.

The meditations, practices and techniques described herein are not intended to be used as an alternative or substitute for professional medical treatment and care. If any readers are suffering from illnesses based on mental or emotional disorders, an appropriate professional health care practitioner or therapist should be consulted. Such problems should be corrected before you start training.

Neither the Universal Tao nor its staff and instructors can be responsible for the consequences of any practice or misuse of the information contained in this book. If the reader undertakes any exercise without strictly following the instructions, notes and warnings, the responsibility must lie solely with the reader.

This book does not attempt to give any medical diagnosis, treatment, prescription, or remedial recommendation in relation to any human disease, ailment, suffering or physical condition whatsoever.

The Universal Tao is not and cannot be responsible for the consequences of any practice or misuse of the information in this book. If the reader undertakes any exercise without strictly following the instructions, notes, and warnings, the responsibility must lie solely with the reader.

The book does not give any diagnoses or suggestions for medication. It does provide a means to improve your health in order to overcome imbalances in your system and to provide a richly rewarding sexual experience. People who have high blood pressure, heart disease, or a generally weak condition, should proceed slowly in the practice, particularly Ovarian Breathing. If there is a medical condition, a medical doctor should be consulted.

Author's Note

In the last pages of this book, the reader will find descriptions of the courses and workshops offered by our Universal Tao Centers. This material is also in effect a comprehensive description of the whole Taoist System. All of my books together will be a composite of this "Taoist world view. Each of my books is thus an exposition of one important part of this system. Each sets forth a method of healing and life-enhancement which can be studied and practiced by itself, if the reader so chooses. However, each of these methods implies the others and is best practiced in combination with the others.

The foundation of all practices in the Taoist System, the Microcosmic Orbit Meditation, is the way to circulate Chi energy throughout the body and is described in my book Awaken Healing Energy through the Tao. This practice is followed by the meditations of the Inner Smile and the Six Healing Sounds, set forth in my book Taoist Ways to Transform Stress into Vitality. All three meditations are emphasized throughout the Taoist System, and their mastery is essential to your successful practice of Healing Love.

As you read the information provided in this book and become aware of concepts not contained in Western thought, you will deepen your understanding of the relevancy of these practices to your physical, emotional and spiritual advancement.

Chapter 1
Taoist View of Women's Chi Energy

A. How Energy is Used.

The Taoist sages looked at their own energy as a total unit. In one day for instance, a young and healthy person earns 100 percent of his required energy from eating, resting, and exercise, and spends approximately 60 to 70 percent maintaining his daily life: working, eating, digesting, breathing, walking, etc. One might consider 100 percent energy as 100 energy credits, similar to bank credit. But, as he ages, he gradually earns less and less, even though his body requires the same expenditures, and he starts to overdraw his account by drawing energy from the vital organs-the kidneys, liver spleen, lungs, heart, pancreas and glands and, finally, from the brain.

Taoism explains that the major way men lose energy is through ejaculation, while women's major loss of energy occurs through menstruation, and not through sexual intercourse. For a young, healthy woman, this means an additional energy expenditure as she carries on her daily business. Assuming that a woman starts having periods at age twelve and continues through menopause in her fifties, she could have as many as 300 to 500 menstrual periods in her lifetime. Each month the ovaries produce an egg that contains highly perfected creative energy. A great deal of energy also goes into creating necessary hormones as well as the uterine lining, which provides a nest for a fertilized egg. If we consider our tremendous population today we cannot afford many children, but we can afford one or two. This means we use only one or two eggs. The remaining 300 to 500 highly charged eggs are eliminated. This expenditure accounts for 30 to 40 percent of a woman's daily energy allotment. If this sexual energy is continually permitted to pour outward, she loses 30 to 40 percent of her life-force energy. However: there is a way to transform this energy into vital energy for the organs, glands, brain, bone marrow and into spiritual energy.

B. Principal Energy-"Ching"

We are all born with an abundance of energy that the Taoists call the principal energy, or "Ching." In women it is Ching, the generative or creative energy, that is necessary to make the eggs, create the uterine lining and hormones, and keep a woman sexually active. The Ching energy, supplemented with the energy of the air we breathe and the food we eat, permits the woman's body to endow her eggs with the life-force energy that will be carried into the next generation.

The Ching energy also converts into life-force energy for the organs, which energy is called "Chi." The ancient Taoists, after identifying this type of energy, observed that conserving or restoring Jing energy could promote a longer and healthier life.*

Sexual energy (creative energy) is the only energy that can be doubled, tripled or increased even more. Therefore, if we want to conserve or restore lost principal energy, sexual energy provides the means to create that extra power if we conserve, recycle, and transform it back into principal energy. We then will have more energy available to transform into Chi, which in turn becomes transformed into another type of energy called "Shen." The word "Shen" means spiritual energy (Fig. 1.1)

C. Emotional Expense

When we are young and healthy we expend this principal energy, or Ching, freely, which serves us well until we reach the age of approximately 24 years. Although in the Tao System it is believed that each person is born with the good virtues of gentleness, kindness, respect, honesty, fairness and righteousness, when he Ching: Generative or creative energy. Ching is the most refined substance a person is born with. It is also referred to as the "principal Energy" as it is essential for carrying out the functions of the body All other energies in the body are dependent on Ching. Ching is transformed into Chi or life force as it interacts with the vital organs. The conservation and nurturing of ching energy is the basis for the Taoist Internal practices. Jing is stored in all living tissue, especially the kidneys, sperm and ova. Part of Ching is Essential Energy. Ching is the energy produced by the sexual organs. In women it is the energy of the ovaries, in men, that of the sperm. Ching energy is denser than Chi and therefore moves slower when circulated in the body. As Ching energy circulates inside the body the organs are revitalized and nourished.

or she grows up all kinds of cultural and social influences gradually change all the good virtues. The person begins to live under constant stress, feeling the pressures of hastiness, anger fear worry and other negative emotions. These gradually eat up the principal life-force, lessening the sexual creative energy. By the age of 24 too much of life's stress has developed and accumulated, accompanied by emotional disturbances or problems, and over stimulated sexual activity. The principal energy, spent so freely in younger years, begins to be transformed into a negative energy, stimulating and forcing more emotional energy and increasing sexual activity

As the negative emotions drain the life-force from us, robbing us of our sexual energy, they can account for a loss of anywhere from 10 to 60 percent of our life-force energy. Too much negative emotional energy leaves us with less life-force energy to work with, and therefore less energy to build hormones and replace the lost sexual energy. There will not be enough energy left with which to build and feed the soul and spirit.

1. "Dumping" Negative Emotions

People regard negative emotions as "garbage energy" which must be disposed of in some way. Since negative emotional energy and sexual energy still constitute our life-force energy, if we dispose of or dump out this "garbage energy," we are also dumping out our life-force. Now, to supply the needs of our bodies, we continue to draw from our principal energy, and by the time we are 40, we have spent 50 to 60 percent of it. By the age of 65 most of us are living from a dwindling amount of this vital energy until finally we run out of it.

The law of energy is that energy cannot be destroyed, it can only be transformed. When you dispose of this negative or "garbage energy" by "dumping" it out, someone else has to pick it up. When you dump your anger on someone, that person also has to dump it, and if he or she cannot dump it on you, it will be dumped onto someone else. This anger will eventually come back to you again with extra force, bringing with it fear, sadness, haste and all kinds of stress. This is also impossible to bear so you again find a way to dump it. There will be no end to the dumping, and the negative emotions will continue to multiply. This will greatly reduce sexual, creative, and generative energy.

D. Life Force Energy (Chi)

1. Transforming Negative Energy into Life-Force Energy (Chi)

You need to know how to transform negative energy into positive energy and good feelings. In this book you will learn how to gradually restore lost sexual, creative and generative energy by opening a certain channel that runs through your body. Once you have your channel open through techniques such as Ovarian Breathing, you can circulate both the negative energy and the sexual energy through this channel. As these two energies are combined and circulated, a natural process of combustion changes the negative energy to life-force energy. This creates a positive energy cycle, giving you more vital energy to cope with your negative emotions.

There is another way to deal with negative emotional energy: by directly transforming it back into positive Chi later in the Healing Tao practice, by learning the Fusion of the Five Elements, the second part of the Taoist meditation, we will learn how to harmonize the different types of emotional energy with the organs that have come to be associated with them. We differentiate these associations (hot/heart/impatient/hasty, cold/kidney/fearful, warm/liver/angry, mild/warm/spleen/worry, and cool/dry/lung/sad/grief), becoming aware of their presence or appearance, as well as the different kinds of negative energy that remain trapped in our organs where they may later turn into illnesses. By using Fusion of the Five Elements, we can counteract, harmonize and transform the negative energy into positive life-force.

2. Gaining Additional Chi through Lovemaking

The only way to gain additional Chi is to transform sexual energy that would normally be released in lovemaking by recycling it back into Chi , thereby providing us with an extra 30 to 40 percent of life-force. In this book you will learn the Taoist methods of Healing Love to accomplish this: namely Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Upward Draw. Both methods will help to recycle and transform a part of the sexual energy into Chi .

3. Chi is the Key to Attaining Good Health.

The Taoist masters view Chi as the key to attaining good health and realize that good health enables us to condense and transfer more Chi to a higher grade of energy. This enables us to have even more Chi available to build up the energy body or soul body and create and nourish the most important thing in each of our lives: our immortal spirit, or spirit body With our present rate of energy expenditure, we have no extra energy to accomplish this.

In the health field today there are many methods available to help us increase life-force (Chi), such as massage, acupressure, shiatsu, jin shin do, jin shin jyutsu, tai chi chuan, chi kung, health food, herbs, meditation, yoga, etc. However it is the Taoist Masters' view that the most abundant and easiest energy that can be transformed into Chi and a higher grade of energy is sexual energy. In the Healing Love practice we show very clearly a way to recycle sexual energy and store it, but it is most important to transform it first into Chi and then spiritual energy. Otherwise you will gradually build up too much Chi, which can lead to serious imbalances.

Young people, for example, have a lot of life-force energy available, but they do not know how to channel it properly. Their answer is to bum up excess energy in the fastest way: by using drugs, consuming alcohol, smoking, or other stimulants. These methods of stimulation initially give the user ten or twenty times as much energy, but they draw all the energy out from wherever it is available, namely, the organs, glands, and brain. Afterwards the user is left with low-key energy. When he or she wants to return to the same high level of energy, it means a return to the stimulants, but this time the user has less energy to draw from, and the high will not be the same. The result is a higher dosage, or changing to a more powerful stimulant. A person who is in a low-key Chi energy state will not be as affected by the drug because the drug does not have much life-force energy to draw from. For this reason young people become much more easily dependent upon drugs, sex, or other addictions. Transforming the abundant Chi properly will eliminate the need to burn the energy up with stimulants or participate in excessive sexual activity.

E. Creative Force--Sexual Energy

The basic function of sex is reproduction. Beyond that, each time we are sexually active we generate a lot of life-force energy. When we have a normal orgasm, the life-force pours out of us into the universe. If we can learn to redirect the orgasmic energy inward and upward instead of outward, the energy will reach a higher center of the body and we will experience the even greater orgasmic experience known as total body orgasm, or organs' and glands' orgasm, an experience never felt as a result of normal sex. Thus, we can create more energy: store it, and transform it into life-force energy, thereby increasing our total energy.

1. Positive Energy Will Increase Sexual Creative Energy

Thus far: in keeping with the teachings of the Taoist Masters, we have been classifying our body energy into many different types of energy: positive and negative, sexual, life-force, etc. All of these energies have very different properties. If we identify them, we can start to control them, transforming everything negative into positive, and cultivating the good energies that please us.

Just as negative emotions deplete our life-force, thereby reducing sexual creative energy, cultivating good virtue increases sexual creative energy. By using the Orgasmic Upward Draw method taught in this book, instead of losing sexual energy through outward-leaking orgasms, we bring the highly charged sexual creative energy up to wrap, pack and energy the organs and glands. In the Tao System it is within the organs that our emotions, or virtues, are stored. Once an organ is restored to its original healthy condition, good virtue will emerge and can be cultivated to produce more positive energy to nurture each of the other organs and the glands. As weak, sick organs begin to produce good energy they will gradually affect other organs, making them healthy as well.

2. Good Virtue-the Heart of the Universal Tao

Practicing good virtue is the heart of the Universal Tao. The entire system depends upon the energy of love, joy, kindness, gentleness, respect, and honesty In the Universal Tao we believe that good nature is basic to humans, not because we are afraid of going to hell and burning eternally, of returning as a lower animal form, or of suffering in our next life, but because we believe that doing good for other is equally and immediately beneficial to ourselves. It is a simple concept. When you are kind to others, you are kind to your liver, the organ associated with kindness. Your liver becomes stronger as you give it more Chi. The idea is that you do good to others as you do to yourself, but not out of fear of being punished.

In the Healing Love practice we return the how of our sexual creative energy into our organs and glands to strengthen the weakened body and increase the life-force. The development of more good life-force helps in the transformation of all anger, fear, sadness and depression.

3. Losing-Energy Pleasure and Gaining-Energy Pleasure

If a woman is not interested in having a baby, her sexual activity is for pleasure only. The Taoists identify two kinds of pleasure: "losing-energy pleasure" and "gaining-energy pleasure." Most of us are well experienced in losing-energy pleasure.

We have described the brief, intense pleasure that drugs, such as marijuana, heroin, cocaine, or amphetamines, introduce into the system as they quickly draw and burn up life-force from a person's organs, brain, and glands. This is like a bonfire started with gasoline; it burns very intensely and is very gratifying, but the fuel is gone and the fire becomes extinguished all too soon. The increased desire to experience that intense excitement, followed by the increased use of drugs, draws out the vital energy from the organs as well as from the brain and bone marrow.

Some of the entertainment we seek is also losing-energy pleasure. When we are entertained in excess with activities such as watching television, energy from our organs is required to pay attention, and so our life-force energy is drawn out toward the event we are watching and hearing. We imagine ourselves to feel good because we perceive ourselves as relaxing, thereby decreasing our stress. We do feel the release, but our vital organs are being drained of their life-force by this excessive energy expenditure. This stress to our organs creates a negative energy: and if they do not have the means to transform it back into positive energy, we will accumulate too much and eventually our negative emotions will burst out.

Even though something such as quiet music can help us relax and create a sense of harmony in the body, too much attention to it will make our eyes, ears and nervous system lose energy to the outside. Afterwards, we continually seek new songs, movies and shows because these things are never satisfying our needs, but are further arousing and increasing our need for stimulation. The more we try to satisfy one or two of the senses by an outside means, the greater the need for satisfaction we create for all the senses. When you try to satisfy the mouth and tongue, the eyes, ears and nose need something to stimulate them. It is a never-ending, increasing requirement of the senses. Multibillion-dollar businesses have arisen to satisfy our senses. They make tremendous profits because ultimately they do not really satisfy us or bring us true joy and true happiness. If these companies created entertainment that would satisfy us for a long time, they would go out of business.

The Taoists regard our organs as the body's parents and the senses as the children. When they separate there is no harmony, but rather disharmony and need. People try to search for happiness, satisfaction and love outside of themselves rather than within. They listen to the desires of their bodies rather than their minds and spirits. The more they search, the more they create a need and will never really find what they are looking force Instead they create a deterioration within themselves. True happiness, true joy and true satisfaction come with inner peace.

By turning inward we will not lose the energy outward, and so can gain energy for ourselves. For example, if we eat a tasty food but do not have an inner harmony in our organs and senses, our eyes will want more, like children in a toy store. We might decide to see a movie, and then the ears want to be stimulated as well. We then might decide to go to a nightclub or a bar In the end we might feel the need to get drunk, to smoke, or take drugs. Turning sexual energy and the resultant orgasm inward is the first step to gaining-energy pleasure and to a control of the senses. Once you have more sexual energy inside, the organs will become stronger and will then be able to control, satisfy: and balance the senses.

4. Beyond Orgasm

The normal outward-pouring orgasm is a form of losing-energy pleasure, i.e., we release life-force energy out and we experience pleasure. In the Taoist view of arousal, however it is the fusion of all the energy contributed by the organs and glands with the highly refined sexual energy that creates orgasmic energy. Rather than releasing orgasms outward, as in the normal sexual act, we learn to turn this energy inward to recycle, increase and highly refine it. Through the practice of the life-force meditation known as the Microcosmic Orbit meditation, we begin to learn how to recycle the ovaries' energy. In the beginning it is difficult and you must practice to retain the energy within yourself, but once you feel and gain control of your own energy: you will experience new pleasures which are indescribable. This sensation is called "Beyond Orgasm" or "Valley Orgasm."

The concept of an orgasm that is "Beyond Orgasm" is difficult to explain because we do not have a word in Western languages or a cultural concept to express it. It is a new idea to us. Remember however that when the automobile was invented, few people thought it could replace the horse. Later people realized the benefits of the horseless carriage.

Cultivation of "Beyond Orgasm" can be compared to climbing a 10,000-foot mountain. In normal orgasm we run up 1,000 feet and run back down and try again tomorrow to get past 1,000 feet. Most people climb the mountain this way, perhaps reaching 2,000 feet on a good day The sensations may be limited to the genitals or rhythmic pulsations, and relaxation may be experienced throughout the entire body, but the energy itself is lost to the universe and can no longer be developed inside the body. "Beyond Orgasm" goes further and further each time. When you climb this 10,000-foot mountain, you climb to 1,000 feet, rest, set up camp and spend the night. The next day you climb further, rest and camp, and you continue in this manner until you reach the peak. There you enter another realm of pleasure.

F. What is Ovarian Kung Fu?

Originally the Taoist sexual exercises were called "Ovarian Kung Fu". Some students feel this sounds too violent or too much like martial arts. The term "kung fu," however means discipline or intensive work, referring to one who puts time into practice. Ovarian Kung Fu implies an expression of power and control, of the ability to take command of one's body and sexual life.

In the Universal Tao System's Ovarian Kung Fu training, we practice to gain, increase, collect and transform ovarian (sexual) energy; It is important to remember that building up energy in your body without knowing what to do with it is dangerous. Some systems advocate releasing the energy from time to time in some way, like releasing a pressure valve. They will recommend occasional outward-pouring orgasms for this purpose. The Universal Tao System, however: stresses the importance of learning the Microcosmic Orbit, the means by which the energy can be circulated in the body ultimately to be stored in a safe area (the navel) for later use and transformation into a higher form of energy. If you consider a computer analogy, learning how to push a button will not teach you how to operate a computer. Although pushing the button will give you a result, until you know and understand the system, you will not be able to control that result. To insure proper training in the art of Healing Love, the concepts, the steps involved, and an idea of the pleasure that lies ahead will be explained in detail.

G. Women's Sexual Energy

1. The Ovaries contain Life Force Energy.

As previously stated, the Ching (principal) energy of a woman provides her with life-force energy. This life-force energy is contained to a large extent in the ovaries. It is here that the hormones are produced that determine a woman's breasts, voice, etc. The ovaries constantly produce sexual energy. The Ovarian Breathing Process to be taught in this book releases the energy produced by the ovaries, and makes it possible to store this energy, which has a Yang (active) quality, in the woman's body After ovulation and before menstruation the energy is milder as the properties of the energy change from Yang to Yin (passive). Also, during this part of the cycle the energy is at its highest stage of development for absorption and transformation.

Ovarian Breathing, if practiced every day, can start the absorption process and conserve the life-force energy that otherwise would be lost through menstruation. This is the process by which the sexual energy is transformed to Chi. As a result of this practice, women often notice a distinct shortening of the duration of the menstrual flow, or a decrease of cramps or other problems associated with their periods. With continued practice menstruation may cease, because all the sexual energy is being transformed into a higher life-force energy.

Under ordinary circumstances menstruation can stop for a variety of reasons, such as poor diet, depression, emotional stress, childbirth or menopause. Since a functioning body draws its energy from every resource it has, a body requiring additional energy makes compensations to supply that energy where it is needed. A nursing mother for example, will not experience menstruation, because the blood normally involved in the menstrual cycle would be drawn to the breast and converted into milk. Menstruation resumes only when nursing stops. Women athletes, when under strict training, will cease menstruating because all the energy has been transferred into physical fitness. Similarly, it should be noted that many women, after menopause, lead very active, healthy lives, and usually do well in pursuing their careers, because their bodies now have the benefit of energy formerly required to maintain their monthly cycles.

It is beneficial to understand that menstruation is for the purpose of the next generation. Energy not used for this purpose but conserved through Ovarian Breathing becomes part of the vital energy of the body thereby prolonging youth and providing ample energy for transformation into a higher form of energy. The transformed energy is a creative and healing energy which can raise a woman's life-force potential and ultimately increase her spiritual energy. Also, the cessation of menstruation can be reversed at any time and restored to normal flow after a few months of stopping the practice.

2. Ovarian Energy Develops a Higher Consciousness

Ovarian energy is the energy used for the development of one's higher consciousness. These practices that transform the sexual energy into Chi provide the foundation for the spiritual exercises that transform sexual and Chi energy into Shen, a sheer spiritual energy. The process of cleansing the internal organs of negative emotions described previously is called "inner alchemy" by the Taoists, and it is this inner alchemy that restores to the organs their birthright of love, joy, gentleness, kindness, respect, honesty fairness, and righteousness. Once the organs are cleansed and healthy, and you have developed the ability to transfer and transform sexual energy into life-force energy, the spiritual development can begin. It is at this level that the generative energy of the ovaries is used in what the Taoists call "giving birth to yourself,. which means developing the spirit body from which you will attain enlightenment.

3. Ovary Energy--the Best Cosmetic

The ovaries contribute most of their energy during sexual arousal. Many other organs are contributors--the liver spleen, kidneys, heart, lungs, and brain, as well as glands-the pineal, pituitary thymus, thyroid and adrenal. All of these energies blend together to form sexual energy, a highly charged force that brings us to the point of orgasm. It is at this point that our habit of losing-energy pleasure must be over come. By doing Ovarian Kung Fu exercises, we can transfer this energy to a higher quality energy by moving it up the spine to the brain. Because the property of sexual energy during arousal is Yang (or active) in nature, you can revitalize the nervous system, increase brain power and memory, and stay healthy and youthful. As a great secret taught by the Taoist sages to empresses and concubines, these methods enabled the women in an emperor's court to maintain their sexual activity, beauty, and health for a long time. Many Taoist women consider the results of these exercises to be the best cosmetic in existence.

4. Duration of a Woman's Sexual Life

In ancient Chinese history very little was written about the sexual experiences of women, although there does exist the documentation of Su Nu, the medical and spiritual guide to the Yellow Emperor who in almost endless lists detailed the voluptuous responses of women to their capable lovers. We also have read that nuns in Buddhist convents could learn exercises that would eliminate their menstrual cycles forever: (The exercises were called "Slaying the Red Dragon). Therefore, what knowledge we now have of the duration of a Taoist woman's sexual life passed down to us verbally from the Taoist sages varies greatly with the outlook and lineage of the Master: Some Taoist Masters advise women to stop having sex after 40, due to the supposed worn out state of the body caused by childbirth. With the Ovarian Kung Fu method as it is now taught by The Universal Tao, a woman can continue sexual activity for as long as she desires because no energy is lost: in fact, energy is gained through the transformation of her sexual energy.

5. Organs' Orgasm--the True Orgasm

A. Outward Orgasm

Generally the orgasmic feeling is a pulsation of the vagina, the ovaries and the cervix. In the Tao System we say that a lower center or genital, orgasm happens only in the genital region and pours outward: we call this an "outward orgasm." It takes a short time to occur but it takes a long time to bring the woman to this kind of orgasm.

B. Inward Orgasm

The "inward orgasm," or the "organs' and glands' orgasm," is extended for the woman. Her partner must stimulate her to bring the orgasm inward and upward, stage by stage, and organ by organ. The orgasmic feeling can be amplified intensely in this way but how much it intensifies depends upon how much she practices. By moving the pulsation into the organs, a new field of orgasm is opened up that she has never felt before.

In usual sexual practices, muscles are tense and the fluids of the glands pour out, losing in this outward flow the sexual energy of these glands as well. This kind of orgasm is temporary, short and not continuous. In Taoism it is said that when all the energy pours out, that is the end of the glands.

In an inward orgasm, or organs' orgasm, the orgasm actually travels through all the organs, glands and nervous system, thrilling and revitalizing them with the life-force of sexual, creative and generative energy.

6. Who is Responsible for your Orgasm?

Many women have sexual experiences but are unable to experience an orgasm. Often a woman will blame her male partner saying that he does not know how to bring her to orgasm, and that he ejaculates too soon. Sex is a two-person happening. The energies of both people must bring their hormones into harmony.

H. Good Sexual Relationship--the 3 Levels of Sexual Energy

To establish and maintain a good sexual relationship, the energies of both partners must be on the same level: they both must be healthy physically and emotionally and their spiritual levels must be the same. Then, when the two people are together their energies--physical, emotional, and, finally, spiritual--unite as one.

1. Physical Level

Tuning yourself before making love is very important. How much differs from woman to woman, depending upon her level of energy. The practices of Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Upward Draw strengthen a woman's vagina and direct the Chi flow to her sexual organs. Many women who do not exercise the lower region--the ovaries, cervix and vagina--lack Chi flow and lose muscle tone.

Eventually the energy leaks out, turning the sexual region cold. Their menstrual periods might come at the wrong time. They might have pre-menstrual syndrome, headaches, lower abdominal aches, or adverse emotional reactions, any of which can affect their energy levels, lowering their sexual energy as well as their general energy. It takes a much longer time for a woman to be aroused to her "boiling point," or point of orgasm, than it takes a man to become aroused. It takes more heat and energy to bring ice water to a boil, just as it takes longer for a partner to arouse a woman if her sexual region is cold. If a man is low in "fire energy" (male sexual Yang energy) he will not have enough energy to melt the "ice" and will not be able to bring the woman to her "boiling point."

For men the recycling of sexual energy is very important. Such techniques as Testicle Breathing, Scrotal Compression and the Big Draw recycle a man's sexual energy and increase his Yang (hot) sexual potential. These techniques are presented in the book Taoist Secrets of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy.

2. Emotional Level

Often when a man and woman first meet, there is an unexplained attraction for one another. The reason might be that at the time they both have a high energy level, as well as emotional and spiritual levels. It is as if a strong magnetic force has drawn them together. Sometimes, after marriage stress occurs because of family troubles, children, etc., and their energies are drained, gradually wearing out their magnetic forces until there no longer is a strong attraction between them. During this period the man and woman seem far apart and alone. We see many people starting out in the practices of the Microcosmic Orbit and Taoist Secrets of Love become aware of and improve the foods they eat and do regular exercises to increase their romantic forces and reestablish a close feeling with their partner. Orgasms come much easier then.

3. Spiritual Level

If a couple can find time to do meditation together, sit with each other or do palm-to-palm touching of one another, they will quiet down and be able to feel the energy of the partner. Energy can still be exchanged with your partner even if he is low in energy and unable to move it. You can expand your Microcosmic Orbit into his, and he can do the same with you so that you can help one another move the energy.

If he is in a low mood, you can assist him by sending him your smiling energy. If you learn the Fusion of the Five Elements, you can actually absorb his negative emotions and fuse them to return good life-force back to him. He can do the same to you.

A good sexual relationship can involve many other factors, but it must have a good beginning, like fine wine.

I. Goal of Taoist Meditation

1. Discovery of Chi

Long ago it was discovered that the most effective way to observe the subtle workings of the Tao and the inner nature of men and women was through quieting the mind in sitting meditation. It was the practice of sitting meditation that revealed the existence of Chi as a subtle electromagnetic force flowing within the body The pathways the Chi followed revealed the meridian system of the human body.

2. The Body is composed of Three Parts.

Through such meditation the early Taoists developed a greater refinement and increased awareness of the body as a composite of three parts: the physical body, soul body and spirit body. (Fig. 1-2) These three bodies were studied to differentiate each one's nature and purpose.

Unlike other meditative traditions of Asia, which cultivate the soul and spirit at the expense of the physical body, the ancient Taoists considered all three bodies important. The Taoists found a way to climb consciously into the spiritual realms, and equally important, to climb back into the physical world to be creatively active here.

3. Developing the Physical Body

The novice in the Universal Tao System begins with a wide range of exercises which develop the physical body into an efficient and healthy organism, capable of living peacefully in the world, and yet free of the tensions and stresses of ordinary daily life. The aim of the first level is to develop self-awareness of the physical body and its energy relationship with the environment and other people. At this level one learns to heal oneself by learning to sense and direct the circulation of Chi within the meridian system of the body (the Microcosmic Orbit Meditation). The practice of loving self-awareness generates a positive energy condition in which greater respect and love for others radiates constantly without conscious effort. The healthier the body is, the more Chi it can produce and transfer into spiritual energy. By practicing in this life to transfer Chi energy into spiritual energy, we give birth to ourselves, raise our souls and spirits, and educate them.

Fig. 1.2 Three Bodies

The first level of Taoist practice is accomplished by utilizing the Microcosmic Orbit Meditation, Six Healing Sounds, Inner Smile, Fusion of the Five Elements, Tai Chi Chi Kung, Five Elements Nutrition, and Iron Shirt Chi Kung. As the awareness of the physical body is developed, increased levels of energy are made available by controlling and transforming sexual energy through Seminal Kung Fu and Ovarian Kung Fu practices.

4. Giving Birth to the Self, the Soul Body

Giving birth to the self, the goal of Taoist meditation, is awakening that part of oneself which perceives and acts free of the boundaries of environmental education and karmic conditioning. The birth of the self is not a symbolic image or poetic metaphor: it is an actual process of energy conversion leading to the formation of a subtle body with the capacity to develop reasoning, feelings and a will of its own.

Chapter 2
Women's Sexual Anatomy

The publication of Masters and Johnson's Human Sexual Response in 1966 opened the floodgates for books, articles, and seminars that interlocked with the sexual revolution of the sixties and seventies. The little-known profession of sexology burgeoned.

Gradually sexologists began to pay attention to the particular sexual needs of women. They noticed that it was a rare man who went to his grave without ever having an orgasm, yet there were quite a number of women having little experience in sexual orgasm. Lonnie Barbash addressed herself to "pre-orgasmic" women in her book For Yourself. In The Hite Report Shere Hite disclosed how women brought themselves to orgasm, based on the anecdotal responses of hundreds of women to her vast questionnaire. Compiled by the Federation of Feminist Women's Health Centers, the book entitled A New View of a Woman's Body took a new look at women's genitals and redefined the clitoris.

It is a social fact that most women have never looked closely at another woman's genitals. Of the women who picked up a mirror to scrutinize their own (after making sure the door was locked or that no one else was home), many were left with the feeling that somehow they were not put together entirely correctly The sexual isolation of women results in the complete absence of a socially acceptable word that encompasses everything we can see in a mirror, "Down there" is probably the closest we have come to saying that there exists a large area that we recognize as being our sexual organs. (Fig. 2.1)

A. Mount of Venus

Starting at the front and top is the Mount of Venus (also called the mons veneris, or mons, for short). (Fig. 2.2) The color, amount, texture and distribution of hair will depend a great deal upon age and inherited characteristics and can vary from a few straight hairs to a bushy growth extending up the abdomen or down the thighs. The mons is a cushion of fat protecting the pubic bone underneath. The pubic bone is the place where the pelvic bones are joined.

Fig. 2.1 Woman's Genitals

Fig. 2.2 Mount of Venus

together by cartilage, which during pregnancy softens so that the bones can separate, if necessary, during childbirth. The mons divides and separates into what is called the outer lips, or labia majora, which are of similar skin and hairiness to the mons.

B. Inner Lips

Inside the outer lips are the inner lips, the labia minora. The skin of the inner lips is very different in color and texture because of their relation to the mucous surfaces, in the same way that the lips of the mouth are different from the skin of the face. In an unaroused state the inner lips can vary in color from pink to dusky pink to dark maroon or purple. Sometimes the inner lips are pink and ridged, and sometimes they are long and wavy. Some women's inner lips are larger than the outer lips, and when these women are standing up, the inner lips can be seen protruding from between the outer lips. During sexual arousal the inner lips, richly supplied with blood vessels, become engorged and swell to two or three times their resting size. As orgasm approaches they can go through a dramatic color change, sometimes turning crimson or a dark wine color:

C. Glans of the Clitoris

Following the small lips to the top, they join together to form the hood that protects the glans of the clitoris. Usually the glans in the unerect state is nestled under the hood. (Fig. 2.3 (a)) You can see it by pulling back on the hood. The glans of the clitoris is loaded with nerves, and for most women the glans is the most acutely sensitive spot in their sexual anatomy. Some women find that it is so sensitive that direct stimulation can be irritating. The shaft of the clitoris feels like a strong rubber band under the surface between the glans and the mons. As sexual excitement mounts, the shaft thickens and shortens, and the glans, shaft and supporting structures become erect. As with men, there can be a dramatic change in size and shape. (Fig. 2.3(b)) Some women find that with intense prolonged arousal the swollen inner lips can obscure the glans almost entirely.

D. Urethra and Vagina

Down from the glans is the opening to the urethra. Below this is the opening to the vagina. A woman's urethra is about one and a half inches long from the outside to where it opens into the bladder: This short distance from the outside to the inside helps explain women's propensity toward bladder infections (cystitis).

Fig. 2.3 Cross- Section of the Clitoris

E. G-Spot

Surrounding the urethra is a plexus of blood vessels. Since these blood vessels had no name in medical books, a group of women named the area the urethral sponge. (See A New View of a Woman's Body.) During sexual excitement the blood vessels engorge and a bulge can be felt through the vaginal wall. This bulge has been named the "G-Spot," after Grafenberg, one of the first sexologists. It can be explored by feeling around the front and upper part of the inside of the vagina. (It has also been said that the G-Spot is located one-half inch deeper than a woman's longest finger)

The G-Spot can be difficult to reach during intercourse in a face-to-face position, except with those men whose penises, when erect, press up against their bellies. A change in position may be necessary if a woman wants her G-Spot stimulated more directly. Rear entry is one way. Fingers are often effective and direct. A woman stimulating herself might choose to squat or lie down with her legs up in the air in order to reach it better. Her partner might find it easier to reach if she is lying on her stomach. During coitus, if the woman is on top she can position herself pretty precisely for such stimulation. (Fig. 2.4(a) and (b))

Some women, while holding their partners tightly, enjoy the sensation of an erect penis pushing on their lower abdomen, immediately above the pubic bone, stimulating the G-Spot from the other side.

When the G-Spot is massaged, often a woman's first impression is that she has to urinate. Sexologists assure women that if the pressure is continued there will be a transition to sexual arousal.

One of my students reported: "When I worked in a women-controlled clinic, we always talked rather glowingly of the virtues of the diaphragm. Every once in a while a woman would tell us that she didn't like the diaphragm because it interfered with her sexual enjoyment, that it covered up something. That was before the G-Spot became well known, and I think now that that was probably what these women were talking about."

Some women find that stimulation of the G-Spot can trigger an

(b) Deep thrust massages the deeper areas of the vagina by passing the G-Spot

Fig. 2.4 Shallow and Deep Thrust orgasm, while many women enjoy G-Spot stimulation as part of the whole panoply of sexual stimulation.

F. Female Ejaculation

An ancient Taoist Master discovered that a woman, when reaching a higher point of orgasm, had different responses which ejaculated different "waters." Three waters, or types of fluid, involved in female orgasms were found to exist. The lubrication experienced during arousal is considered the first water: the fluids emitted during a normal orgasm are the second water: and the third water of a female ejaculation, never experienced by many women, is released from the G-Spot. However with or without G-Spot stimulation, there are women who ejaculate when they have an orgasm. This ejaculation, which can be quite copious, produces fluid that is much like seminal fluid. It is definitely not urine. However many women who have experienced ejaculation report that they were dismayed and embarrassed, feeling certain that they had urinated. They then learned to withhold this reaction. Now that the fact of women's ejaculations is known, there will probably be much relief, relaxation, and increased pleasure by the women who have this capacity. As yet, no research has discovered where this fluid is made or stored.

G. First Lubricative Fluid of the Vagina

Inside the vagina the walls rest against each other: but the potential for space exists. With a plastic speculum, flashlight and mirror you can look inside the vagina yourself. You will probably first see the pink, ridged walls of the vagina. The many folds account for its tremendous elasticity During sexual arousal, lubricative fluid oozes out of the walls in a kind of sweating action. At the back of the vagina is the cervix, the only portion of the uterus visible in the vagina. The cervix is round with a hole or slit in it. This is the opening of the cervical canal which goes into the uterus. Most sexologists agree that women have little sensation beyond the outer third section of the vagina. However many women strongly disagree, saying that they experience terrific pleasure with deep penetration either by penis or finger at the back of the vagina, and many women feel pleasurable contractions of the uterus during orgasm.

There may be mucous dispersing from the cervix. The source and purpose of the mucous will be discussed in the next section.

H. PC Muscle and Chi Muscle

Feeling around the periphery of the vagina at about the depth of one knuckle, you may be able to discern the edges of the Pubococcygeal Muscle (PC, also sometimes referred to as the Love Muscle. (Fig. 2.5)

Fig. 2.5 Love Muscle includes the Pubococcygeus (PC Muscle), Pubovaginalis and Pubo-Rectalis

A contraction of the vagina is a contraction of the PC Muscle. You can tell for sure that that is what you are feeling if you can squeeze your fingers with it. The PC Muscle is one part of a group of muscles we refer to as the Chi Muscle. The Chi Muscle surrounds the anus, vagina, and urethra and provides support for the reproductive organs. (Fig. 2.6) This is the muscle of Perineum Power and is associated by the Taoists with many organs of the body, as will be described in Chapter 5.

Fig. 2.6 Chi Muscle includes the Urogenital Diaphragm, the Pelvic Diaphragm, the Anal Sphincter Muscle and Pubococcygeus (PC Muscle).

A well-exercised PC Muscle is considered by some sexologists to be the key to healthy sexual functioning for both men and women. Poor muscle tone leads to sexual difficulties as well as other physiologic problems, such as difficulty in childbirth and urinary incontinence. In fact, the first professional to publicize the importance of good PC tone taught exercises to women in preparation for childbirth. His name, Kegel, is still associated with these exercises. The PC Muscle is crucial to Ovarian Kung Fu exercises.

You can test the tone of the PC Muscle by interrupting a stream of urine. This ability is due solely to the PC Muscle. Many women have become dexterous at squeezing this muscle because they found it enhanced their sexual pleasure.

Sexologist Bryce Britton, in her book The Love Muscle: Every woman's Guide to Intensifying Sexual Pleasure, includes detailed descriptions of how to use the PC Muscle as well as outlining an exercise program for sexual fitness.

I. Perineal Sponge

Inside the back part of the entrance to the vagina is another area of blood vessels called the perineal sponge. (Fig. 2.7) During sexual arousal the perineal sponge thickens, narrowing the entrance to the vagina.

Fig. 2.7 Perineal Sponge

J. Perineum

The perineum region includes the anus and sexual organs, but the point of the perineum is located between the back of the vaginal opening and the anus. (Fig. 2.8)

Fig. 2.8 Perineum (Hui- Yin)

The anus is a sexual orifice for some women, and quite sexually taboo for others. To prevent vaginal and bladder infections all women should know that fingers or penis should be washed after anal contact.

Fig. 2.9 Love Making

Chapter 3
Sexual Response Cycle

Women's sexual responses were described by Masters and Johnson as being in four phases: excitement, plateau, orgasm, and resolution. These phases are demarcated by physiological changes in the sexual organs. In the excitement phase the vagina sweats, and the broad ligament which supports the uterus pulls up: this in turn enlarges the back of the vagina in the plateau phase. A myriad of changes occur during orgasm, including for some women changes in skin color on the back and chest, or tingling or contractions in the hands and feet. In the resolution phase there is a gradual return to the resting state. (Fig. 3-1)

Fig. 3.1 Ordinary Peak Orgasm

Most writings on women's sexual responses describe women as having a long arousal period. Yet in Shere Hite's research (The Hite Report) most women describe themselves as reaching orgasm within minutes after they start masturbating. Does this long arousal period indicate the flexibility of women's sexual responses? Or is it due to inept lovers or women's reticence to tell their partners what would please them?

A. Clitoris and Vaginal Orgasm

Most sexologists and other people limit the definition of the clitoris to the glans. The vagina and the inner lips are seen as separate and distinct entities, the inner lips having no purpose other than to protect the urethral and vaginal openings. Even though Masters and Johnson described the vivid changes of the inner lips during sexual excitement, they still did not identify them as being part of the woman's sexual organs.

For over half a century a battle raged over the location of women's orgasms. Freud and many of his followers maintained that clitoral orgasms were experienced by girls, but that adult women transferred their sexual response to the vagina. Masters and Johnson concluded from their studies that all orgasms are clitoral in origin.

Feminists, concerned about the effects on women's psyches and sex lives, did a lot of research, both in medical libraries and among themselves in self-help groups, and they talked to numerous women about their sexual experiences. From all these sources they concluded that women have one unified sex organ, but that all parts react during sexual arousal no matter what part is being stimulated.

When all the aspects of this sexual organ are viewed together we see the erectile tissue of the small lips, glans and shaft, urethral sponge and perineal sponge. Add this all together and inch-for-inch women seem to have about as much erectile tissue as men. This similarity in structure suggests a similarity in function also, and further suggests a possible similarity in men's and women's sexual drives and responses. How much is related to how we are constructed, and how much is from our socialization?

B. Depletion of Sexual Energy

Most men are aware of the depletion of energy they feel as a result of ejaculation, and most women are also aware of a depletion. The Taoists observed that while men lose their energy through ejaculation, women lose most of their energy through their menstrual periods. Although many women do not perceive a loss of energy, certainly those whose periods are preceded by a week or two of breast tenderness, water retention, or pelvic congestion, or whose periods are accompanied by strong cramps, heavy bleeding, backache, nausea, diarrhea, or outbreaks of herpes, etc., will notice the draining effect of these cyclical functions.

Fig. 3.2 Sexual Energy Chart

C. Ovarian Kung Fu

The Ovarian Kung Fu exercises are practiced in two parts: The first part, Ovarian Breathing, retrieves the biological energy that goes into making eggs, uterine lining, cervical mucous, and the attendant hormones produced in the ovaries and the adrenal and pituitary glands.

The second part, the Orgasmic (Inward and) Upward Draw, involves the transformation of sexual energy, i.e., the circulation of the aroused energy back into the body rather than the discharge of it into the universe.

Both exercises involve bringing the energy from the reproductive and sexual organs up the spine to the brain. Once the brain is filled with energy, the energy will travel down the front of the body to the heart, and then continue down to be stored at the navel.

The first exercise helps reduce the loss of energy from menstruation, enabling women to experience shorter, less troublesome periods. The second exercise conserves the biological energy lost through orgasm, prolongs and emphasizes the orgasm, and brings it up into the organs as well as to a higher energy center there to attain a higher state of consciousness. It also brings intense pleasure. (Fig. 3.2)

In the process of learning these exercises women come into closer contact with their cycles, learning to make finer discriminations in their muscle movements and energy flow, and to increase, deepen and extend their sexual pleasure. Ultimately they will zero in on the process of transformation, recognizing and achieving the link between sexuality and spirituality

Microcosmic Orbit

"Reject all reasoning about sex: practice special exercises. To be able to make love and not emit is the secret of returning the semen. Increasing and aiding the semen is then the way of the life-force." Plain Woman's advice to the Yellow Emperor second century B.C.

In centuries past the Emperor of China invariably called in the court sages, usually Taoist, to obtain advice on his sex life. Before accepting the advice of any sage, so the story goes, the Emperor required any prospective Master to prove his sexual control. He did this by offering the would-be advisor a full glass of wine and demanding the sage insert his penis into it. If he was truly a Master he could absorb the wine into his penis, and then release it back into the wine glass. This was taken as absolute proof that the sage could also absorb a woman's sexual fluids, her Yin essence, and therefore knew the secrets of immortality.

Today women can learn the secrets of the Taoist Immortals, be in control of their sexuality and embark on a journey with a partner that will enrich them both. When they master these techniques for retaining their sexual power and then willingly share it, they will feel differently about themselves and each other:

A. Learn to circulate your Chi in the Microcosmic Orbit

By far the most powerful energy exchange between two partners occurs at the level of subtle energy. The Taoists have been studying the circulation of subtle energy through certain energy points in the body for thousands of years and have verified, in detail, their importance. These energy points form the basis for acupuncture. Although Western medical research has acknowledged acupuncture as being clinically effective, scientists admit they cannot fully explain why the system works. The circulation of energy through these energy points, or meridians, is called the Microcosmic Orbit. (Fig. 4.1)

All students of the Universal Tao System are taught to circulate their Chi in the Microcosmic Orbit, a necessary step to understanding the cultivation of Ching from the raw physical level of eggs to the refined subtle energy of a Shen, or spiritual being. Once they have opened their Microcosmic Orbit, they have already experienced a minor enlightenment. The mind has begun to realize it has control over its own subtle energy. Ultimately one learns that the movement of subtle energy is totally a power of the mind.

Fig. 4.1 Microcosmic Orbit

B. Discovery of the Microcosmic Orbit

A few thousand years ago everything in the world was so simple: there were no televisions, radios, theaters, or nightclubs as entertainment, and no houses to care for; all of which drain energy and disturb the mind. The air was pure. Natural energy was abundant to humans.

When the sun set, people could not fall asleep right away, and they dared not roam around the jungle in the dark. One way to occupy their time was to sit down and quiet themselves. Once they were able to quiet their minds to a certain extent, their body functions started to quiet down as well. They started to notice the flow of something in the body. The flow began in the navel, traveled down to the perineum and up the spine to the head, down the front through the tongue, to the throat and then down to the navel. The circulation of energy through this route came to be known as the Microcosmic Orbit.

The more they were able to still their minds and bodies, the more intense the flow would be. As they continued to still their minds, they began to discover more paths opening and to feel the energy flow in a straight direction, up and down. From the perineum up to the head, the flow was then felt passing through the major organs in three channels, which later became known as the Thrusting Channels. As their practice continued, they felt the energy start to flow in a circular motion, similar to a belt, around a major energy center that they discovered in the navel, the Belt Channel.

As time went on they discovered that there existed in their bodies 32 energy channels, each one corresponding to a specific organ. They passed down this knowledge they had learned generation after generation until more and more people practiced it, and in this way identified the acupuncture meridians which became basic to the Taoist System.

Every person has the same body, the same channels, and has a soul and spirit. After many hundreds of years of practice, trial and error, improving and passing down, the Taoist Esoteric Yoga System came into being.

C. Two Major Energy Channels of the Microcosmic Orbit - Functional and Governor

It is much easier to cultivate your energy if you first understand the major paths of energy circulation in your body. The nervous system in humans is very complex and is capable of directing energy wherever it is needed. However the ancient Taoist Masters discovered there are two energy channels that carry an especially strong current.

One channel, the “Functional” or “Yin” Channel, begins at the base of the trunk midway between the vagina and the anus at the perineum point. It goes up the front of the body past the mons, abdominal organs, heart, and throat and ends at the tip of the tongue. The second channel, the “Governor” or “Yang” Channel, starts in the same place. It flows from the perineum upward into the tail bone, then up through the spine into the brain and back down to the roof of the mouth. (Fig. 4.2)

The tongue is like a switch that connects these two currents when it is touched to the roof of the mouth just behind the front teeth, the energy can flow in a circle up the spine and back down the front. The two channels form a single circuit that the energy loops around. This vital current circulates past the major organs and nervous systems of the body, giving cells the juice they need to grow, heal, and function.

D. Sexual Energy

1. Primordial Energy

The sexual energy that moves in the Microcosmic Orbit is a primordial energy. Human life begins with the union of an egg and a sperm cell. This is the original act of Kung Fu in the balancing of Yin and Yang. Ovarian Kung Fu is the re-creation of that act within the female body. However instead of forming a fetus from a fertilized egg growing inside the womb, the ovarian energy mounts to higher energy centers inside the body, and we give birth to ourselves on a spiritual level. The sexual energy is drawn upward through the Microcosmic Channel where it literally gives rebirth, a “new life”-- and brings the confidence of controlling a powerful flow of creative energy and the satisfaction of a deep sense and higher balance of harmony with the world.

Fig. 4.2 Functional and Governor Channels

2. A Powerful, Versatile Energy

The methods of Chi cultivation explained in detail in this book from Ovarian Breathing to the Ovarian Upward Draw method to Beyond Orgasm all involve drawing sexual energy stored in the ovaries up the spinal column and into the brain. When the brain is full, this energy will travel down the front into the throat, heart and navel. The brain and pituitary gland will aid in distributing this powerful energy to wherever it is needed. This is a unique attribute of sexual energy, or Ching, over other types of Chi that have their own special functions, e.g., liver Chi. Sexual energy is extraordinarily versatile and can be transformed into many different functions. This is one reason it is so nourishing to our spiritual being. Our inner spiritual being can easily digest it, almost as if it were baby food.

The loop of energy circulating about the body in the Microcosmic Orbit, carrying the sexual current from the ovaries and spreading vitality to other parts of the body, also has a profound effect on health in a specific way. It is this energy that triggers the glands to release the sex-stimulating hormones which regulate body chemistry and ultimately affect your ability to do anything. It has an especially strong influence on the quality of your lovemaking, because on the biological level sex is largely a question of hormonal balance.

The benefits of the Microcosmic Orbit extend beyond facilitating the flow of sexual energy: they include the prevention of aging and the healing of many illnesses, ranging from high blood pressure, insomnia and headaches to arthritis. Whether it be for fighting off an illness, answering a child's question, painting, or making love, the energy that flows in the Microcosmic Orbit is available when we need it.

E. Sealing the Energy within the Body

After opening up the Microcosmic energy channel, it is important to keep it clear of physical or mental blockages, thereby making it possible to pump a greater amount of sexual energy up the spine. If this channel is blocked by tension during the sexual excitement of lovemaking, ovarian energy will not be able to rise to the brain.

The sexual power is then lost until the body goes through the long and physically taxing process of manufacturing more ovarian energy. The Microcosmic Orbit is an important step to sealing this energy within the body so that it will circulate and revitalize all parts of the mind and body. Otherwise, when intense sexual energy pressure builds in the head, much of it escapes out of the eyes, ears, nose and mouth and is lost.

F. Opening the Microcosmic Energy Channel

The easiest way to open the Microcosmic energy channel is to sit in meditation a few minutes each morning and relax. Allow your energy to automatically complete the loop by letting your mind flow along with it. Start in the eyes, and mentally circulate your attention with the energy as it goes down the front through your tongue, throat, chest and navel, and then up the tail bone and spine to the head.

At first it may feel like nothing is happening, but eventually the current will begin to feel warm in some places as it loops around. The key is simply to relax and try to bring your mind directly into the part of the loop being focused on. This is different from visualizing an image inside your head of what that part of the body looks like or is feeling. Experience actual Chi flow. Relax and let your mind flow with the Chi in the physical body along a natural circuit to any desired point, e g., your navel, perineum, etc.

Even if you do not sit daily and circulate the Microcosmic current, just being aware that it exists in your body and functions automatically during these practices should help you more quickly master the methods of Taoist loving. You may even learn it through your lovemaking: all it takes is attention. The best lover is a fully relaxed woman who understands what is going on inside her.

A way to become more in touch with your energy is to lie next to your partner with your ear or nose near your partner's nose. Synchronize your breathing and begin to feel the mingling of your breaths and energies. You might also hug each other for a prolonged period and begin to feel the energy in the abdomen with each breath. The woman who masters this easy flow of energy inside her body's Micro cosmic Orbit will find tapping into her sexual powers a simple and natural step.

The more conscious you become of the functioning of subtle Chi energy in your body, mind, and spirit, the greater your freedom to creatively love and be yourself.

Those interested in fully mastering this method of relaxation and opening the Microcosmic Orbit can refer to my first book, Awaken Healing Energy Through the Tao.

Study of the Microcosmic Orbit is highly recommended to all students of Sexual Kung Fu who seek to truly master the techniques taught here. Progress to the higher levels of transforming sexual energy without first learning the Microcosmic Orbit is very difficult. Many people may already have open channels and simply need to be made aware of them. Anyone can start to relax in a pleasing, natural setting.

Mastering the Microcosmic current also prepares the serious student for utilizing other energy-conserving techniques that complement Sexual Kung Fu, such as Iron Shirt Chi Kung I, II, and III, a method of packing and storing Chi energy into vital organs. Another powerful technique is Tai Chi Chi Kung, a condensed form of Tai Chi Chuan that circulates Chi energy among body, mind, and spirit, and strengthens muscles, tendons and bones.

Fig. 4.3 Loving Energy

Chapter 5
Cultivating Ovarian Power

I. Activation and Control of Ovarian Energy

A. Importance of Sexual Organs' Exercise

America is presently exercise oriented. However with the exception of sexual intercourse, few exercises strengthen the crucial pelvic muscles. Pelvic exercises do exist which can increase Chi in these areas, thereby greatly strengthening the reproductive organs and the complex network of tendons surrounding them.

Strength in this region is of inestimable importance. Leading into the pelvis is a vast number of nerves, blood vessels and lymph glands. Here terminate tissues communicating with every square inch of the body. All of the major acupuncture meridians, which carry Chi to the vital organs, pass through this area. If it is blocked or weak, energy will dissipate, and the organs, as well as the brain, will suffer. This is what happens to many people in old age. As their rectal and pelvic muscles sag and become loose, their vital Chi energy slowly drains out, leaving them weak and feeble.

1. Celibates

No matter who you are, sexual energy is constantly building up and accumulating in the sexual region. Some negative evidence has been collected regarding the health of celibates based on studies of priests and nuns who use only willpower to suppress the sexual fire within. !t has been found that the practice of celibacy by women has brought on the eventual deterioration of the sexual organs caused by long-term congestion in the ovaries or breasts, in turn affecting the internal organs.

Some celibates are able to transform their sexual energy naturally, and as a result no problems arise in the celibate state. A woman who is not so naturally enlightened will find an accumulation in her body and sexual organs of too much sexual energy. This energy tends to need a release, and if the woman has no way to handle the problem properly, the energy can affect her adversely, multiplying her negative emotions. Without properly cultivating sexual energy and opening the energy channels between the lower and upper body the sexual energy is blocked, thereby congesting blood and hormones in the woman's genitals, ovaries, and cervix. Such problems can be avoided by practicing the Ovarian Breathing and Orgasmic Upward Draw exercises.

B. Ovarian Breathing Cultivates Ovarian Power

1. Woman's Menstrual Cycle

It is said that anatomy is destiny: women are born to be mothers. A baby girl's ovaries are immature, small and smooth, but they contain the power necessary to create the 300-500 eggs she will produce in her reproductive years and a reserve of potentially 450,000 eggs.

Every woman has a profound connection with her menstrual cycle. Women students of the Universal Tao System have revealed how sensitive they are to what seems to be subtle changes in their cycles: they notice right away if their periods are one day early or late, if they last a day longer or are a day shorter and if the consistency or color varies from what they have come to expect.

Apparently many women remember an event that occurred the day they received their first periods. Those memories may be pleasant or unpleasant, but they remain indelible. One woman remembers it was the first time a man tried to pick her up: another woman remembers that her mother slapped her face (a gesture of welcome into the world of being a woman): another woman hit a home run in a softball game that day.

Many women's cycles become a source of much confusion and uncertainty. They are unsure about fertile times, are ashamed of secretions and odors, are discontent with available birth control methods, develop anger at common childbirth practices, or harbor a simultaneous dependency on and distrust of the medical profession.

Some women go through life with few problems during their cycles, having easy periods, uncomplicated births, or smooth transitions into menopause. Others have distressing problems with their periods, such as recurrent vaginal infections, abnormal Pap smears, difficult births, hysterectomies, or they take synthetic hormones because of disabling hot flashes.

Major changes can occur in the menstrual cycles as well as in many other aspects in the lives of some women simply by practicing Ovarian Breathing.

The point is that, even if a woman has two or three children and does not plan to have more, her body continues cyclically to produce ovary energy. Instead of wasting that energy, it can be conserved through transformation into another form for later use. The Ovarian exercises provide a way to use that Ovarian power:

2. Yang Energy and the Menstrual Cycle

There are three distinct parts to the menstrual cycle. First, there is the period itself. Following menstruation, an ovary spurts several immature eggs into action, and usually one egg matures completely. Surrounded by a jelly-like covering, it breaks out of the ovary. That period of time, from the end of the bleeding until ovulation, is the time of maximum ovary power During this part of the cycle the Taoists believe that the ovaries' energy is at its most Yang, or most hot.

After ovulation the ruptured area of the ovary heals and forms the corpus luteum, or yellow body. This yellow body produces progesterone. The function of progesterone is to keep the uterine lining from sloughing off. If the egg unites with a sperm and a pregnancy starts, progesterone will be secreted during the entire pregnancy. If there is no fertilization, the ovary will produce a spurt of estrogen, and the menstruation cycle will begin.

The Taoists note, and women's experiences to date confirm, that the part of the cycle between menstruation and ovulation is the time that a woman will receive the maximum benefit from the practice of Ovarian Breathing, with continued practice then being optional until the next cycle. The process of Ovarian Breathing will draw energy out of the egg. Imagine having access to an energy that is powerful enough to bestow life!

C. Diaphragms

The body possesses not one but several diaphragms. Everyone is familiar with the thoracic diaphragm in the chest, separating the heart and lungs from the abdominal organs and assisting us in breathing. When you inhale, this diaphragm lowers, thus increasing the space in the chest and allowing the lungs to fill: the deeper the breath, the lower the diaphragm moves.

Less is known about the pelvic and urogenital diaphragms, which separate the pelvis from the perineum. To practice Ovarian Breathing properly you must use not only the chest diaphragm, but also the pelvic and urogenital diaphragms. (Fig. 5.1) These serve as flood gates, opening to spurt energy to the organs, or as pistons, pumping the energy up to higher centers. True breathing comes from these lower diaphragms. It is an exceedingly important element in the Taoist practice of transmitting the energy generated from the sexual organs into a higher energy form.

Fig. 5.1 Deep breathing issues from pelvic and urogenital diaphragms.

1. Pelvic Diaphragm

The pelvic diaphragm is a muscular wall that extends across the lower part of the torso. It is suspended between the symphyses pubis (pubic bones) in front and the coccyx (at the bottom of the spine) in back. (Fig. 5.2) There are several organs that penetrate this muscular partition as it lies between the pelvic cavity and the perineum. These organs are the urethra, the vagina and the rectum. One function of the pelvic diaphragm is to support these organs: therefore, control over this diaphragm provides you with greater control over these organs. The pelvic diaphragm is also the floor of the abdominal cavity, which contains the stomach, small and large intestines, liver bladder and kidneys. It lifts up and helps shape these vital organs.

Fig. 5.2 Pelvic Diaphragm

2. Urogenital Diaphragm

At the perineum, the point midway between the anus and vagina below the pelvic diaphragm, is another muscular diaphragm, the urogenital diaphragm. This is penetrated by the urethra, and on its underside is attached the shaft of the clitoris. (Fig. 5.3)

Fig. 5.3 Urogenital Diaphragm

These two diaphragms seal and hold the life-force, or Chi energy to prevent its escape through the lower openings in the body when the openings passing through these diaphragms are tightly sealed, Chi pressure will be increased in the abdomen. When Chi pressure (pounds per square inch, or psi) strengthens, it will invigorate the vital organs, helping to improve the flow of Chi and blood.

The importance of these anatomical structures will become apparent as you study the Universal Tao System in its entirety. As previously mentioned, Iron Shirt Chi Kung exercises also help to develop power and strength in these areas and are a perfect complement for anyone seeking a daily regimen that will assist in the practice of Ovarian Kung Fu. (See the section at the end of this book entitled “The Universal Tao System” for a further description.)

D. Sacral and Cranial Pumps move Chi up the Spine

Contained and protected within your spinal column and skull is the very “heart” of your nervous system. (Fig. 5.4(a)) Cushioning it is the cerebrospinal fluid, “cerebro” for the head and “spinal” for the vertebrae. This fluid, as described by the Taoists long ago, is circulated by two pumps. One is located in the sacrum and is known as the Sacral Pump. The other is in the region of your upper neck and head and is known as the Cranial Pump. (Fig. 5.4(b)) Many people who have activated these pumps have reported the sensation of a “big bubble” of energy traveling up their spine during Ovarian Breathing.

1. Sacral Pump

Taoists regard the sacrum, containing the Sacral Pump, as a point at which the sexual energy coming up from the ovaries and perineum can be held and then transformed as it is given an upward push. It can be compared with a way station that refines the ovaries’ energy, or Ching Chi, as it circulates in the body. If the opening of the sacrum to the spinal column (the sacral histus) is blocked, the life-force cannot enter and flow up to the higher center:

2. Cranial Pump

The cranium of the skull has long been regarded by Taoists as a major pump for the circulation of energy from the lower centers to the higher centers. Medical research has recently confirmed that minute movements of the joints of the eight cranial bones occur during breathing. Cranial movement is responsible for the production and function of the cerebrospinal fluid surrounding the brain and spinal cord, and this is necessary for normal nerve and energy patterns in the entire body. Strengthening the cranial joints can increase energy and alleviate symptoms such as headaches, sinus problems, visual disturbances and neck problems.

Fig. 5.4(a) Natural Curvature of the Spine (b) Sacral Pump and Cranial Pump

In Taoism, cultivation of the movement of the pelvis, perineum, urogenital disphragm, anus, and the Sacral and Cranial Pumps is very important and necessary in helping to move the sexual energy up the spine.

In Ovarian Breathing, we use the mind and a slight tensing of the neck and jaw to help activate the Sacral and Cranial Pumps. In the Orgasmic Upward Draw we use a stronger power lock of the neck, teeth and muscles, a deep breath, and eye movement to assist in the activation of these pumps.

E. Chi Muscle assists in controlling the flow of Chi.

As we have already learned, one of the main objectives of the Taoist practice is to increase the flow of Chi, our life-force, to our organs and glands. The Inner Smile and Microcosmic Orbit Meditation are very important methods of reaching this objective, especially in the Healing Love practice, because they can help you open the channel through which the sexual energy has to flow up, assisting you in controlling the flow of sexual power. However without directing sexual healing energy to the organs, lovemaking becomes a normal social act, ending up in the loss and depletion of gland and organ energies. Crucial to the ability to control this flow of sexual energy is the development of a strong Chi Muscle.

1. Perineum Power

Included in the perineum region are the anus and sexual organs. The perineum region is known as the seat of Yin (cold) energy, and is closely connected to the organs and glands. (Fig. 5.5) The Chinese term for perineum, Hui-Yin, means the collection point of all Yin energy, or the lowest abdominal energy collection point. It is also known as the Gate of Death and Life. This point lies between the two main gates. The front gate, or sexual organs' gate, is the big life-force opening: here the life-force can easily leak out and deplete the organs' function. Although the walls of the vagina are tight during youth and after a refreshing sleep, they become looser as we age or when fatigued. The walls of the vagina, housing the PC Muscle, must be strong in order to permit the life-force energy to flow and increase their strength. The second gate, the back gate, is the anus.

Fig. 5.5 Perineum

Taoists regard the perineum region as the lowest disphragm, one that functions like a pump. Control of the Chi Muscle, consisting of the PC Muscle, the muscles of the pelvic and urogenital disphragms, the sphincter muscle of the anus, and many involuntary muscles located in this perineum region, influences the pumping action. As Ovarian Breathing floods this region with energy, the perineum, vagina and anus begin to tighten almost immediately. In the Tao practices, especially in Iron Shirt Chi Kung, the perineum's power to tighten, close and draw the life-force back up the spine is an important factor.

2. Anus is connected to Organ Energy.

The various sections of the anus region are closely linked with the organs' and glands' Chi. When not sealed or closed tight, we can easily lose the nutrition needed for our life-force and sexual energy through 'a river of no return": they will flow out and will not recycle.

3. Anus Region is divided into Five Sections.

The anus is divided into five sections: (a) middle, (b) front, (c) back, (d) left, and (e) right. (Fig. 5.6) By contracting and pulling up the various sections of the anus, you are also pulling up the perineum region, which partially consists of the anus.

Fig. 5.6 Anus is divided into Five Regions.

A. Middle Part

The middle of the anus Chi is connected with the organs and glands as follows: the vagina-uterus, aorta and vena cava, stomach, heart, thyroid, parathyroid, pituitary and pineal glands and top of the head. (Fig. 5.7).

Fig. 5.7 Middle Part Anus Pull Up

B. Front Part

The front of the anus Chi is connected with the following organs and glands: the bladder: cervix, small intestine, stomach, thymus and thyroid glands and front part of the brain. (Fig. 5.8)

Fig. 5.8 Front Part Anus Pull Up

C. Back Part

The back part of the anus Chi is connected with the organ and gland energies of: the sacrum, lower lumbar,: twelve thoracic vertebrae, seven cervical vertebra: and small brain (cerebellum). (Fig. 5.9)

Fig. 5.9 Back Part Anus Pull Up

D. Left Part

The left part of the anus Chi is connected with the organ and energies of: the left ovary, large intestine, left kidney, left adrenal gland, splee, left lung and left hemisphere of the brain. (Fig. 5.10)

Fig. 5.10 Left Part Anus Pull Up

Fig. 5.11 Right Part Anus Pull Up

Once you are well trained in controlling the Chi Muscle, you can easily guide the sexual healing energy to the particular organs or glands that you need to heal, or guide the energy to help your partner during lovemaking. In the latter part of the Orgasmic Upward Draw, you will learn how to guide your orgasms to the organs and glands.

F. Yang Ovaries' Energy-Healing and Creative Power

The ancient Taoists had extraordinarily astute powers of observation, and their findings on the subject of sex are surprisingly consistent over long stretches of time, which in China means not hundreds but thousands of years. This is significant because many groups did not know of any others' abilities, whereabouts, or even existence, since these esoteric practices were kept very secret.

During the first stages of ovulation the erengy is hot. As the egg travels toward the uterus the energy turns warm.

Fig. 5.11 Energy of Ovulation

They noted that the ovaries, as the factory that produces sexual energy in the form of eggs and female hormones, are of prime importance, because all of the vital organs, such as the brain, must contribute some of their own reserves to create and maintain them. Further their records point out that in the first part of a woman's cycle, there is a tremendous storage taking place of hot life-force energy which they called Yang Ching Chi (Ovarian Chi). (Fig. 5.12) As previously noted, Yang energy activates and charges an egg during a woman's ovulation with full potential life-force, and this is a sign of a strong and youthful energy with the power to create and heal.

Ovarian Chi, or Ching Chi, is denser than the life-force, or Chi, that normally circulates in the Microcosmic Orbit. Since it is thicker and slower to move, this energy needs all the help it can get to move upward to a higher energy center. Therefore it is important to be sure the channel of the Microcosmic Orbit is open and the Chi is flowing before proceeding to Orgasmic Breathing or the Orgasmic Upward Draw. Then the more inward the orgasm, and the more you can bring it upward, the more you will heal and revitalize as the Ching Chi (sexual energy) travels through the channel in its loop up the spine to the head and down the front through the navel, genitals and perineum, linking the various organs and glands with each other and with the brain. This energy can also be used to heal and revitalize your partner:

As the woman's cycle continues and the egg moves out of the body the experience of heat gives way to what has been described as a mildly warm quality. All sexual energy, whether male or female, is Yin in its latent or resting state. At this time the aroused sexual energy, now more Yin in nature, is more healing than creative. It is important to use this sexual energy and not let its vitality pour outward. IF it does, you have to start the process all over again.

II. Single Cultivatlon: Ovarlan Breathing, Ovarian and Vaginal Compression

Ovarian Breathing: The Ovarian Breathing exercise that follows will help you to open and utilize the channels of the Microcosmic Orbit, a process described briefly in Chapter 4 and in depth in the book Awaken Healing, Energy Through the Tao. In Ovarian Breathing you use your mind to draw the warm, Yang, vital egg energy up the spine to your head and to the third eye (located mid-eyebrow), down through the tongue, the heart, the solar plexus, finally to be stored in the navel. You will be drawing on the energy generated by the ovaries, eggs and hormones themselves. At first the process is slow, but later a simple thought will send delightful waves of energy up your back to your head.

Ovarian Compression: The second exercise, Ovarian Compression, trains you to have more control of the Chi Muscle to build up warm Ching energy in the ovaries and to move this energy safely upward.

Orgasmic Upward Draw: A third exercise, the Orgasmic Upward Draw, is the subject of Chapter 6. You will learn how to contend with the Ching energy when it is aroused, and how to extend the orgasm inward and upward. This is the most powerful way to energize and revitalize the organs, glands and brain. Like a wild mare, this energy is the most difficult to control. It is recommended that in the beginning you practice this exercise alone, using self-arousal, before attempting to tame your sexual energy at its most explosive time, i.e., with a lover during lovemaking.

A. Ovarian Breathing

1. Overview of the Exercise

The Ovarian Breathing exercise involves a gentle contraction of the Chi Muscle, as delicate as the closing petals of a flower and so minimal that any less would do nothing at all. The various postures will be described below, although it would be best to try this exercise standing up or sitting on the edge of a chair

You will be bringing your awareness to both ovaries. Then you will gather more energy in the area to be described as the “Ovarian Palace,” from which you will move the energy through the uterus to the perineum. From there you will guide it up your back to the brain, and then using your tongue as a switch, you will guide it down to your navel, where it can be stored.

We have noted that the energy of the ovaries is regarded as hot energy and, as such, can be stored in the heart center or navel center Some people store too much energy in the heart and find it causes heartburn and difficulty in breathing. This means there is excess energy that is not circulating sufficiently. Therefore, in the early stages of your practice, we advise you to store the sexual energy in the navel, and as your practice continues, store it in the heart to increase love, joy and compassion.

2. Postures

There are three postures in which to practice Ovarian Breathing: sitting, standing and lying.

A. Sitting

For simplicity and comfort, sit on a chair (Fig. 5.13) Sitting lends ease to a practice that favors relaxation and good concentration.

Fig. 5.13 Sitting Posture

Sit on the edge of a chair with both the legs and buttocks supporting your weight. Do not put all the weight on the sitting bones because in time this can create sciatic nerve pain. The vagina and perineum should not be constricted but should be covered with comfortable underwear or loose clothing to protect them from any draft. As a helpful technique used since olden times, a woman can place a hard, round object, perhaps a ball, in such a way that it presses directly on her vagina and clitoris during practice, or she can sit on the heel of one foot, pressing it tightly against the clitoris to help the Chi activate easily. If you practice the Microcosmic Orbit circulation and Iron Shirt Chi Kung, you should be well practiced at directing energy upward and can omit this step.

Raise the tongue to the roof of the mouth: this is essential in circulating the Chi and completing the loop between the front and back channels of the Microcosmic Orbit. (Fig. 5.14) The feet are firmly planted on the floor with the hands resting palms-down on the knees. The back should be quite straight at the waist, but slightly round at the shoulders and neck. This very minor forward curvature of the upper back tends to relax the chest, and helps the power flow through the neck, chest, and abdomen. Keep the chin slightly tucked in. Military posture, with shoulders thrown back and head held high, tends to lodge power in the upper body and prevent its circulating back down to lower centers.

Fig. 5.14 Tongue touches the palate so the energy can flow down.

A variant of the sitting position is to sit cross-legged, either in the lotus position or American Indian style. We appreciate the esoteric virtues of the lotus position, but Chinese practice attributes serious disadvantages to this sitting position. Some monks suffered severe sciatic nerve pain or were crippled by lengthy meditation in the lotus position. Also, turning the soles of the feet away from the ground prevents you from directly drawing in through the feet the earth's Yin power. When you are very good at controlling and directing the energy, you can sit in any position and still direct the energy as you wish. Howeve, the human body is designed to absorb earth energy through the kidney (K-1 point) and other meridians in the feet and filter it before passing it up to the coccyx and brain. Some people can develop problems if they absorb too much "raw" earth Chi directly into their perineum and sacrum, as occurs in the lotus position. Eventually they become allergic to this undigested energy and experience numerous unpleasant reactions. Nevertheless, the lotus position may be used by those accustomed and devoted to it, as long as they are comfortable and can apply their whole attention to the exercise. Few cross-legged positions afford the relaxation of the perineum provided by sitting on the edge of a chair.

B. Standing

Another good position is standing. The above instructions on raising the tongue tip to the palate and maintaining correct posture apply equally to this position.

Standing is particularly favorable for Ovarian Breathing because the sacrum and pelvis can relax. Standing up straight in a relaxed manner encourages good posture. The hands are at the aides and the feet are shoulders' width apart. Discipline yourself to relax if you feel too tense, or the Chi power may stick in the heart region and make you irritable.

C. Lying

In the beginning, before you learn to control the energy, do not lie flat on your back when performing these exercises. In this position the chest sits higher than the abdomen and receives too much energy. Nor should you lie on the left side. Both of these positions unduly stress the heart. The proper lying position is on the right side. A pillow placed beneath the head should raise it about three or four inches, so that the head sits squarely on the shoulders. The four fingers of the right hand are placed immediately in front of the right ear while the thumb sits behind the ear and folds it slightly forward to keep it open. The ear must stay open to permit air to flow through the Eustachian tube and keep the left and right ears' pressures balanced. This is important because you can create a lot of Chi pressure during this practice. The left hand rests on the outer left thigh. The right leg is straight: the left leg, which rests on the right, is slightly bent. (Fig. 5.15)

Fig. 5.15 Best way to practice Ovarian Breathing lying down is on the right side of the body with a pillow beneath the head, the right leg extended, the left leg resting on the right thigh, and the right hand supporting the head.

Lions often sleep in a similar position. Animals have a wise instinct since this position frees the spinal column from the pressure of gravity, allowing it to assume its natural curvature. Lying on the right side can relieve the spine from stress.

As mentioned previously, when you have mastered the energy well, you can lie on your back to practice, but make sure that the energy is not stuck in the chest and the heart. Do not lie on the left side.

3. Step-By-Step Guide

In this section we will explain each step in great detail. In Section 4 we guide you through the practice. Finally, in Section 5 we give a summary of the practice, to be used as a guideline only when you are more advanced.

Unless otherwise specifically indicated, all breathing is to be done through the nose. Nasal breathing affords better control of the air in haled. It filters and warms the air and supplies life-force of a well-balanced quality.

Sit erect on the edge of your chair with your feet flat on the floor approximately shoulders' width apart. Remember to wear loose pants or comfortable underwear to protect the vaginal opening from drafts and to avoid leakage of Chi. Do not practice naked in a cold room, or you will lose a lot of Chi.

Make sure you feel very relaxed. If you are tense, do some stretching exercises or take a walk first in order to disperse tension.

Fig. 5.16 Locating the Ovaries and the Ovarian Palace

A. Bringing Energy into the Ovarisn Palace and Down to the First Station: Perineum

(1) Bringing Energy into the Ovarian Palace

Begin the exercise by locating the Ovarian Palace. Place both thumbs on the navel and use your index fingers to form a triangle. The place where the index fingers touch is the Ovarian Palace. Spread out your little fingers evenly: underneath the points where they rest are the ovaries. (Fig. 5.16) As your little fingers rest on them, become aware of them. Rub the ovaries until you feel them warming. Concentrate in order to produce more energy from the ovaries and eggs. Simultaneously use your mind to control the P-C Muscle to close and open slightly the vagina as delicately as the petals of a flower: The energy may begin to manifest itself with such sensations as warmth, tightness, swelling. tingling, etc. Each person can react differently from the energy. When you start to feel something, inhale and bring the energy to the Ovarian Palace (where the index fingers touch). The gentle opening and closing of the vagina and the concentration of your mind gradually will enable you to collect and absorb the ovaries' energy into the Ovarian Palace.

(2) First Station: Perineum

Inhale a short sip of air only land inhale in this manner every time you are asked to inhale throughout this exercise). As you inhale, pull the ovaries' energy down from the Ovarian Palace to the perineum by contracting both the outer and inner lips of the vagina, pulling downward toward the perineum, and then contract and pull up the front of the anus (perineum). Remember that contraction of the vagina is a contraction of the PC (Pubococcygeal) Muscle, one part of a group of muscles we refer to as the Chi Muscle. This action initiates the contraction of the entire Chi Muscle group, which continues when the anus is contracted and pulled up. Since the anus belongs to the area known as the perineum, we can say that "to contract and pull up the anus" is "to contract and pull up the perineum." To avoid confusion from this point on in describe the contractions used in Ovarian Breathing, we will describing the contraction of the Chi Muscle as "to contract and pull up the perineum." You might feel the route the energy follows, i.e., traveling from the top of the uterus down into the uterus, through the cervical canal and vagina, and down to the perineum. The energy might make a detour to the shaft and glans of the clitoris before arriving at the perineum. In any case, you should feel the energy move from the Ovarian Palace to the perineum, whether or not you experience the exact route it follows. Hold your breath, inhale in short sips, close the vagina tightly and retain the ovaries' energy at the front part of the perineum for a while. (Fig. 5.17)

Fig. 5.17 Ovarian Breathing

Exhale. Now concentrate on that warm feeling and mentally guide it from your ovaries to the front part of your perineum, letting the energy flow to the perineum via the uterus, down through the cervical canal and along the back wall of the vagina. Feel the flow as it travels the few inches to the perineum, an action induced by setting your mind at the perineum to hold the energy there. It is important to learn to maintain your attention at the perineum, because if you release it, the warm sexual energy will leak out. Be aware of the energy now flowing from the Ovarian Palace to the perineum. With each inhalation and exhalation counting as one, repeat the process nine times per session. Each time return to the ovaries, and while there inhale and exhale several times to build up more energy before you begin the process again.

(3) Retention of Sexual Energy at the Perineum Point

Think of drinking a full glass of water through a straw. You cannot draw all the water in one sip, you have to break the flow in order to breathe, and if you do not hold or retain the water that you already have in the straw, the water will flow out. In order to drink again you will have to begin drawing through the straw all over again. However if you place your finger over the top of the straw while you breathe short sips of air you can hold the water inside it. Similarly, the retention of the Ching Chi at the perineum is very important, for if you release your attention, the warm energy will drop down to the sexual organs and leak out of the vagina. By practicing, you will learn to use the power of the mind to hold the energy there. Practice for several days or until you are successful.

(4) Returning to the Ovarian Palace

As you strive to reach each energy transformation point in Ovarian Breathing, you must begin each time by returning to the Ovarian Palace to collect the ovaries' energy. Practice Ovarian Breathing by opening and closing the vagina slightly in order to collect the energy in the Ovarian Palace. Once you feel that enough ovaries' energy has been collected, repeat the process of bringing energy to the perineum: each time inhale a little sip of air and close the vagina with minimal movement of the Chi Muscle. At the same time that you close the vagina, pull slightly downward toward the perineum, and then contract and pull up the front part of the perineum. Hold your breath, inhale in short sips, close the vagina tightly and use your mind to create an awareness of the perineum point, thereby drawing the ovaries' energy to this point. Retain the energy at the front part of the perineum. Upon exhalation rest for a while, mentally guiding and feeling the Ching Chi as it travels from the Ovarian palace down to the vagina, clitoris and perineum, while maintaining your awareness of the perineum point and continuing to hold energy there.

In the Taoist practice sexual energy is the primary energy. If you only exercise the muscles and have no knowledge about life-force and sexual energy, then the benefits are less. Practice to this point for one to two weeks, or until you can definitely feel the energy at the perineum, the ovaries and the Ovarian Palace. There will be a sensation of energy traveling down to the vagina. and then there will be a strong feeling as the energy travels gradually to the clitoris.

Remember: unless specifically indicated otherwise, all breathing is to be done through the nose since nasal breathing affords better control of the air inhaled. Also, all inhalations are short sips of air:

The whole body must relax. Allow all tension to flow out of you as if you were in meditation. Use the mind alone to raise and lower the sexual energy. With practice you will learn to identify the hot Ching Chi stored in the ovaries' area. Always start your breathing and collecting in the ovaries first, until you get in touch with the energy

B. Moving the energy up the Spine through the Second Station: Sacrum, First Energy Transformation Point

Along with the ability to hold sexual energy; the sacrum also helps transform it into the first stage of life-force energy.

(1) Guiding Energy to the Sacrum

Guide the ovaries' warm energy down from the Ovarian Palace to the perineum and up to the sacrum by first inhaling a short sip of air slightly contracting and closing the vagina's outer and inner lips, pulling downward toward the perineum, and then contracting and pulling up the front part of the perineum. Pause for a while, holding your breath, inhale in short sips, close the vagina tightly and retain the ovaries' energy at the front part of the perineum. Be aware of the Ching Chi as it flows to this point. Exhale and return to the ovaries, maintaining a part of your awareness at the perineum to retain the energy that you have brought there. Practice Ovarian Breathing by opening and closing the vagina slightly and collect the energy in the Ovarian Palace. Once you feel that enough ovaries' energy has been collected, inhale and close the vagina, pulling downward toward the perineum, and then contract and pull the front part of the perineum upward to bring energy to this area. Rest briefly and be aware of the energy that travels from the ovaries down to the vagina, clitoris and perineum. Inhale slightly. Now pull up the middle part of the perineum, and at the same time pull up the back part of the perineum toward the coccyx at the very bottom of your spine.

(2) Activating the Sacral Pump

Slightly arch your lower back outward thereby tilting the sacrum downward to bring the energy to this point. As you pull the Ovarian energy up the front, middle and back parts of the perineum to the coccyx and then to the sacrum, hold the sacrum down to help activate the Sacral Pump (Fig. 5.18), which action will be further accentuated if you gently tighten the back of your neck and skull bones. In the beginning use a wall as a guide by pushing the sacrum against the wall, thereby exerting force on it. Hold the energy at the sacrum for a while, then exhale, but continue to focus your attention on this point.

Fig. 5.18 Activating the Sacral Pump involves tilting the sacrum down without moving the hip bone.

(3) Opening the Sacral Hiatus

The hiatus opening of the sacrum is an indentation in the bone of the sacrum located a little up from the tip of your spine, and is the place through which, once opened, you will draw your warm, ovarian energy into the spine, (Fig. 5.19) It is usually a little difficult to work because ovarian energy is denser than Chi and has to be pumped through. Some people experience pain, a tingling sensation, or "pins and needles" when this energy enters the hiatus. If this happens to you, do not be upset. You can help pass the energy through the hiatus if you are having trouble by gently massaging the area with a silk cloth from time to time.

(4) Resting to Feel the Energy move Unassisted

Now let your sacrum and neck relax back to their normal positions. As they relax you will feel the energy move by itself, assisted by the activation of both the Sacral and Cranial Pumps. At the same time practice Ovarian Breathing. Bring the energy up to the sacrum again and hold it there until you can feel the hiatus at the sacrum open and the energy gradually move up. You will actually feel the warm energy move up a little at a time. Practice nine times, then rest. The resting period is very important. Many times while you are resting the energy will rise up through the point you had been focusing on. If you can, still your mind and use it to guide the energy along the pathway you have been working on for a while, and then rest your mind and let the energy move by itself: the energy will automatically flow through this pathway

(5) Exercise to help open the Sacrum

If you have trouble feeling the energy at the sacrum, the following exercise can be helpful in opening the sacrum. Try rocking your sacrum back and forth and then hold the hips stationary moving the sacrum only. The sacrum and the hips are three separate pieces of bone which eventually become fused because we do not exercise them. (Fig. 5.20) Use both hands to hold the hips and try to rock the sacrum. In the beginning it is difficult to do, but after a while you will gradually separate the hips from the sacrum. You can also ask a friend to hold your sacrum with one hand while his other hand is on your hip in order to let you know if it is the hip or the sacrum that you are moving. After this exercise hold still and observe the effect of the pumping.

Fig. 5.20 Sacrum and the hip bones are three separate pieces of bone which, through lack of exercise, become fused.

(6) Sacrum assists in transforming Raw Sexual Energy into Life-Force Energy.

The Taoist masters discovered that the sacrum has the ability to transform sexual energy into a life-force energy that is more readily accepted by the organs and glands. Therefore, the practitioner must be aware of the state of the energy entering the middle part of the body. Some people practice by pulling up only the middle part of the perineum, causing the raw ovaries' energy to shoot up the middle part of the body and become stuck in the organs and glands. Unaccustomed to handling this kind of raw sexual energy, the organs and glands will suffer from such disorders as indigestion, overheating (especially the liver), pain in the kidneys and back, and worst of all, heart congestion. These and other symptoms have come to be known as the "Kundalini Syndrome," and they occur because the person is not open enough to channel this raw sexual energy before it enters the vital organs. This phenomenon is mentioned in the books entitled Kwantida-Psychotic or Transcendental, by Lee Sanella, M.D., and Stalking the Wild Pendulum, by Itzhak Bentov. These books contain examples of many people who suffer from the inability to control the rising energy. The energy they hold in their hearts or in their heads is either too raw or too hot for those organs, with parts of the organs having an allergic reaction to that energy. However the symptoms disappeared once they learned about and felt the connection of the tongue to the roof of the mouth during the Microcosmic Orbit meditation. This connection allows the energy flowing up the spine through the major stations to transform into life-force energy and flow down to the navel. Many never know how to escape their problem of too much raw sexual energy rising up because they never learn how to bring the energy to the proper channels to circulate it back down.

Once you have practiced Ovarian Breathing and have felt the sexual energy circulate and become transformed, your organs will begin to adapt to and withstand the ovaries raw sexual energy. This energy can then be directly transformed and refuted whenever the body requires it without problems arising.

C. Third Station: T-11, Sexual- Energy Transformation Point

If you have managed to bring the energy up through the sacrum, spend the next week drawing the ovaries' energy to T-11 (the eleventh thoracic vertebra) in your mid-back opposite your solar plexus. T-11 also has the ability to transform the sexual energy into life-force energy.

(1) Collecting Energy in the Ovarian Palace

In the same manner as above, start with Ovarian Breathing, collecting the ovaries' energy in the Ovarian Palace by opening and closing the vagina with a minimal movement of the Chi Muscle. Inhale with a short sip, close the vagina slightly, pulling the energy downward toward the perineum. Then contract and pull up the front part of the perineum and pause for a while, holding your breath and retaining the energy at this point. Be aware of the Ching Chi that has been brought there. Inhale in short sips, close the vagina tightly and concentrate on retaining the ovaries' energy at the front part of the perineum. Exhale and return to the ovaries, but maintain a part of your awareness at the perineum to retain the energy that you have brought there. Continue to practice Ovarian Breathing by opening and closing the vagina slightly and collecting the energy in the Ovarian Palace.

(2) Drawing Energy to T-11

Once you feel that enough ovaries' energy has been collected, inhale using a short sip and close the vagina by pulling downward, thereby pulling the energy down to the perineum, and then contract and pull the front part of the perineum upward to bring energy to this area. Rest for a while and be aware of the energy that travels from the ovaries down to the vagina, clitoris and perineum. Inhale a short sip and pull up the middle and back part of the perineum toward the coccyx to bring the energy to the sacrum. Slightly tilt the sacrum outward as if you were pushing the sacrum to the wall. Pause for a while and feel the Sacral Pump activate. Inhale a short sip again without exhaling, and tilt your spine outward against the imaginary wall to straighten T-11. This will create an upward pumping action which will pull the ovaries' energy up to T-11. (Fig. 5-21) Retain the energy at this point until the area feels full and until you feel the energy continue to open T-n and move up by itself. When you feel uncomfortable exhale and regulate your breath.

(3) Flexing the T-11 Point assists in activating the Sacral and Cranial Pumps and the Adrenal Minipump.

As previously noted, Ovarian energy is denser than Chi. You will have to accommodate it by flexing the part of your back housing T-11 in and out, thereby straightening the spine at this point and loosening it for freer passage of the warm energy. Then allow your sacrum, T-11 and neck to relax back to their normal positions. This action will help to activate both the Sacral and Cranial Pumps, as well as another mini pump located at the adrenal glands, a little at a time. If you have trouble feeling this, return again to the Ovarian Palace and repeat the process. Practice nine times, then exhale and relax every part of the body. Concentrate on T-11 and feel the energy flow up to this point.

In Taoist practice we regard T-11 as the adrenal glands' energy center The adrenal glands sit atop your kidneys end can act as a mini pump. When you arch the T-11 point you create a vacuum (or mini pump) in this area to push the energy up higher. The sacrum, Fig. 5.21 Guiding Energy up to T-11.

T-11, C-7 and Jade Pillow in Taoism all are regarded as places that have the ability to transform sexual energy into life-force energy. In the T-11 area the Door of Life (the Ming Men, or mid-point of the spine) is also located. The Ming Men does not have this property, but in the Microcosmic Orbit it is regarded as a very important safety point, as well as the strengthening point of the kidneys.

D. Fourth Station: C-7, Sexual Energy Transformation Point

Your next stopping point is at cervical-7, or C-7, located at the point of your spine at the base of your neck. You can feel it as the vertebra that sticks out when you bend your head down. This point controls the energy provided to the hands and neck, and is the connecting point providing power to the scapulae and spinal cord. This point also has the ability to transform sexual energy into life-force energy.

(1) Collecting Energy in the Ovarian Palace

Practice in the same manner described above. Collect the ovaries' energy at the Ovarian Palace. Inhale with a short sip, close the vagina slightly, pulling the energy downward toward the perineum. Then contract and pull up the front part of the perineum and pause for a while, holding your breath and retaining the energy at this point. Be aware of the Ching Chi that has been brought there. Inhale in short sips, close the vagina tightly and concentrate on retaining the ovaries' energy at the front part of the perineum. Exhale and return to the ovaries, but maintain a part of your awareness at the perineum to retain the energy that you have brought there. Continue to practice Ovarian Breathing by opening and closing the vagina slightly and collecting the energy in the Ovarian Palace.

(2) Drawing Energy to C-7

Once you feel that enough ovaries' energy has been collected, inhale a short sip of air and close the vagina, pulling the ovaries' energy downward toward the perineum, and then pull the front part of the perineum upward to bring energy to this area. Rest for a while and be aware of the energy that travels from the ovaries downto the vagina, clitoris and perineum. Inhale a short sip and contact the middle and back part of the perineum, and then pull the energy up to the sacrum, T-11 and C-7. When you reach C-7, push slightly from the sternum, to the back, and feel the push of C-7 and both shoulders as they activate to draw the energy up. (Fig. 5.22) This action will activate the thymus gland to increase the upward pulling power. Hold the energy at this point as comfortably as you can. Now during practice you will find that gradually you are able to hold your breath longer and increase your capacity to intake air. Exhale, and then let your sacrum, T-11 and neck relax, returning to their normal positions. Concentrate on C-7. This action will help to activate all three pumps (Sacral, Adrenal and Cranial) a little at a time. If you have trouble feeling this action, return to the Ovarian Palace and repeat the process. Practice nine times. Remember that you must return to the source of energy in order to bring it to the higher center

E. Fifth Station: Jade Pillow, Mini-Storage and Transformation Point for Sexual Energy

Your next stopping place is your Jade Pillow. This is located at the back of your head between cervical-1, or C-1, and the base of the skull. This point also can serve as a small storage and transformation point for sexual energy.

(1) Collecting Energy in the Ovarian Palace

Practice in the same manner as previously described. Collect the ovaries' energy at the Ovarian Palace. Close the vagina with a minimal movement of the Chi Muscle, pulling down the ovaries' energy to the perineum. Feel the sensation as the vagina closes, and then pull up the front part of the perineum to bring the ovaries' energy to this point. Hold your breath and retain the energy at the front part of the perineum. Be aware of the Ching Chi that has been brought there. Exhale and return to the ovaries, but maintain an awareness of the perineum to retain the energy that you have brought there. Practice Ovarian Breathing by opening and closing the vagina slightly in order to collect the energy in the Ovarian Palace.

(2) Drawing Energy to the Jade Pillow

Once you feel that enough ovaries' energy has been collected, inhale a short sip and close the vagina, pulling the ovaries' energy downward to the perineum, and then contract and pull the front part of the perineum upward to bring energy to this area. Rest for a while and be aware of the energy that travels from the ovaries down to the vagina, clitoris and perineum. Inhale another short sip and bring the energy up to the sacrum, T-11, and C-7, and then slightly push the chin down and pull it back, moving it toward the back of the neck at the base of the skull. (Fig. 5.23) Feel this push create a force that activates the Cranial Pump, which will help to pump the dense ovaries' energy. Hold the energy at this point for a while, feeling it being stored and transformed. Exhale, then permit your sacrum, T-11 and neck to relax in their normal positions. This action will help to activate the Adrenal, Sacral and Cranial Pumps again. Retain the energy at the base of the skull. Repeat this entire process nine times.

Fig. 5.23 Guiding Energy up to the Jade Pillow.

F. Sixth Station: Crown Point, Larger Storage Point For Sexual Energy

Your next stopping point is called the Pai-Hui, located at the midpoint or crown, of your head and is the center housing the pineal gland. This point is a larger storage point.

(1) Collecting Energy in the Ovarian Palace

Practice in the same manner: only this time you will fill the "straw" to the top. Collect the ovaries' energy at the Ovarian Palace. Close the vagina with a minimal movement of the Chi Muscle, pulling the ovaries' energy down to the perineum, and feeling the sensation as the vagina closes: contract and pull down the front part of the perineum to bring the energy there. Hold your breath and retain the energy at the perineum. Be aware of the Ching Chi that has been brought to this place. Exhale and return to the ovaries, but maintain an awareness at the perineum to retain the energy that you have brought there. Practice Ovarian Breathing by opening and closing the vagina slightly in order to collect the energy in the Ovarian Palace.

(2) Drawing Energy to the Crown Point

Once you feel that enough ovaries' energy has been collected, inhale a short sip and close the vagina by pulling downward to bring the ovaries' energy to the perineum, and then contract and pull up the front part of the perineum to bring energy to this area. Rest for a while and be aware of the energy that travels from the ovaries down to the vagina, clitoris and perineum. Inhale and tilt the sacrum and T-11 to the back in order to straighten the spinal curve out a little bit and thereby help activate the lower Sacral Pump. At the same time push the sternum in toward the back, tuck your chin in a little, and squeeze the back of your skull: this will activate the upper Cranial Pump. Continue pulling up to the point at the top, the center of the head. (Fig. 5.24) As you continue to inhale, bring the energy down to the perineum, up to the sacrum, T-11, C-7, lade Pillow, and then turn your eyes and other senses upward to help guide the energy up to the point of the Pai-Hui, or crown point, and the pineal gland.

(3) Resting and using your mind to guide energy to the Brain

Once the energy finally has completed its course up into your head, use your eyes and other senses to help retain it in the brain, holding it at the top of your brain as comfortably as possible. Exhale, then let your sacrum, T-11 and neck relax, returning to their normal positions. This will help to activate the three pumps: Sacral, Adrenal and Cranial. Use your mind to guide the energy station-to-station up the spine to the top of the head. Fix your attention and eyes at the crow·n point. Remember it is the resting, period that is the strongest in guiding the energy to the brain. Repeat this process nine times.

Fig. 5.24 Guiding Energy up to the Crown Point.

G. Circulating the Energy in the Brain

(I) Filling the Brain Cavity with Creative Sexual Enengy

When you have finished practicing nine times, and can feel the ovaries' sexual energy fill the brain, start to circulate the energy in the brain for nine, eighteen, or thirty-six counterclockwise revolutions. There is a very distinct feeling of spinning outward. (Fig. 5.25(a)) When this circulation is completed, turn the energy back into the center of the brain for nine, eighteen, or thirty-six clockwise revolutions. (Fig. 5.25(b)) This should feel pleasant and energetic and will help to balance the left and right sides of the brain, vitalizing it to increase memory and think more clearly, and it will introduce you to the beginning stages of the ability to control sexual energy and emotional frustrations. As people age and use up much of their Chi, they gradually drain themselves of brain energy and spinal fluids, drying them up and leaving a cavity. Ovarian Breathing transports creative sexual energy to refill this cavity and thereby revitalize the brain. Taoists regard sexual energy as similar to brain energy.

(2) Touching the Tongue to the Palate to Permit the Energy to flow down to the Navel for Storage.

Be sure the tongue is touching the palate (behind the front teeth will suffice), so that the warm ovaries' energy can flow down to the third eye, to the inside of your nose, and through the tongue from which it is now able to travel down the throat to the heart center.

(a) Circulate the energy in the brain nine, eighteen or thirty-six times counterclockwise (Spinning outward).

(b) When the counterclockwise turns are completed, circulate the energy nine, eighteen or thirty-six times clockwise (Spinning inward).

Fig. 5.25 Circulating Energy in the Crown

(Fig. 5-26) Retain the energy in the heart center for a while, filling it with energy until it feels open: enjoy the feeling of love, joy and peace: then bring it down to the solar plexus and to the navel. Collect the sexual energy at the navel where it can be safety stored.

Fig. 5.26 Tongue touches the palate so the energy can flow down.

H. Collecting the Ovaries' Sexual Energy at the Navel

It is very important to end by storing the energy in the navel. Most ill effects of the practice are caused by an excess of energy in the head or the heart. The navel can safely handle the increased energy generated by the ovaries.

(1) Spiraling the Energy around your Navel Center

To collect the ovaries' energy concentrate on your navel area, which is about one and a half inches inside your body. Use your mind, eyes and other senses to mentally move the energy in and out, spiraling it around your navel 36 times. Do not spiral above the thoracic diaphragm or below the pubic bone. Start by spiraling counterclockwise outward. (Fig. 5.27(a)) Then reverse the direction of the spiral and bring it back to the navel, circling it clockwise 24 times. (Fig. 5.27(b)) Use your finger as a guide the first few times. The energy is now safely stored in your navel, available to you whenever and wherever your body needs it.

(a) Collect the energy in the navel, circling it 36 times counterclockwise, and

Fig. 5.27 Collecting Smiling Energy in the Navel

(b) 24 times clockwise

Fig. 5.27 Collecting Smiling Energy in the Navel

I. Collecting Energy in the Heart

The energy can also be stored in the heart. If you are a Yang body type (meaning your energy runs hotter than most people, perhaps manifesting in a hot temper), you should not start by storing the sexual energy in the heart center. Instead, begin by storing it in the navel. Once the navel is filled, this is an indication that the channels are open enough to begin to store energy in the heart without problems.

The heart center is a powerhouse for a woman. It is the seat of love, joy, happiness, and is the center of rejuvenation since it is the site of the thymus gland. With this center open a woman will experience these positive emotions along with an energetic approach toward herself, and she will be provided with abundant healing energy to heal herself and others. If the heart center is opened before she is ready, the Microcosmic Orbit will not be complete and the energy will not circulate property. The sexual energy can adhere to the heart, and the heat generated and congested there can cause great problems such as uneasiness, shortness of breath, or pain in the chest. If these problems happen to you, practice the Healing Sound of the heart as detailed in the book Taoist Ways to Transform Stress into Vitality, lightly tap the chest and the heart, and use your hands to brush your chest down· ward until you belch to release the trapped energy.

(a) To collect the energy in the heart,
Spiral around the heart collection point 36 times counterclockwise, and

Fig. 5.28 Collecting Smiling Energy in the Heart

(b) 24 times clockwise.

Fig. 5.28 Collecting Smiling Energy in the Heart

(1) Spiraiing the Energy around your Heart Center

To collect the ovaries' energy in the heart, concentrate on your heart center located up one inch from the lower tip of the sternum, and about one and a half inches inside your body. It is approximately three inches in dimension. Use your mind, eyes and other senses to mentally move the energy in and out, spiraling around your heart center 36 times. (Fig. 5.28(a)) Do not spiral above the diaphragm or below the pubic bone. Start by spiraling counterclockwise outward. Then reverse the direction of the spiral, returning the energy to the heart center circling it 24 times. (Fig. 5.28(b)) Use your finger as a guide for the first few times. The energy is now safely stored in your heart center available whenever and wherever your body needs it.

J. Bringing Energy to the Brain With One Action

In the beginning travel from station to station, until you feel that the back channel, or Governor Channel, is more open. Once you have mastered the process you can practice the Ovarian Breathing exercise and the energy will travel up to the brain in one sweet drawing-up of the "straw," using a single, clean inhalation and one contraction of the vagina. Exhale, then inhale and bring the energy up again. Practice this a few times, but since the ovarian energy is warm, be sure to put your tongue up to your palate and bring the energy down to the navel. Eventually all you will need is your concentration on both your ovaries and the crown of your head to mentally move the sexual energy from the ovaries all the way up to the brain in one step.

K. Effects of Ovarian Energy

This subtle exercise puts you in touch with your Ovarian energy. Women report that they feel the energy moving up their spine: some say it feels wide, thick like honey, and slow. Most women who perceive the temperature at all say it feels warm. Some women experience it as cool at first, but after practicing for a while, notice it changes to warm. Some experience sensations in their genitals or on their thighs, usually describing them as warm to hot. Many women describe the energy as warmer wider heavier or thicker than the organ Chi energy circulated in the Microcosmic Orbit. This is because the Ovarian energy is heavier and denser:

It is not unusual that the energy feels cold when there is a lot of healing going on, such as in women who have menstrual problems. The sensations can vary over time. What is important to know is that if the energy feels warm, it must be circulated and not left up in the head.

One session of Ovarian Breathing should take about ten minutes. When completed four to seven times a week, women have reported noticeable changes in their menstrual cycles, such as less bleeding, leas cramping, and a reduction in breast pain. With continued practice, menstruation ceases. The energy conserved in such a manner becomes part of the vital energy of the body increasing the available energy for transformation into a higher form. Also, there is historical evidence that the women who practice Ovarian Kung Fu, when they decide to have children, will produce very healthy well-balanced children.

Some perform Ovarian Breathing and then proceed directly to the Microcosmic Orbit Meditation. The practice can be done any time and virtually anywhere, once you have achieved the direct pathway from the ovaries to the brain. When you find yourself with unstructured time, e.g., waiting in line, commuting, at your desk, looking at television, in bed, etc., carry out several series of contractions. as many as you choose to fill the time available. The main consideration is that the back be properly straight, the chest relaxed, and the vagina protected from the breeze. You must also remember to touch your tongue to your palate after you practice three or four times.

Take your time to really feel the warmth when you practice. Do not rush it, and always maintain the action of the pumps as you breathe in and out. Use a more mental than physical pull when you do the exercise. Let the warm feeling be your guide. Always remember to bring the energy down to the navel after a few breaths, since the navel is roomy and a safe place to store this warm vital energy.

It is highly desirable to use Ovarian Breathing to tone the pelvic diaphragm. The whole lower abdomen is deeply massaged each time the pelvic diaphragm flexes. Life-force flows into the region through periodic waves of breath which stimulate the glands and vital organs.

Ovarian Breathing has tremendous implications for women's control over their reproductive systems. There is not enough evidence to conclude that women can control their fertility through this method. History records, however that when a woman practices the Orgasmic Upward Draw, she can control her cervix and urethra very well, squeezing the urethra (before the cervix) tightly so a man's sperm cannot enter the cervix to join with her egg.

There is too little evidence to come to any conclusions about the effectiveness or reversibility of this method when used for birth control. However some women are experimenting with this method, trusting that it will be reversible just by stopping the practice for a couple of months. These women feel justified in using themselves as their own laboratories, since the method is gentle and appears to be under control. So many women, out of desperation to control their reproductive systems, have already accepted the wholesale experimentation of dangerous birth control methods, by supposedly trustworthy institutions, such as IUDs, DES, morning-after pills, sequential birth control pills, and forced sterilization.

4. Steps to Practice

a. Sit erect on the edge of your chair with your feet flat on the floor about shoulders' width apart. Make sure you feel very relaxed. If you are tense, do some stretching exercises, practice the Inner Smile to the tense part, or take a walk to disperse tension.

b. Find the Ovarian Palace by placing both thumbs at the navel and forming a triangle with your index fingers. Spread your little fingers: the place where they come to rest is the site of your ovaries. Become aware of them. Rub the ovaries until they become warm. Concentrate to produce more energy from the ovaries and eggs. Use your mind and very little pressure on the P-C Muscle to close and open the vagina. When you feel enough energy has been generated, inhale a short sip of air, bringing the energy to the Ovarian Palace.

c. Inhale another sip of air and create a downward pulling action of the ovaries' energy to the perineum by contracting the outer and inner lips of the vagina. Then contract and pull up the front part of the perineum so that the energy will travel there. Maintain an awareness of the front part of the perineum for a while.

d. Exhale and breathe normally Rest and guide the warm feeling from your ovaries to your perineum, letting the energy flow to the perineum via the uterus, down through the cervical canal and along the back wall of the vagina. At the same time feel it flow the few inches to the perineum, an action induced by putting your mind at the perineum and maintaining your attention there. Inhale and exhale several times from the ovaries to build up more energy. The retention of the ovaries' sexual energy (Ching Chi) at the perineum is very important, for if you release your attention, the warm energy will leak out.

e. Start at the Ovarian Palace and use Ovarian Breathing, inhaling and exhaling until you feel that the energy is ready. Inhaling in short sips, draw the warm energy from your ovaries to the perineum, and then by pulling up the middle and back of the perineum, draw the energy up to your coccyx, located at the very bottom end of your spine. The sacral hiatus, an area made mostly of bone and located a little up from the tip of your spine at the sacrum, is the opening through which the energy must pass.

Once you have pulled the warm energy of the ovaries down to the perineum, contracted the front of the perineum, and then pulled up the middle and back part of the perineum, follow by tilting the sacrum, slightly arching your lower back outward and pushing the bottom of your sacrum as if you were standing with your back against and wall and flattening against it. Then tilt the sacrum downward and hold it in this position in order to activate the Sacral Pump, which will be further accentuated if you gently tuck in your chin and straighten the back of your neck and skull. Hold the energy at the sacrum for a while, then exhale but continue to maintain your attention at the sacrum. Repeat the process nine times.

f. Once you have managed to bring the energy up through your coccyx and sacral hiatus, spend the next week drawing the warm energy to the eleventh thoracic vertebra (T-11) in your mid-back opposite the solar plexus. Practice in the same manner, inhaling short sips of air while pulling and guiding the energy from the perineum up your spine to the sacrum, and then to T-11. Pull up and retain the energy at T-11, tilt to the back, and feel the point fill with energy and continue to open as the energy moves up by itself.

T-11 is the energy center for the adrenal glands, which sit on top of your kidneys. In Taoist practice we regard the adrenal glands as a mini pump. As you arch, you will create a vacuum here to push the energy up higher:

g. Your next stopping place is at the base of the neck, called cervical-7, or C-7. Practice in the same manner as described above: inhaling short sips of air and pumping energy from the ovaries down to the perineum and up to the sacrum and T-11. Slightly push from the sacrum to bring the energy to C-7, and then pull and guide it there. Repeat this process nine times.

h. Your next stopping place is your Jade Pillow. This is located at the back of your head, between cervical-1, or C-1, and the base of the skull. Practice in the same manner as described above, inhaling short sips as you continue to pump the ovaries' energy down to the perineum and up to the sacrum, T-11, C-7, C-1 and Jade Pillow. There is a small storage place in this area where you can store the ovaries' energy for further use, although it is the upper part of the brain that is the largest storage place for energy. Repeat the process nine times.

i. Your next stopping point and a larger storage place for the energy is the Pai-Hui, located at the crown of your head. Practice in the same manner only this time fill the "straw" to the top. Tilt the sacrum to the back in order to straighten the curve of the spine outward a little bit: this will help to activate the lower pump. At the same time push the sternum to C-7, tuck in your chin a little, and squeeze the back of your skull. This will activate the upper Cranial Pump. Continue to pull up to the point at the center of the top of the head. Repeat nine times.

j. Touch the tongue to the palate to permit the energy to flow down to the third eye, to the inside of your nose, through the tongue and down to the heart center. Pause for a while at the heart center and feel the energy fill and open this center as it transforms into loving energy. Then bring the energy down to the navel center for storage. Here spiral the energy 36 times counterclockwise and outward, then reverse and circle inward 24 times.

Once you finish the last set of nine, and you feel the ovaries' sexual energy fill the brain, begin to turn the energy to circulate it in the brain counterclockwise for nine, eighteen, or thirty-six revolutions, and then change directions, circulating the energy clockwise for nine, eighteen, or thirty-six revolutions. Use your mind, eyes and senses to assist you. Rest and mentally guide the energy from the Ovarian palace to the top of the crown.

5. Summary of Ovarian Breathing

a. Bring your attention to your ovaries and breathe into them.

b. Direct your attention to the Ovarian Palace, lying between the ovaries.

c. Contract the vagina slightly, pulling the ovaries' energy down to the perineum, then contract and pull up the front part of the perineum to bring the energy there while simultaneously inhaling a short sip of air. Rest, holding your breath, and feel the flow of the energy, from the Ovarian Palace to the vagina, the clitoris and the perineum. Exhale, with your mind retaining the energy there. Repeat this procedure nine times.

d. Continue to retain the ovaries' energy at the perineum, and at the same time return your partial attention to the ovaries and the Ovarian Palace. Collect the energy there, then simultaneously inhaling short sips, very slightly contract the vagina, the front part of the perineum, then the middle and back part of the perineum, and inhale the ovaries' energy to the coccyx and up to the sacrum. Exhale. Repeat nine times.

e. Holding the ovaries' energy at the sacrum, return your attention to the ovaries, and bring the energy to the Ovarian Palace. Inhale short sips of air as you lightly close the vagina and simultaneously contract the front part of the perineum. Bring the Chi to the perineum, pause for a while, and inhale. Pull up the middle and then back parts of the anus. Pull the energy up to the coccyx and sacrum. Pause and inhale and push the sacrum back as if it were pushed against a wall to open the hiatus so that Chi can enter the spinal cord. Move the energy to T-11. Exhale. Repeat nine times.

f. Holding the Ovarian energy at T-11, return your attention to the ovaries and the Ovarian Palace. Inhale short sips of air, lightly closing the vagina while simultaneously contracting the front, middle and back of the perineum. Move the energy from the ovaries to the perineum, sacrum, T-11 and C-7. Hold and retain it there. Exhale. Repeat nine times.

g. Holding the Ovarian energy at C-7, return your attention to the ovaries and to the Ovarian Palace. Inhale short sips of air slightly close the vagina while simultaneously lightly contracting the front, middle and back of the perineum, and move the energy from the ovaries to the perineum, sacrum, T-11, C-7 and Jade Pillow. Exhale. Repeat nine times.

h. Holding the Ovarian energy at the Jade Pillow, return your attention to the ovaries and repeat the process, proceeding from the ovaries to the brain, to the top of the head, to the crown. Repeat nine times. When the energy has filled the brain, permit it to spiral in the brain nine, eighteen, or thirty-six counterclockwise revolutions and then nine, eighteen, or thirty-six clockwise revolutions. Place the tongue up on the palate and allow the energy to flow down to the third eye, tongue, throat and heart. Pause for a while at the heart and feel the sexual (creative) energy transfer into loving energy, and then move down to the solar plexus and the navel. Collect the energy at the navel.

Remember! The Energy from the Ovaries in Ovarian Breathing is Warm Energy. Be sure to bring it down after Four Inhalations!

B. Ovarian and Vaginal Compression

1. Compressing Air into the Ovaries increases Sexual Power.

Many benefits of Ovarian Breathing are magnified when performed in conjunction with the Ovarian and Vaginal Compression exercise. This exercise reduces mental problems, strengthens the ovaries and the cervix, and increases the power of the vaginal muscles. It helps you consciously to direct energy into and out of the pelvic region. It builds your sexual power dynamically by using the vital Chi from the upper part pushed by the compressed air and packed try its charge into your ovaries to increase the ovaries' energy. By packing the Chi into the ovaries and the vagina, you warm up the sexual region so that you can be more sexually active, easily aroused, and easily have an orgasm. When the sexual region has less Chi, it gets cold and is difficult to arouse. This can be compared to attempting to boil ice water as opposed to room temperature water: it takes much more heat to bring the ice water to the boiling point.

Of the three suggested positions, sitting or standing are preferable. Inhale a fairly large amount of air into the throat and swallow the air. Swallowing drives the air down to the solar plexus. From the solar plexus the air is rolled down into the pelvic region. From there it will be driven down both sides of the vagina to be compressed there. (Fig. 5.29) This is accomplished by contracting the abdominal muscles downward in a slow wave. The vagina seems to expand, a flush of heat is experienced, and after a short time the power driven into it flows up the spine to the head, which also becomes very warm.

2. Ovarian and Vaginal Compression Exercise Step-By-Step

a. Sit on the edge of your chair with your feet flat on the floor about as far apart as your shoulders' width. Feel the feet support a part of the weight; do not place it all on the sitting bones. Wear loose clothing so that it will be easy to compact the Chi.

b. Inhale through the nostrils into the throat. From there swallow the air down to the solar plexus, midway between your heart and your navel. Do not stop at the heart center. Imagine air as a ball.

Fig. 5.29 Ovarian and Vaginal Compressing

c. First the ball sits behind the solar plexus. From this point roll it down to the navel, then into the pelvis, and spread it out to both sides of the ovaries. This is accomplished by contracting the abdominal muscles downward in a slow wave. Feel the Chi pressure drop around the ovaries, pack and compress the ovaries to energy them, and gradually pack the cervix. Squeeze the inner and outer lips of the vagina tightly and keep on pushing into the vagina as if you were blowing up a balloon, until the vagina feels like it is expanding.

d. Forcibly compress the air into the ovaries for as long as you can. Once the air is driven into the ovaries, you will experience a flush of heat. After a short time the power driven into the ovaries flows up the spine to the head, which also becomes very warm. The minimum period for each compression should be 30 to 40 seconds. Slowly work up to at least one minute. Every single Ovarian Compression shoots tremendous energy into the vagina. With compression lasting an entire minute the exercise takes full effect. The anal sphincter and perineum muscles must be squeezed tightly during this exercise to prevent leakage of energy.

e. When you have finished the compression, exhale and relax completely. Saliva accumulates in the mouth during compression: swallow it before exhaling.

f. After complete exhalation, take a number of quick, short breaths to recover your wind. Dart the air in and out of the nostrils to quickly regain capacity for another compression. Remember to breathe through the nose, and do not inhale unduly large quantities of air. This process is called “Bellows Breathing” because you must pump your lower abdomen in and out quickly in order to do it.

This exercise quickly charges the whole body. If you feel ill or out of sorts, several Ovarian Compressions will restore you to good form. Perform the exercises in the following sequence:

(1) First practice one Ovarian Compression.

(2) Then, rotate the waist with the arms at shoulder level.

(3) Rest for a moment and repeat the exercise.

Remember to keep the tongue up on the palate when compressing the air. In the beginning perform two to three compressions, gradually increasing to five.

When you have grown stronger you may do five compressions in succession, and then rest by rotating your body from the waist. Begin a second series of five compressions. Keep the breathing between compressions short and shallow so you do not lodge power high in the body.

Practice Ovarian Breathing and Ovarian and Vaginal Compression twice a day for approximately fifteen minutes in the morning and fifteen minutes in the evening. Regular practice of these breathing techniques yields many benefits in addition to those already mentioned, such as a decrease in insomnia and nervousness, and an improvement in overall energy.

The exercise should start to take effect within three days after its commencement. The ovaries feel warm and may itch, or feel somewhat tingly an indication that the ovaries are receiving unusually high amounts of vital force. These signs occur only if the exercise is done properly. A month or two of exercise will produce substantial increases in strength and well-being.

3. Summary of Ovarian and Vaginal Compression

a. Choose your preferred position.

b. Breathe in very slowly through the nose, concentrating on the throat. Compress the air in the throat until you can inhale no further:

c. Swallow strongly to the solar plexus and hold the air there as if it were a ball.

d. Press the ball of air down to the navel region.

e. From the navel press the ball of air down to the pelvic region.

f. Press the ball strongly and continuously into the ovaries until you can hold your breath no longer: At the end of your breath capacity swallow the saliva strongly

g. Rest by taking quick, shallow breaths through the nose.

h. Relax by rotating the waist several times.

i. Start with 5 repetitions and increase slowly to 36 at a sitting.

j. Keep the tongue up on the palate.

C. Venting Exercises for High Blood Pressure

After practicing Ovarian Compression for two to six weeks, some women with high blood pressure notice a large flow of Chi energy to the head. They feel tension in the head because the blood has followed the upward flow of the vital power. This is not unlike a mild symptom of the “Kundalini Syndrome,” in which freed energy races about the body out of control.

If you suffer from high blood pressure and have not practiced meditation to open the Microcosmic Omit, which distributes the energy evenly throughout the circuits of the body, you can meditate on two points to vent excess pressure. These are the Ming-Men, or Door of Life, on the spine directly opposite the navel (between lumbar 2 and 3), and the Yuang Chuan (K-1 point), the kidney point, on the soles of your feet.

To locate the Ming-Men, place a string around the waist like a belt. Make it perfectly horizontal and place it across the navel. The Ming-Men lies where the string meets the spine. When you bend over backward from the waist, the point feels like a hole in the spine. (Fig. 5.30)

The Ming-Men is located opposite the navel between the second and third lumbar vertebrae.

Fig. 5.30 Ming-Men Point

Excess energy down to the Ming-Men. This draws the Chi and blood there. The hand can help to induce the Chi now. The right hand, like a pitcher sends out energy; the left hand, like a catcher receives the energy. In this way the energy can be brought down more easily.

Fig. 5.31 Yuang Chuan (K-1) Point

The Yuang Chuan Point: The Yuang Chuan point is the Yin-energy entry point. The Taoists regard the soles of the feet as the roots of the body, and the root is important as the foundation for the work of the spirit body. Once you have found the points on both feet, tape onto them spiny little balls such as prickly chestnuts or plain tree seed pods. Place both soles on the ground and press firmly on the spiny ball while concentrating on the kidney-1 point (also known as the bubbling spring"). You can help guide the energy down to the soles by placing your left palm on the sacrum, and the right palm on the top of the head guide the energy from the crown to the Ming-Men, down to the sacrum, down to the backs of the knees, and finally to the soles through the backs of the legs.

After a short time of practice you will feel the power flow to the Ming-Men. Direct it down through the spine and backs of the legs to the Yuang Chuan. Press down on the balls of the feet so that you feel the soles very distinctly. In severe cases it may take a month or two to get the power into the Ming-Men and bring it down to the Yuang Chuan.

If blood flows too strongly to the head during or after compression, vent the power by practicing the Ming-Men and Yuang Chuan exercises right after compression. Imbalanced force will flow down the body through these two points. After practicing the exercises, many students open the Microcosmic Orbit so that their energy flows in a continuous circuit, and there will be no need to bring the energy down through the back to the soles. You can also bring it down the front of the body through the heart and navel, down to the perineum, and down to the backs of the knees to the soles. This alone has often ended high blood pressure.

Many benefits of Ovarian Breathing are magnified when performed in conjunction with the Ovarian Compression exercise. If the ovaries are too cold, there will be a reduction in desire for sex. Ovarian Compression, by warming the ovaries, will warm your heart as well. It helps you calm down when sexually over-excited by teaching you to consciously direct energy into and out of the pelvic region. It builds your sexual power dynamically by using the vital Chi taken from the air and packing its charge into your Ching Chi.

Refer to Chapter 6 for more safety tips in performing the exercises in this chapter.

Chapter 6
Orgasmic Upward Draw

A. Sexual Energy and Women

In ancient times the Taoists saw men and women as worthy partners and adversaries. Their sexual union reflected the union of Yin and Yang on the cosmic level. Their different approaches to life and problem-solving brought harmony to the earth.

Taoists regard man as fire and woman as water: Fire, when started, burns very fast and does not last long. As we mentioned earlier it takes time for water to reach its boiling point, just as it takes time to bring a woman to her boiling point. Once she reaches that point, she will maintain it for a long time.

Taoists have described women as sexually superior to men, yet we see today that many women are sexually unhappy. Because the response times of men and women are different, the sexual embrace occurs, many times, without the full arousal of the woman. The vaginal spasms which occur at this arousal level are mistaken as the total orgasm. However since the woman has reached only half of her potential for orgasm, she reports feeling let down, frustrated, alienated, angry, restless, and isolated.

To experience the multilevel of a complete orgasm, a woman must be aware that there are many steps she must climb, with each step energizing certain parts of the body. The complete orgasm is desirable because it energizes and brings pleasure to the entire body. Conversely the repeated interruption of orgasm at lower levels creates energy imbalances, since only some of the organs and glands are stimulated and not the entire body. If a man can prolong his erection, he can help bring the woman to higher levels with simple movements, and the couple will be able to reach the highest harmony they can attain in lovemaking.

The Orgasmic Upward Draw (more simply referred to in this chapter as the Orgasmic Draw) exercise taught here is a way to increase the sexual potential of a woman by warming up her sexual region ahead of time to avoid this depressing chain of events.

In all of the basic sexual studies conducted, many parallels have been made between a man's orgasm and a woman's orgasm, especially in what is called rhythmic pulsations, which have been measured at eight-tenths of a second. Research has also found' that when a woman's sexual organs are considered as one functioning unit, the amount of erectile tissue is about the same as for a man. Therefore, there is no reason to believe that women's orgasms are any less strong or powerful than men's.

The Taoist sages noted that through internal alchemy, women, using the same method used by men of turning their aroused sexual energy inward and upward, can transform this energy into a power which fills certain reservoirs in their bodies, eventually enabling them to reach the ultimate spiritual accomplishment. The Orgasmic Draw is a preparation for the spiritual practices of Kan and Li, which rely on the power of the stored sexual energy (Ching) to be transferred into a new life-force energy (Chi), and Chi into spiritual energy (Shen).

Women have the capacity for virtually inexhaustible sexual pleasure, far greater than the capacity of men. Even though women do not lose very much energy during intercourse as a result of orgasm, that small unit of sexual energy multiplies, and the longer an orgasm lasts, the more sexual energy can be produced. If thought of in units, the energy can be multiplied by the woman from 10 units to 100, 1000, or to hundreds of thousands of units. However if this small unit of energy is disposed of, it no longer is within reach, and there will be no opportunity to transform it to the higher energy level.

On a day-to-day level, this storehouse of sexual energy expresses itself as an abundance of loving and healing energy enough for each woman to not only love and heal herself physically and psychically but to extend that loving and healing to various relationships in her life and commitments in her community and global sphere. It is no accident that women become involved in professions such as nursing and teaching, occupations which require the generation of tremendous amounts of loving, caring, and healing energy.

Aside from being a thrilling experience, the Orgasmic Draw is a technique reaping benefits such as organ and gland rejuvenation. Every time aroused sexual energy is routed to the brain, memory improves, cell are nourished, and a wonderful feeling engulfs the body from the top of the scalp to the tips of the toes.

B. Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Draw

Up to this point you have learned Ovarian Breathing as a means to pump quiet sexual energy created in the ovaries to the brain. The Orgasmic Draw will teach you how to draw the far denser "aroused" sexual energy upward. The means by which you will accomplish this initially is muscle power: You will use it not only to stop the outward movement of the orgasm, but to actually change the direction of the energy inward and upward. Eventually the control will become more internal, the muscles of the pelvic diaphragm will begin to develop, and you will be controlling the Orgasmic Draw with your mind.

The temperature of sexual energy is the second major difference between Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Draw. The aroused sexual energy cultivated in the Orgasmic Draw is cooler than the biologic, reproductive (or sexual) energy that is produced by the ovaries and harnessed during the process of Ovarian Breathing. It is also cooler than aroused sexual energy in men, which is considered hot Yang energy. It is the cool quality of this energy that enables it to be stored in the brain for future use.

As in Ovarian Breathing, the Chi Muscle plays a great role in directing the energy. To review briefly: contracting the front of the anus (part of the perineum region) brings the energy from the ovaries (the Ovarian Palace) to the perineum point. Pulling up the middle and contracting the back of the anus (the perineum region) directs the energy from the perineum to the coccyx. This maneuver is useful while you are still at the basic level of practice. As your practice continues, the control becomes both automatic and internal.

1. Single and Dual Cultivation

Even though most people settle upon a particular formula of how they like to have sex and stick to this formula, this does not mean that they would not like another means of gratification if it were offered in a safe and caring way A woman can enrich her life both physically and spiritually by learning the Orgasmic Draw as taught here using two pathways: Single and Dual Cultivation, which are by no means mutually exclusive. Single Cultivation is usually practiced by the woman who does not have a sexual partner or whose sexual partner is not practicing the Big Draw (the man's version of the Orgasmic Draw. Many women who practice Dual Cultivation, i.e., with a partner who practices the Big Draw, find that the route of Single Cultivation (Ovarian Breathing, the Orgasmic Draw and meditation, as well as Iron Shirt Chi Kung and Tai Chi) cannot be overlooked.

A woman who practices alone begins to feel the spaciousness inside of her, the blending of her body with the universe, and an increased sensitivity to those around her. Sometimes these experiences are mere glimpses, but with continued practice they can become part of her living reality.

A woman practicing with a partner can learn how to share energy with her partner and can begin to approach the experience of the "Valley Orgasm" or "Beyond Orgasm" state, an experience of heightened awareness for both partners. As the two different souls or two spirits (Yin and Yang) unite, an alchemical fusion of energy occurs that gives birth to a new consciousness for both partners. As they reach the point of "Beyond Orgasm," each having opened their Microcosmic Or bit, Thrusting Channel and Belt Channel, both will feel the sexual energy shoot out of their hearts to the tops of their heads.

A. Solo Practice

The importance of Single Cultivation, especially at the beginning, is strongly recommended. With solo practice you will be better able to tune into your own responses and thereby have more control over your sexual energy. Between the time you start to experience sexual excitement and the time an orgasm is imminent is a gap you can play within. If you start the Orgasmic Draw when you are only slightly aroused, you will not feel very much sensation. If you wait until you are at the point of pouring the energy out, you may or may not be able to capture and prevent it from leaving your body. Your solo practice is invaluable in enabling you to sense these distinctions and turn them into reflexes.

After you have practiced and feel you have learned the Orgasmic Draw well, you can try it with a partner but it should be a partner who is interested in these practices or who is aware that you want to recycle your sexual energy. It is important to be perfectly frank with your partner so that both of you know what is going on.

B. Practicing with a Partner

If you have a partner who is also practicing the Big Draw and Testicle Breathing, you are one of the luckier ones. You will have the opportunity to experience the exchange of energy with your partner and the possibility of entering into the "Beyond Orgasm" state mentioned above. If, however you have mastered the techniques of the Healing Love exercise, and your male partner does not practice these Taoist Secrets of Love techniques, you will be far superior to him. Then, if you use the Orgasmic Draw on him, you will drain his life-force from him, possibly causing him great harm and creating negative forces within yourself.

The word Tao means "way" and, as described above, those who seek union with the Tao are trying to find the "way" of the universe from which all of nature proceeds. There are many paths to travel along this "way" and many have sought a path in which sex is perceived as spiritually undesirable. Such people recoil from Taoist Dual Cultivation and label those who practice it as following the "Left-Hand Path" (as opposed to the "Right-Hand Path" of celibacy). Dual Cultivation, properly practiced, is a safe path, reaping benefits for the body mind and spirit.

C. Overview of the Orgasmic Draw

In the Ovarian Breathing exercise you moved warm reproductive sexual energy (ovarian energy or Ching Chi), that lies in the ovarian in its Yang state, up to the head and then down into the body. With the Ovarian Compression exercise you forced the Chi energy that is produced in the vital organs and glands-heart, Lungs, spleen, thymus and, etc: down to mix with the warm Ching Chi resting in the sexual organs to heat up this region. Then you moved the resulting warm energy upward and circulated it.

In the Orgasmic Draw you will arouse yourself in the direction of an orgasm, collect all the organs' and glands' energy to mix with the sexual energy): move that orgasmic feeling inward and extend it longer and at a higher center to be then moved into the organs, glands and finally the nervous system, so that the orgasm reaches energy cell of the body. As a result you will experience a new kind of orgasm which you have never experienced before. The cool, Yin, sexual energy stored in the ovaries is at your command. You can gather it quickly and build rapidly to a climax, turning it inward and thereby extending the orgasm for as long as you desire, or you can deposit it in the “slow cooker” for a longer and more voluptuous experience. Ultimately the erection of the clitoris and the internal sensations of fullness and expansion will result in a rhythmic outpouring release. Once you master this Taoist technique, you will find the easiest flowing channel in the body flows directly up to the brain and higher center of the body. Practice is essential since initially you must learn to control the anus Chi Muscle and the involuntary muscle of the pelvic diaphragm to change the rhythmic outpouring of energy into an inward and upward draw of energy, and to help push the sexual energy up through the spine into the upper body

1. Four Levels of the Orgasmic Upward Draw Practice

A. Beginning Stage

You will use the muscles of the fists, jaws, neck, feet, perineum, buttocks, and abdomen to help activate the Sacral and Cranial Pumps, divert the ovarian energy and orgasmic feeling, and push the energy upward into the organs and glands in the amused state.

B. Intermediate Stage

You will use less muscles tension of the fists. jaws and feet, increase your reliance on the Chi Muscle of the perineum, pelvic diaphragm and sphincter and employ the Sacral and Cranial Pumps to help move the sexual energy upward.

C. Advanced Stage

Less muscle tension of the Chi Muscle of the perineum will be required and more use of the Sacral and Cranial Pumps to provide greater power for the mind to move Ching Chi to the crown center. By concentrating power at the upper part of the crown, you will draw the energy from the lower center to the higher center.

D. Most Advanced Stage

You will only use pure mind control: there is no need for use of muscles. The mind’s power will command the ovaries’ sexual power to move up and down into the organs, glands and nervous system, and to envelop, pack and revitalize it at your will.

2. Explanation of Procedure

In this exercise you will need to arouse yourself 95 to 99 percent of the way to orgasm. As you master the Orgasmic Draw, you may fine tune your orgasm and gradually cultivate it to go beyond 100 to 200 percent arousal, even up to 1,000 percent. To initially achieve arousal you will massage the breasts. Once you feel that orgasm is imminent, you will stop and practice the Orgasmic Draw method three to nine times per session, or until the orgasm turns inward, flowing into the Microcosmic Orbit and entering into the organs and glands as the lower-center arousal subsides. This will count as one exercise. You will repeat this procedure: stimulating yourself, and then practicing the Orgasmic Draw until the arousal subsides and the orgasmic feeling moves upward.

Practice makes perfect. Once you totally gain control of your sexual organs and the energy involved in solo practice, you will naturally have full control during sexual intercourse. You can continue to have sex and practice at the level you have reached. Some will naturally become skillful much more quickly than others if they have trained their minds through yoga, meditation or other mental disciplines. If you are not involved in a program of daily physical discipline, do some warm-up exercises and stretching before practicing the Orgasmic Draw. Iron Shirt breathing and packing directly assists in the execution of the Orgasmic Draw. These exercises will tone up the energy in your organs, making it easier to feel your internal Chi energies, and thus speed up the command of your sexual energy:

People spending years and years earning a doctorate in medicine or a Ph.D. in any high technological science know that such knowledge is important to making a living in this worldly life. However, people must also consider learning the high technology about themselves, one involving an energy body and a spiritual body and earning a doctorate in preparation for the next life. All of the energy practices of this life can be transferred to your next life if you start to practice while you still have an abundance of that energy. Consciously you will transfer your own identification to a spiritual body. Therefore, it is worthwhile to spend time on practice to earn this highest of human technological degrees.

D. Orgasmic Draw, or How to transform aroused Sexual Energy into total body orgasm.

1. Practice in an Unaroused State

A. Pre-Exercise

While learning the exercise, first practice in an unaroused state.

(1) Lower Abdominal Breathing

From your practice of the Microcosmic Orbit you may now find yourself breathing normally in the lower abdomen, with little or no movement of the chest and shoulders. Lower abdominal breathing is the way we breathe when we are babies, and the way we breathe when we are asleep or in deep relaxation. Many of us have to relearn how to breathe into the lower abdomen when awake and alert, Lower abdominal breathing causes the diaphragm to move lower during inhalation, thus elongating the lungs and providing more lung area to be filled with air. Check yourself at random during the day and discover from which area you are breathing. You can practice lower abdominal breathing anytime. In addition to increasing lung capacity abdominal breathing will also greatly strengthen the lower abdominal muscles, which will help you to control lower abdominal energy. (Fig. 6-1)

(2) Diaphragm

Sit or stand in a comfortable position. Exhale, flatten your abdomen, and exhale once more, relaxing the diaphragm down to press against the organs, especially the adrenal glands (located on top of each kidney). Relaxing the diaphragm in the exhale position requires practice. Your mind can help to guide the diaphragm and you can use the Inner Smile to smile to it. The diaphragm can become stuck on the rib cage if is too tight, and this will make it difficult to move it up and down. You can assist its movement by rubbing along the bottom of the rib cage until the tightness and pain are gone. This will enable the diaphragm to stretch and you will find your breath becoming deeper: making it easier to practice abdominal breathing.

(3) Energy Ball

Now inhale without expanding the abdomen. You should feel a pressure on the lower abdomen which serves to pack the organs into a smaller place. This will help to concentrate the energy in the lower center and pack and condense the energy into an energy ball, which we call a “crystal” ball. Exhale and relax. This condensed energy· will be of tremendous use in later higher practice of the Taoist system as you form the energy body and spiritual body that give birth to the soul and spirit.

Fig. 6.1 Lower Abdominal Breathing: Breathe as a round shape, expanding all sides and not the stomach only.

B. Relationship of the Palate to the Organs

The palate and the tongue are closely related to the organs and glands. Knowing how to activate the palate, the floor of the Cranial Pump, will enable you to trigger that pump’s action, thereby assisting the flow of Chi.

(1) Front Palate

The front part of the palate near the teeth and the inside gum is related to, and is the reflex point of, the heart and small intestine.

(2) Middle Palate

The middle part of the palate before the soft palate is related to, and is the reflex point of, the liver and gall bladder:

(3) Back Palate

The soft palate located toward the back of the mouth is related to, and is the reflex point of, the kidneys and bladder.

(4) Front of The Mouth

The point at the front of the mouth between the upper and lower teeth is related to, and is the reflex point of, the lungs and large intestine.

(5) Jaw Line

The jaw line between the lower teeth and gums is related to, and is the reflex point of, the spleen, stomach and pancreas.

C. Activating the Pumps

In these exercises, we combine lower abdominal breathing together with muscle power locks.

Fig. 6.2 Activating the Cranial Pump.

(1) Activation of the Cranial Pump (Fig. 6-2)

The muscle power lock that is responsible for activating the Cranial Pump is accomplished by squeezing the muscles of the tongue against the palate and teeth, while simultaneously squeezing the muscle at the back and base of the skull, thereby activating the Cranial Pump as well as all of the pumps in the body.

(A) Teeth

Clenching the teeth will help to squeeze the temporal bones, and when released will activate the Cranial Pump. The cranial bone, located at the palate, is called the palatine bone. Clenching the teeth will also stimulate the lungs and large intestine.

Fig. 6.3 Relationship between the Palate and the Organs

(B) Tongue

Press the flat side of the tongue to the middle of the palatine bone and the tip of the tongue against the lower front comer made by the gum and teeth. Pressing the tongue firmly to the palate, the floor of the Cranial Pump, will help activate the Cranial Pump and stimulate the palate, the reflex point of the liver and gall bladder. It also stimulates the jaw line, the reflex point of the spleen, stomach and pancreas, and the tip of the tongue. (Fig. 6-3)

(C) Chin

Activate the back side of the Cranial Pump by pushing the chin backward (not up or down). You will feel a tightening at the back and base of the skull, or occipital bone. In the beginning, you will have to squeeze the muscle at the back of the skull to activate the base of the Cranial Pump.

(D) Eyes

The eyes contain many muscles around the orbital bones (the cavities of the skull containing the eyes) which will also help to increase the pumping action. Rolling and pulling up the eyes and squeezing the muscles into the orbital bones will also help to activate the Cranial Pump. Look up and slightly pull the eyes up toward the crown at the top of the head. You will feel a pressure there. This will activate the top of the Cranial Pump.

You are now clenching the teeth and pressing the tongue to the palate, pushing the chin to the back, looking up with your eyes and focusing them on the top, or crown, of the head. Once the Cranial and Sacral Pumps are properly activated, the pulling-up action (or suction) will increase, thereby helping to pull the sexual energy up. In the higher part of spiritual practice, the pumping action of the Cranial Pump is very useful in thrusting the spiritual body out of the physical body through the crown.

(2) Activation of the Musculatory Pump

Activating the Musculatory Pump will create a pumping action to draw the sexual energy upward. Taoist Masters discovered that as you create other muscle power locks by squeezing the muscles to the bones of various parts of the body and then releasing them, you will increase the pumping action of the fluids in the body. As you continue in your practice to train your mind to perform this squeeze, the pumping action of the body will greatly improve.

We often feel our hands and feet as the first parts of our bodies to grow cold. Since the arms and legs are the body's extremities, the circulation of fluids to them tends to slow down as time goes by, resulting in the accumulation of many toxins in these areas.

(A) Arms

To activate the arms' pumping action, start by clenching your fists and rolling four fingers of each hand (excluding the thumb) under pressing them firmly to the palms. When you feel the pressure, roll the fingers as if you were rolling paper. Press your thumbs firmly to the fingers. (Fig. 6.4) Inhale and squeeze the lower arms' muscles to the ulnae and radii (two forearm bones). Hold for a while and release. You will gradually feel a strong pumping action beginning. Gradually increase the squeeze to include the upper arms, squeezing the muscles around the humeri (upper arm bones). Practice until you master this, and then continue to the next step. These movements will assist in drawing the sexual energy up.

Clench the fists to activate the arms' pumping action

Fig. 6.4 Arm's Pumping Action

(B) Legs

To activate the legs' pumping action, start by pressing the soles of the feet to the floor firmly and spreading out the toes. First spread the small toes outward, then the fourth, third, second and finally, the big toes. (Fig. 6.5(a)) This spreading action will greatly activate the muscles and tendons of the legs to create the pumping action. Since the feet have very dense tendons, pressing the toes firmly to the floor will feel like a clawing action. Now curl the toes up, keeping them spread apart with the soles still touching the floor (Fig. 6.5(b))

(a) Press down and spread out the toes to activate the muscles and tendons of the legs.

(b) Curl the toes up, keeping them fully in contact with the ground.

Fig. 6.5 Leg's Pumping Action

Feel as though you are inhaling through your feet, and squeeze the muscles of the legs to the tibiae and fibulae bones (lower leg bones). Hold for a while, then release them. Gradually move up to the femurs (thigh bones), squeeze the muscles tightly to the bones, and release them to increase the pumping action. These movements will assist in drawing the sexual energy, upward when you perform the Orgasmic Upward Draw.

(C) Buttocks

The buttocks consist of many large muscles and are a major factor in assisting the upward flow. Activate these muscles by inhaling as if through the buttocks and pulling up both buttocks, squeezing them toward the anus. You will physically feel as though lifted from the chair you are sitting on. Continue the squeeze, which now moves into the pelvic bones. Hold for a while, and release. Practice a few times, until you master it.

Although the squeezing described seems like many separate actions, mastering them in this way, step-by step, enables you ultimately to put them together in such a fashion that they become one effort.

(3) Combining the Steps

(a) Sit on the edge of a chair or stand with the feet comfortably apart and the knees slightly bent. Feel yourself relax and smile to your self. Then, make your body tense, and relax again. Such activity will induce greater relaxation.

(b) Begin abdominal breathing nine, eighteen or thirty-six times. Exhale, flattening the abdomen, and inhale without expanding the abdomen.

(c) Clench the teeth. Press the tip of the tongue against the lower front corner of the jaws and teeth and the flat part to the palate, and push the chin to the back. Squeeze the fists and arms' muscles, spread the toes, press the toes and the feet to the ground, and squeeze the muscles to both leg bones. Hold for a couple of moments. Again, although these steps seem disjointed when practiced individually, as they all are mastered and then combined, they will become one unified action easily performed.

(d) Exhale and relax.

(e) Now inhale, hold, and clench the feet, fists, teeth, perineum, and buttocks. Exhale and relax.

(f) Inhale again, hold, and clench the teeth, fists, feet, perineum, and buttocks: tilt the sacrum back, slightly arching the back to help the energy flow more easily into the spine. Exhale and relax.

(g) This time, add an upward movement of the eyes: looking up will help focus the energy toward the brain. Practice again: inhale, hold, clench everything, and look up. Exhale and relax.

(h) Now it is time to add the last item, which will force the energy up into the brain. Perform all the clenching, and then a series of nine strong contractions of the perineum. These contractions are essential to keep the orgasm in the body and propel it upward.

2. Practice in an Aroused State

A. Overview

Now that you have practiced all the clenching exercises, you are ready to try the Orgasmic Draw in an aroused state. To reach an aroused state you will massage the breasts, and stimulate the clitoris, in whatever position you are accustomed to. As you approach what you consider to be a high state of arousal, provide enough time before you know you will climax. Then clench everything, and while holding your breath, simultaneously execute nine hard contractions. Later when we fully describe the Orgasmic Upward Draw, we will go into detail on how to move the sexual energy up.

You will notice that after your first Orgasmic Draw there will be a transfer of aroused energy upward, first moving up the spine to the top of the head and to the pineal gland (through the Governor Channel), then down (through the Functional Channel) as the energy continues in the Microcosmic Orbit. When you feel the energy fill the Orbit, you will start to move the orgasm s aroused energy into the ovaries, then into the left and right kidneys, to the liver spleen and lungs, and finally up to the left and right sides of the brain, completing what we call the "organs' and glands' orgasm." Additional stimulation will again raise the level of sexual arousal, and you will be able to practice another Orgasmic Draw. If you wish, you can then continue to complete a set of three to six draws. Practice three to six repetitions once or twice a day, and you will quickly refine your ability to do the Orgasmic Draw. Practice until you can fully control the manner of transferring the orgasm upward, using your mind to circulate the orgasm through the Microcosmic Orbit to all of the glands and organs, thereby increasing the amount of energy going to the brain. You will find that as control of the Orgasmic Draw gradually moves inside, the process will require less and less physical clenching. Ultimately, after perhaps six months to a year of practice, the control will be totally internalized.

B. Importance of Virtue Energy

Raising the organs' and glands' Chi to increase the ovaries' sexual energy is one of the most important ways to rejuvenate the organs and glands and start the return of youthful feelings. The most rejuvenating energy, virtue energy: is generated from the organs:

(1) Gentleness from the kidneys and bladder:
(2) Kindness from the liver and gall bladder:
(3) Honor respect, joy and happiness from the heart and small intestine:
(4) Fairness from the spleen, stomach and pancreas:
(5) Righteousness from the lungs and large intestine.

The sexual organs are linked to all of the major organs and glands. With proper stimulation, as the Taoists classically state, the energy of the glands and organs will contribute to full sexually aroused energy: and all the good virtue energy emerging from them will combine into the best energy we know; the energy of compassion. If you can redirect the energy of compassion back to the organs, you will charge them to their fullest extent, and negative energy will have no room to remain. If you have too much negative energy in the organs and do not try to remove it, when you begin to multiply your sexual energy, the negative energy will increase, and so will your negative emotions.

The Microcosmic Orbit Meditation, Inner Smile, Six Healing Sounds, and Healing Love practices all help to transform negative emotional energy into good virtue energy. A more extensive practice of transforming negative energy into good virtue and blending all virtues with the energy of compassion will be explained in a later practice of the Healing Tao, called Fusion of the Five Elements. When fully aroused sexually the glands, organs and nervous system will be exercised to their fullest extent as well.

C. Massaging breasts will raise the Organs and Glands' Chi.

When you massage the breasts or the clitoris, be aware of the Chi energy that is activated as you stimulate the many nerves they contain. The nerves are connected to all the major organs and glands of the body beginning at the top of the crown with the pineal gland. From this point you will begin to feel the stimulation of all the glands and organs as the sensation descends and flows throughout your body Use your mind to guide the glands' and organs' Chi to flow to the breasts, blending their energies to produce the best possible glands' and organs' Chi. This special blending of organs' and glands' Chi can have a very powerful creative and healing effect.

Fig. 6.6 Activating the Endocrine Glands

(1) Gland Chi Arousai

When certain glands are stimulated to secrete their hormones (Fig. 6.6), the organs with which they are associated become activated, and eventually every cell of the body is affected. Stimulation of the breasts especially affects the pineal, pituitary and thymus glands.

Fig. 6.7 Course of the Kidney Meridian

(A) Pineal Gland Chi

The kidney meridian passes through the breasts (Fig. 6.7), and as you use your fingers to gently massage the nipples, their stimulation activates the kidneys and bladder as well, which, in turn, help to activate the sexual glands. The clitoris, having a direct relationship to the pineal gland at the hormonal pathway, responds and brings the sensation to this point. The pineal gland is the body's time clock and compass and in later practice has the ability to reflect light. When it is fully developed, it can see the true light of creation and will guide the spirit back to the place of its origin. (Fig. 6.8)

(B) Pituitary Gland Chi

From the pineal gland the sensation descends into the next gland along the hormonal pathway the pituitary gland, situated at the hind part of the third eye energy center. This gland has a wide range of effects upon growth, metabolism and other functions of the body. Taoists believe the pituitary gland governs intelligence, thought and memory. The pituitary is the master gland from which all other glands are activated.

(C) Thyroid and Parathyroid Glands' Chi

As the energy continues to descend the hormonal pathway the thyroid and parathyroid glands become activated. The thyroid gland is situated on either side of the trachea, or windpipe, close to the larynx and arising from the same tissue, and almost from the same spot, as the anterior of the pituitary gland. Opposite the C-7 point, the thyroid gland corresponds to the C-7 energy center. It is the gland that is vitally important to growth. Heavier in the female than in the male, this gland becomes enlarged during sexual excitement, menstruation, and pregnancy. The Taoists consider this an energy gland, regulating the metabolism of the cells in the body, and one of the most important centers because it controls the growth and development of the body and mind. It is also considered the great link between the brain and the reproductive organs.

(D) Thymus Gland Chi

Next in the descending order of the hormonal pathway is the thymus gland, or gland of rejuvenation, located at the gland of

When fully developed, the Pineal Gland becomes the compass guiding the spirit to the primeval Tao.

Fig. 6.8 Activating the Pineal Gland heart energy center and descending from, covering and overlapping the upper portion of the heart. This is a lymphoid organ (related to the lymphatic glands which reaches its greatest size at the beginning of puberty and gradually diminishes in side and activity as time goes on. The Taoists consider this to be a gland that, when properly activated and harmonized with the energy from the pituitary gland energy center and the generative force of the sexual organs, can reverse the aging process.

(E) Pancreas Gland Chi

The energy then descends to the pancreas, located between the lower part of the stomach between the liver and spleen. The pancreas is a gland that maintains control over digestion, body temperature and blood sugar levels.

(F) Adrenal Glands Chi

Next, in descending order are the adrenal glands situated atop the kidneys at the adrenal glands' energy center or T-11. The adrenal glands', or energy glands', function is to support the kidneys, but they are also the major producers of adrenalin in the body. Adrenalin is a hormone which stimulates the heart, thymus gland, liver spleen and pancreas. In addition, the adrenal glands support the functions of the kidneys, spine and nervous system, brain, bones and bone marrow. Stimulation of the adrenal glands adds strength and alertness to both physical and mental activity.

(G) Sex Glands Chi

Stimulation of the kidneys occurs when the kidney meridian running through the breasts is massaged. In turn, all the other glands become stimulated until finally the sexual organs, last in descending order of the hormone pathway, become energized. Hormone secretions from the sex glands are responsible for sexual response, sexual energy and reproduction. The sex glands include the vagina, uterus and breasts, but it is the Ovarian Palace which houses the woman's sexual energy center. All other energy now is awakened.

Balancing and raising the energy level of the glands in the body is an important part of the Taoist way of developing, healing and strengthening the physical body. This is crucial to the higher levels of practice in which all the glands provide nourishment to the formation of a spiritual body.

(2) Organ Chi Arousal

With the glands activated, a response can be felt in the organs. This response will have physical and mental manifestations described as follows:

(A) Lung and Large Intestine Chi (Fig. 6.9)

The first Chi that can be felt is the Chi of the lungs and their associated organ, the large intestine. The properties of the lungs are dryness and coolness: their virtue energies are courage and righteousness. The feeling of righteousness can be as different as each person. It might feel straight or tall, or like a bright white color pure, fresh and uplifting. Feel this energy generate from the lungs.

The negative emotions of the lungs are sadness and grief. The feelings can be experienced as flat, or like a collapsed ball: they can be gray, musty, cold and low, with no force: downtrodden. Since you do not like to feel this way, cultivate good virtue and connect yourself with the good feelings of the lungs mentioned above: pure, fresh, uplifting. Bring these good feelings to the breasts.

The lungs' Chi readiness is manifested physically by faster breathing and copious saliva, which you feel must be swallowed quickly. These signs indicate that the Chi of the lungs is ready to come forth.

(B) Heart and Small Intestine Chi (Fig. 6.10)

Second is heart Chi: the heart's associated organ is the small intestine. The heart contains hot energy. Its virtues are honor; respect, joy and happiness. These virtues are manifested in feeling straight and open: they are bright red, warm, full, comfortable, secure and satisfying. The negative manifestations of heart and small intestine Chi are impatience, hastiness and cruelty. This can feel spiny or sharp, muddy, burnt, noisy, irregular and irritating, all feelings that you do not like to have in your system.

The physical manifestations of heart energy are revealed by observing the tongue becoming mobile, saliva seeming to overflow, and a growling sound emanating from the throat. These are signs that the Chi of the heart is prepared.

Fig. 6.10 Heart and Small Intestine Chi

Fig. 6.11 Spleen, stomach and Pancreas Chi

(C) Spleen, Stomach and Pancreas Chi (Fig. 6.11)

The third Chi is felt from the spleen and its associated organs, the stomach and pancreas. Mild, harmonic energy is the property of the spleen. Fairness its good virtue, and the feeling can be a wide-open chest, clean, soft and balanced, even smooth. The negative emotion of worry feels irregular cloudy, humid, uncertain and out of proportion.

The physical manifestation of these organs' energy can be observed when your hands have the desire to grasp and squeeze the breasts. This indicates that the spleen energy is in readiness.

(D) Kidneys and Bladder Chi (Fig. 6.12)

Next is the Chi of the kidneys and their associated organ, the bladder; Their property is cold energy, and their virtues are gentleness. alertness and stillness. This can feel round, full, expansive, bright blue, fresh, cool and comfortable, pleasant to the ear: mild, and honey-like in taste. The negative feelings are fear, stress, fright, awkwardness, tiny, compressed, dark, gray, cloudy, a cold chill, tight or closed in, and scattered.

The physical manifestation of these organs' Chi can be observed when you feel as if you are drowning with fluid in the vagina. This means that the Chi of the kidneys is ready.

(E) Liver and Gall Bladder Chi (Fig. 6.13)

Liver Chi will be felt next. The liver's associated organ is the gall bladder. Its properties are warm and energetic. The virtues are kindness and self-expansion. They can feel round, smooth, soft, green, sweet, fragrant, warm and pleasant, nurturing, and as if they were gently expanding. The negative emotions are anger aggression, arrogance and can feel spear-like or sharp, cloudy, hot and explosive, loud, painful, tough, rough, and bitter.

The physical manifestation of these organs' Chi can be observed when the eyes become watery. This is the indication that the Chi of the liver is ready.

(F) Bone Chi

The next Chi that will be felt is bone Chi. When you feel like sucking the tongue, the Chi from the bones is prepared.

Fig. 6.12 Kidneys, Adrenal Glands and Bladder Chi

Fig. 6.13 Liver and Gall Bladder Chi

(G) Tendons and Sinews Chi

Tendons and sinews Chi is ready and will manifest itself you feel like raising your legs.

(H) Blood Chi

Blood Chi is ready when you are moved to touch your vagina and clitoris.

(I) Chi of the Flesh

Finally you will feel the Chi of the flesh. You will feel that this Chi is ready when the urge is to massage the nipples, vagina and clitoris.

3. Procedure of Massaging the Breasts

Begin the procedure by massaging the breasts to activate the ovaries' sexual energy, which in turn will activate the energy of the glands and organs. This exercise can be performed while sitting on a chair or on the edge of a bed.

A. Begin in a Sitting Position.

Be seated. As in Ovarian Breathing, you will want a steady and fairly firm pressure on the vagina's opening, especially on the clitoris. Sit on a fairly hard, round object such as a ball or a rolled-up washcloth. You may immediately experience a pleasant sensation due to the stimulation of the genital area. If you are well-practiced in Iron Shirt and the Microcosmic Orbit, you will not require an object.

B. Bring Chi up the Spinal Cord.

At this stage of your practice, you should be able to pull the middle and the back part of the anus up, thereby bringing the Chi up through the spinal cord, and then all the way up to the pineal gland. Hold it there for a while. Then pull up the left and right sides of the anus, and bring the Chi to the left and right nipples.

C. Warm your Hands.

Inhale and rub your hands together vigorously. This will create heat in your hands by bringing the energy of your body into your palms and fingers. Place your hands on your breasts in order to feel the heat from your hands entering the skin.

D. Massage the Glands

(1) Place the tongue on the roof of the mouth.

(2) Maintaining constant contact with the skin, very lightly massage your breasts using the second, middle and fourth fingertips of both hands. Moving your right hand clockwise and your left hand counterclockwise, gently press the breasts against the rib cage, proceeding very slowly down to the area of the xyphoid process under the base of the sternum. Bring your awareness there.

(3) To activate the glands, press your three fingers to the kidney point located approximately one and a half inches in from the nipple. This point is determined by taking the second joint on the middle finger of each hand and placing it directly on the nipple with the hands against the sides of the body The fingers will automatically fall so that the tips are at this kidney point. Use the same three fingers and massage, circling around toward the center (right hand clockwise, left hand counterclockwise). That circle will touch the kidney liver pericardium and spleen meridians.

(4) Continue to massage your breasts with your fingertips barely touching the skin and gently rotating. Massage them very slowly in an outward, circular motion (right hand clockwise, left hand counterclockwise). Bring your awareness there.

(5) When you feel the clitoris is activated, the sexual energy will surge to the head and activate the pineal gland. You might feel a pressure present in the head as the energy begins to radiate, like a beacon from a lighthouse, to the pituitary gland.

(6) Continue massaging and move your attention down to the pituitary gland, feeling the intense pressure in the forehead as it radiates a blue light.

(7) Permit the activated energy to descend to the thyroid and parathyroid glands. Feel the expansion of these two glands as they become activated by the Chi of the sexual, pineal and pituitary glands, and then feel them radiate the energy outward. Blend their Chi together with the Chi of the two higher glands. Let this special blend of glands' Chi flow down to the thymus.

(8) Continue to gently massage the breasts and settle your mind on the thymus gland, activating that gland. Feel it expand and blossom like a flower. Blend all the glands Chi gathered together thus far and permit their energy to radiate to the breast. Use your mind to blend their Chi in the breasts.

(9) Let the specially blended Chi flow down to the pancreas and feel the pancreas activate. Let the pancreas energy flow to the breasts.

(10) Allow the mind to concentrate on the adrenal glands, letting the special blend of energy you have created activate the adrenal glands. As you feel them activate, expand and release this special energy: bring this energy up to the breasts, where all the glands' energy is blending together .This glands' energy will help to activate the organs' Chi.

E. Massage the Organs

(1) Be aware of your nose and lungs, and continue to rub your breasts slowly, feeling the Chi from the thymus activate the breasts' and lungs' Chi. Feel the energy of righteousness as straight, bright white, pure and expanding. Fill the lungs and direct their Chi to the breasts.

(2) Be aware of your tongue and heart. Feel the Chi from the heart in the form of joy, happiness, respect and honor and direct this energy to the breasts. Think of the breasts as melting pots that will melt the glands' and organs' energy, fusing them into a very special kind of hormonal energy and the kind of compassion which is capable of rejuvenating the glands, organs and whole system.

(3) Direct your attention to your mouth: move your mouth around and be aware of the sexually aroused energy as it activates the spleen energy. Raise the virtuous energy of fairness, and feel it manifested in a wide open feeling in the chest. Feel the Chi of the spleen and direct it to the breasts. Feel the virtues fuse.

(4) Now direct the sexual Chi, which started from the clitoris and the breasts, to the kidneys. Activate the kidneys' Chi and expand the virtuous energy of gentleness, alertness and stillness, bringing it to the breasts. As you rub your breasts and activate each organ's Chi, this Chi will automatically be drawn to the breasts. Feel the Chi start to fuse with all the other Chi virtues, combining into a very special Chi.

(5) Direct the sexual Chi to the liver to activate the liver's Chi. Raise the kindness virtue and the feeling of self-expansion, also drawing these feelings to the breasts. At this time you should feel the vagina moistening from a sweating action of the vaginal walls, plus the secretion of glandular fluid. Soon the clitoris will become engorged with blood and will become erect, and the nipples will become firmer: The outer lips of the vagina will become swollen to nearly twice their size. The inner lips will also swell.

(6) Then, place the palms of the hands on the knees, place your attention upon your breasts, and experience the energy there. By now you have accumulated a lot of energy in the breasts, where it all has melted together into compassion Chi. The nipples have become hard and erect with the swelling of the breasts. Let the energy flow like a funnel into the nipples as you feel the tingling warmth of sexual arousal. Wait a few moments as the breast energy accumulates in the nipples, and then using your concentration let the energy drop like a plumb line down into the ovaries. Your "inner eye" can help to direct the Chi there. Pause and feel the accumulated breast energy and wary energy.

(7) Become aware of your breathing and concentrate your attention on the ovaries, sending each exhalation directly to the ovaries. Concentrate on the ovaries, and use your mind and some muscles to move the lips of the vagina until you feel them swell. The PC Muscle will be tense, and then will relax and begin to pulsate. Feel an increase in the pulsation of the vagina, and feel it open and close like the petals of a flower: When this energy becomes strong, let the vagina close in and draw the energy from both ovaries to merge in the Ovarian Palace (located three inches below the navel at the cervix). You can slightly squeeze, tensing the cervix, and concentrate the sexual energy at this point. You are entering the orgasmic phase. With these practices you can direct the orgasm inward, and you can extend the orgasm more than you have ever dreamed you could. You have now completed stage one of the Orgasmic Draw. The Chi, which is ready is now comprised of the organs', glands', virtues' and sexual energies. Practice this stage, activating the clitoris and the thymus and pineal glands, for a week before you proceed with the Orgamic Draw. You will actuallyfeel the Chi in these areas. Then continue with this exercise, now moving to the lungs, the heart and spleen, etc., for another week. Once you are able to practice the entire sequence well, activating and collecting the glands' and organs' Chi will take only five to ten minutes per session. When you feel that the sexual Chi is ready at the Ovarian Palace, you can begin the Orgasmic Draw.

4. Procedure of the Orgasmic Draw: Moving the Aroused Organs' and Glands' Chi Upward Step-By-Step

A. Begin in with the Breast Message.

Use the same sitting position as you did previously for the breast massage. If sitting on a chair have your feet fist on the floor: If you need some more stimulation you can use the hard, round object previously described to press against the opening of your vagina, touching your clitoris. Stimulate yourself by rubbing your breasts, activating the organs' and glands' Chi. Fuse this with the sexual energy to become the energy of healing and compassion. Direct the sexual energy from the nipples down to the ovaries, and expand the energy into the ovaries and genitals, finally concentrating it in the Ovarian Palace.

B. Perform Muscle Contractions at the Point of Orgasm.

Inhale deeply through your nose when you are near or in the midst of orgasm. Simultaneously clench both fists and claw your feet down, making them feel like vacuum pumps sucking at the floor: At the same time clench your jaw, tighten the Cranial Pump at the back of your neck, and press your tongue firmly to the roof of your mouth.

C. Bring the sexual energy down to the Perineum (Hui-Yin).

Inhale once more and draw up the entire genital-anus region, concentrating on the Hui-Yin (perineum), urogenital diaphragm, and especially the front part of the perineum. Pull the energy from the Ovarian Palace downward to the perineum by squeezing the vagina's outer and inner lips as tightly as possible, feeling the force squeeze the clitoris. Holding your breath for a while, inhale again, contract and pull down the front part of the anus, holding your breath for a while. Feel the sexual energy being pulled down and collected at the perineum. With all muscles flexed, inhale, clench, and pull up your Ovarian Palace and sexual region repeatedly, holding the energy at the front part of the perineum. Practice nine of these hard contractions, inhaling without exhaling. Each time pull down from the Ovarian Palace to the front part of the perineum. Retention of the energy at the perineum is very important. If it is released, the sexual energy will drop down to the sexual organs or leak out the vagina, and you will have to start the exercise again. To retain the energy at a certain point means you must settle your mind and concentrate on that point. When you become out of breath, exhale and release all the muscles in the body: You may feel energy rush up, down and around the sexual region, especially during this resting period. Use your mind to guide the energy from the Ovarian Palace to the front part of the perineum.

After practicing this exercise for a week or two, you may begin to feel the muscle contractions automatically pull your vagina in and squeeze the clitoris. The anus will feel as though closed very tightly. Remember that unless otherwise indicated, all breathing is through the nose. The whole body must relax on the exhale. Allow all tension to flow out of you as if you were in meditation. Practice this exercise for at least one week.

D. Raise the sexual energy to the sacrum by arching the sacrum and activating the sacral pump.

Start with arousing the breasts to stimulate the glands' and organs' energies to fuse with the sexual energy. Clench the fists, feet, neck and jaws on inhalation. Draw up the entire genital area, urogenital diaphragm, anus, and especially the vagina. Squeeze the energy tightly to the clitoris and pull it up to the perineum. Rest for a while, inhale again and contract the front part of the anus, drawing the sexual energy down from the ovaries to the perineum. Holding your breath for a while, inhale again, and contract the middle part of the anus. At the same time contract the back part of the anus and pull up toward the coccyx, a little up from the bottom tip of your spine, drawing the sexual energy up through the perineum, and continue to draw it up to your coccyx. Feel it enter the hiatus in the sacrum.

Activate your Sacral Pump by arching the sacrum back and outward thereby straightening the sacrum. This makes it easier for the Chi to rise. Hold the energy at the sacral area and continue to inhale and pull the sexual energy in from the Ovarian Palace and sexual organs, until you feel the energy in your clitoris and your vagina begin to subside. Sometimes this requires three to nine inhalations with increasingly harder contractions. Squeezing the buttocks more tightly may help you force the sexual healing energy (Ching Chi) into the sacrum. When you are out of breath, exhale. Then relax and let your sacrum and neck return to their normal positions. This resting period will induce the activation of the Sacral and Cranial Pumps. You will gradually have the sensation of something entering into the spinal cord as the sacrum begins to open for more Chi to flow.

If you are well practiced in Ovarian Breathing, or have already opened your Microcosmic Orbit, this step of the Orgasmic Draw will be much easier. Otherwise, the sacral area is usually a little difficult to pump the energy through since, as previously noted, sexual energy is denser than other types of Chi, and aroused sexual energy is denser still. This is where the Sacral Pump enters in. As mentioned in the Ovarian Breathing exercise, some people will experience pain, tingling, or a “pins and needles” sensation when the sexual energy enters the sacral hiatus. This should not be alarming. Remember you can assist the sexual energy in its upward push past the coccyx by gently massaging the area with a silk cloth from time to time.

E. Draw sexual energy to T-11 by bowing the spine outward.

Once you are able to move the energy through your sacrum, spend the next week drawing the energy to T-11 (on the spine, opposite your solar plexus). Repeat the same procedure: arousing, clenching, and inhaling. Pump the energy up to the perineum, sacrum, and then to T-11. Again, because sexual energy is denser than life-force (Chi), you have to accommodate it by bowing your spine outward, as if you were backing up against a wall and pushing toward it to straighten your spine. This will increase the pumping action and allow for a freer passage of Ching Chi. Retain the energy at T-11 until this point feels full of energy. Practice nine hard contractions. Each time bring the energy from its source at the Ovarian Palace to T-11: each time inhale without exhaling. Then exhale and relax every part of your body, mentally guiding the Chi to flow from the Ovarian Palace to T-11.

F. Push from the sternum and bring sexual energy to C-7. Your next station is C-7 (at the base of your neck). Practice in the same manner as described above: continue to draw the energy down to the perineum and up to the sacrum (arching the sacrum), up to T-11 (bowing the spine outward), to C-7, and push the top of the sternum back toward C-7 at the base of the neck. This will help increase the pumping action of the spine, activate the thymus gland, join the thoracic and cervical vertebrae, and help push the sexual energy up.

G. Straighten the spine and bring the sexual energy to the base of the skull Jade Pillow).

The next stopping place is your Jade Pillow (located at the back of your head between C-1 and the base of the skull). Practice in the same manner as previously described: continue to draw the energy down from the Ovarian Palace to the perineum, up to the sacrum (arching the sacrum), up to T-11 (bowing the T-11 outward), up to C-7 (pushing from the sternum to C-7), thereby straightening the entire spine. Inhale and pull up to the Jade Pillow, then push the chin in toward the back and base of the skull. This will activate the Cranial Pump. At this point clench the teeth, squeeze the muscles at the back of the skull, and press your tongue hard to the palate. All of these movements will increase the Cranial pumping action. The Cranial Pump, as it fills with energy and begins to move the energy through, may pound furiously.

H. Activate the cranial pump and bring the sexual energy to the crown (Pai-Hui).

The next station for energy is the Pai-Hui (located at the crown of your head). Draw two imaginary lines from the tip of your nose and the tip of an ear straight up to the top of the head. The point where they meet is the center of your head, or crown. Press around this area and find the most sensitive spot. This is the Pai-Hui. You will be able to confirm this as the proper spot when you feel the energy reach this point.

Repeat the same process of arousing the sexual energy by massaging the breasts. When you are ready bring the energy down from the Ovarian Palace, draw it up to the sacrum, T-11, and C-7, straighten the spine, and draw the energy up to the Jade Pillow. Tuck your chin in slightly and squeeze the skull to further activate the upper Cranial Pump. Maintain a straight upper spine. Turn your eyes and all your senses up to the top of the crown. Press your tongue firmly to the palate to help activate the Cranial Pump located there. Persist in pulling the energy to the top of your head until you feel the aroused energy at the lower center subside, all the energy having been transferred to the higher center. Practice nine hard contractions and continue to inhale, each time pulling the energy from the Ovarian Palace up to the crown. Use your mind, eyes and all of your senses to spiral the sexual creative energy nine, eighteen, or thirty-six times, first in a clockwise, and then in a counterclockwise direction. Some people feel the energy first start to flow counterclockwise. If this is the case, simply let it flow. When the spiraling has finished, rest for a while and be aware of the sensational feeling as the energy enters the brain. Let the extra energy flow down the front channel, or Functional Channel, to the third eye, nose, throat, heart center, solar plexus, and finally to the navel where this extra energy can be stored.

When the energy finally goes up into your head, it will produce a very distinct warm and tingling sensation. The usual immediate response is that it feels good and amazingly refreshing. Some people claim they can think more clearly and are more creative. This is possible once they have reached the stage where they can easily convert the Ching Chi into expanded consciousness automatically. As previously emphasized, this sexual energy is later converted into original Chi, the pure Life-force, during the spiritual levels of the Taoist practice.

Remember that all the organs and glands are activated as a result of this massage.

5. Learn to use your mind to direct the aroused Organs' and glands' CMI.

Practice the Orgasmic Draw until you can pull the sexual energy up from the ovaries to the pineal gland in one draw of the "straw." In the beginning simply move from one station to another. Later this back channel, the Governor Channel, will feel more open. Eventually you will be able to settle your mind on the ovaries and the pineal gland at the crown of the head, and bring the sexual energy from the ovaries all the way up to the brain through what has been previously described as the Thrusting Channel, using only the power of the mind and all the senses. Up to this point in your practice, you had incorporated the assistance of muscle power to direct the sexual energy upward. At this stage, through practice, the muscles have become well developed and are responding automatically This allows you the freedom to eventually use only the power of your mind and senses to direct the aroused organs' and glands' Chi upward.

You must take time to really feel the sexual energy when you practice. Do not rush, and always maintain that pumping action after the exercise as you breathe in and out. Gradually use your mind more and your body less as you practice. Let the feeling of the energy be your guide.

A. Golden Nectar

Since this sexual energy, compared to other sexual energy is cooler and more creative, it cannot harm you if left in the head. When you feel that the energy has filled the brain, you will feel a honey-like fluid flow from the pituitary gland down to the nose, palate and tongue. The taste will vary with different people and on different days. It is called “Golden Nectar” and can taste delicate, like champagne, honey, coconut juice, or perhaps slightly metallic. It can feel like a warm tingling sensation on your tongue. For some people the energy flows from the brain into the pituitary gland, down the nose, palate and mouth, to the throat, heart, solar plexus, and finally to the navel. As your practice grows, the ovaries’ energy will flow thicker eventually feeling like honey flowing from a jar (the brain) into a cauldron (the navel).

B. Circulating the Energy during Lovemaking

During lovemaking we need to move the energy in a circle, and not just store it in the brain, in order to direct the excess energy to revitalize the organs and glands. This circulation is aided by the internal pressures you create during the Orgasmic Draw as you squeeze the perineum and buttocks. As you press the lower trunk energy into and up the spine, press the energy in your upper body downward, and hold the contraction as long as you can. When you exhale completely relax the entire body. The natural direction of the Chi is to continue in a circle up the back of your body and down the front to the navel.

Continue cycling the sexual energy in this way until your orgasm travels upward into the organs, glands and higher center In the beginning this might take three to nine such cycles, but after you have practiced for a while, one such round is enough.

6. Organs’ Orgasm

A. Characteristics of Each Organ

In the Tao system we believe the organs and glands are the creation and storage places of the positive and negative emotions of our life. Each organ and gland stores and accumulates different kinds of emotional energy. Once the organ is depleted and weak, the negative emotions easily settle in, or the organ is influenced by the other organs of the body. If we become aware of the source of unwanted energy; we will have a way to correct it. Each organ's characteristics (i.e., associated organ, element, etc.) are as follows:

(1) Lungs

Associated organ: large intestine. Element: metal. Season: autumn-dryness. Negative emotions: sadness, grief, sorrow. Positive emotions: righteousness, surrender letting-go, emptiness. Parts of the body: chest, inner arms, thumbs. Senses: nose-smell, mucous, skin, touch.

(2) Kidneys

Associated organ: bladder, Element: water, Season: winter, Negative emotion: fear. Positive emotions: gentleness, alertness, stillness. Parts of the body: side of foot, inner legs, chest. Senses: ears- hearing, bones.

(3) Liver

Associated organ: gall bladder, Element: wood. Season: spring. Negative emotions: anger, aggression. Positive emotions: kindness, self-expansion, identity Parts of the body: inner legs, groin, diaphragm, ribs. Senses: eyes-sight, tears.

(4) Heart

Associated organ: small intestine. Element: fire. Season: summer, Negative emotions: impatience, arrogance, hastiness, cruelty, violence. Positive emotions: joy, honor sincerity creativity, enthusiasm, spirit, radiance, light. Parts of the body: armpits, inner arms. Senses: tongue-taste, speech.

(5) Spleen

Associated organs: pancreas, stomach. Element: earth. Season: Indian summer, Negative emotions: worry, sympathy pity. Positive emotions: fairness, compassion, centering, music-making. Parts of the body: neck. Senses: mouth-taste, appetite.

(6) Triple Warmer (Circulation Sex)

There is no element, season or emotion associated with the Triple Warmer. The Triple Warmer refers to the three energy centers of the body:

The upper level: brain, heart, lungs. Property: hot.

The middle level: liver kidneys, stomach, pancreas, spleen. Property: warm.

The lower level: large and small intestines, bladder sexual organs. Property: cool.

The main goal of the organs' orgasm is to strengthen, satisfy and restore the organs to their natural state in order to generate good virtue and healing for ourselves and others.

B. Organs' Orgasm Practice Step-By-Step

Once you have practiced the steps above and have become successful in moving the aroused sexual Chi in the Microcosmic Orbit, you can begin to move this orgasm energy into the organs. Remember as you follow the steps below, always move the Chi in the Microcosmic Orbit first before continuing.

(2) When you begin to feel the sexual energy in the ovaries, move it to the left and right kidneys. Wrap the orgasmic energy: now highly refined by all of the organs and glands, with all of the combined virtues of those organs into compassion energy. Feel the kidneys bathe in this healing, creative and revitalizing energy. The actual sensation of a kidneys' orgasm is different from anything else. In fact, as you bring the compassion energy to each organ, each will have a different type of orgasmic feeling that is beyond words. It is greater than anything you have ever experienced. The organs' orgasms have a longer-lasting orgasmic feeling, bringing good health, fulfillment, joy and happiness. This kind of joy and fulfillment comes only from the sexual, creative, and generative qualities of the compassion energy that fills the organs.

Every time you move the orgasmic energy in the Microcosmic Orbit, pull it up to the ovaries, then to the left and right kidneys, and proceed, moving the energy up to:

(3) the spleen (on the left) and the liver (on the right):

(4) the left and right lungs: and

(5) the left and right sides of the brain.

(6) When you have become proficient in the Microcosmic Orbit and moving the energy to the left and right organs, contract the middle anus to bring the sexual energy to the cervix:

(7) the aorta and venacava:

(8) the pancreas: and

(9) the heart. Be very careful moving the energy to the heart because problems can be created here. Be careful in the beginning not to draw too much sexual Chi into the heart.

(10) Next take the energy to the thymus gland. This is very important for women because when this center is rejuvenated, the sexual energy will be able to increase a great deal with the assistance of that gland, thereby increasing the assistance of the other glands.

(11) Next bring the energy to the thyroid and parathyroid glands:

(12) then to the pituitary gland:

(13) to the pineal gland; and

(14) up to the crown.

(15) A final refinement to remember is that the lower contraction is not centered In the stomach or abdominal region. You must not tighten your stomach muscles during the Orgasmic Draw as this will draw Chi away from the Microcosmic Orbit. We must concentrate on the front of the undertrunk, i.e., the vagina, perineum, and urogenital diaphragm. Our goal is to so train these muscles that by using them we can flood the body with restorative energy. Directing power from the lower trunk toward the center of the body pours energy into the navel region. Since ovary and egg energy, like the blood, tend to follow the Chi energy, the navel, in effect, grips the ovary and egg energy and pulls it up into the body through the spine. Therefore, if you contract the urogenital diaphragm as if you were holding in a bladderful of urine, you will lock the passages so tightly that no internal urge can burst through the sealing rings of muscle. Make sure that there is no infection in the urinary tract which can cause infection in the bladder when you stop the urine.

C. Daily Practice

Nothing will come of nothing. You must spend time in practice to reap the benefits. An ounce of practice is worth a ton of theory. Modem life, it seems, affords little time for anything but acquiring and spending. You must be willing to surrender some time to advance. The practice must become part of your daily routine. You will make some progress if you do the exercise more often than not. If, however you practice as regularly as getting out of bed in the morning, progress will be swift, Chi will begin to build in your upper body, and you will be able to collect it at your navel.

Once you have mastered this technique, it requires only a few minutes each day to bring the sexual Chi to all the organs and glands with simply a few Orgasmic Draws. After a while when you do the Orgasmic Draw a few times you will feel, all at once, the sexual energy filling the organs and glands quickly.

If you can, practice six or nine complete contractions of the Orgasmic Draw, with each complete draw consisting of nine hard contractions. If possible, practice both in the morning and at night, and you will progress quickly. Once you have mastered the technique, eighteen to thirty-six repetitions performed morning and night should not be unduly strenuous. If you become extremely aroused, do fewer repetitions. With such intensity of training, you will easily develop the muscle tone required within a month or two. How quickly you progress is not important: what is essential is that you progress steadily. Rock bottom minimum should be one round per day; just to maintain the practice.

The preferred times for these exercises are from eleven a.m. until one pm., and eleven pm. until one a.m. During these periods the tide of Yin energy changes to Yang, and vice versa. At these times the power flows very well. If it is impossible to practice during these hours, do not be discouraged because as long as you exercise daily, you will definitely advance.

Fig. 6.14 Massaging the Genitals after Practice

D. Massage

After each practice session of the Orgasmic Draw, be sure to massage your breasts and genitals. This will disperse any energy that did not get drawn up and will alleviate any feelings of congestion or fullness.

Use your hands or a silk or taffeta scarf. Briskly rub your breasts in a circular motion, pressing them against your ribs. Then massage the mons and outer lips of the vagina, the perineum and the sacrum. This active massage should be done until you feel a cleanliness in your breasts and genitals. (Fig. 6.14)

One woman reported that she stopped the massaging step because she did not think it was important, and then noticed an increase in breast congestion right before her period. When she resumed the massage practice, she did not have any more problems premenstrually.

E. Safety Points for Ovarian Breathing, Ovarian Compression, and the Orgasmic Draw

1. Never lie flat on your back during these exercises. The Chi power may stick in your chest, causing considerable irritability and undue pressure on your heart.

2. Never lie on your left side when practicing. This also stresses the heart and overfills it with energy.

3. Never place any objects under your side while in the lying position. This will bend the channel of energy and way cause back pain.

If any of the problems mentioned in points 1 to 3 arise, release the energy safely by using the venting exercise described in Chapter 5. Any pain or discomfort should disappear within one week of beginning to vent.

4. Practice on an empty, but not hungry, stomach whenever possible. Always wait at least one hour after eating.

5. Wear loose clothes or wrap yourself in a light blanket during this practice. You will perspire if the exercises are done properly and will suffer a chill if you are not covered. After practice, change your clothes so that you are removed from the moisture of the fabric. There should be a gentle flow of clean air in the room. Avoid any drafts or wind. Wind tends to blow the Chi power away. It might cause your energy to become cold easily.

6. As you advance, beads of sweat may accumulate on your brow. Rub this sweat into the skin--it has desirable properties which should be returned to the body.

7. Do not breathe through the mouth during these exercises. It is easier to control the flow of air when breathing through the nose. Inhalation through the nose charges the air with energy and invigorates the brain.

8. Do not be concerned if you feel little effect during the first days or weeks of practice. Each person needs a varying amount of time before heat flows from her ovaries.

9. You must develop intense concentration. Keep your mind from wandering. Alow thoughts and images to leave without following them. Empty the vessel of the mind of thoughts, and powerful energy will stream into the void. Your power of concentration will develop greatly if you persist in this discipline. Learn the Microcosmic Orbit meditation, and carry it out immediately after practicing the Orgasmic Draw.

10. During the resting period close the eyes and follow the energy's path. The mind should not stray to thoughts or fantasies, but should flow with the course of the energy. This may sound very difficult. You will be amazed at how quickly you can become sensitive to your own energy. When you experience these energies within yourself, you will know exactly what we mean. Since the energy flows along natural courses, it guides your mind even as your mind guides the energy.

11. Those who suffer from constipation should practice in the morning. These exercises will help greatly to remedy the problem.

12. If you are infected with venereal disease, thoroughly cure your self before engaging in this exercise. Otherwise the pain will be quite severe when you draw so much blood and power to the pubic region.

F. Cleansing Side Effects

Although they may appear elementary. the exercises in this and the preceding chapter are highly refined techniques for increasing vital power. They are like sharp swords which must be used with care to perform their functions without harming oneself. If you follow the instructions closely you will not suffer any distressing side effects. Study the methods with seriousness, assimilate every line of the text, and persist until you have succeeded.

1. It has been our experience that many students of this method soon begin to move their bowels with unaccustomed ease. Some will pass an unusual amount of gas for a time and move the bowels two or three times per day. In this way the body uses its new resources thoroughly to cleanse and purify itself by completely natural means. The unusual number of evacuations and gas decreases within one or two months.

2. This purgative detoxification is followed by regular bowel movements and a deep sense of bodily purity and strength. The saliva becomes lighter and sweeter. Improvement in bowel function arises from the increased flow of vital energy into the entrails. This energizes the involuntary muscles and allows them to function with ease. There may also be a noticeable increase in burping, which is a healthy exhalation of impurities and noxious gas within the body Burping also lessens after a time, as the body becomes more refreshed.

3. The Orgasmic Draw is excellent for improvement of hemorrhoids. Hemorrhoids are caused by sedentary life styles, accumulated heavy toxins, gravitational pooling of blood, stressful bowel movements, and depressed levels of Chi energy in the Hui-Yin. In already existing hemorrhoids, the Orgasmic Draw may cause increased hemorrhoids bleeding for two to four weeks. If the bleeding is not excessive, perform the exercise at half strength. You will gradually be cured. The exercise remedies specific causes of hemorrhoids by evacuating stagnant blood from the anal blood vessels. While performing the Orgasmic Draw as a cure for hemorrhoids, you may use medication to speed the healing process. Horsetail Grass (Equisetum Narvensis) is an excellent remedy used as a tea and in sitz baths. People who have serious hemorrhoid problems should consult a doctor:

G. Summary of the Orgasmic Draw Exercise

1. Sit with your feet flat on the floor. Use the stimulation of a hard object against your vagina and clitoris, if necessary. Rub your breasts to stimulate yourself. Direct the sexual energy from the nipples down to the ovaries, and expand the energy in the ovaries and genitals, finally concentrating it in the Ovarian Palace.

2. Inhale deeply through your nose when you are near or in the midst of orgasm while simultaneously clenching both fists, clawing your feet, clenching your jaws, tightening the Cranial Pump at the back of your neck, and pressing your tongue firmly to the roof of your mouth.

3. Inhale once more, drawing up the entire genital-anus region, especially concentrating on the front part of the Hui-Yin (perineum) and the urogenital diaphragm. Pull the energy from the Ovarian Palace downward to the perineum by squeezing the vagina's outer and inner lips as tightly as possible, thereby squeezing the clitoris. Hold your breath for a while, inhale again, contract and pull down the front part of the anus, again holding your breath. Feel the sexual energy collect at the perineum. With all muscles flexed, inhale without exhaling, clench, and pull up your sexual region nine times, holding the energy at the front part of the perineum. Retention of the energy here is very important. When out of breath exhale and release all the muscles in the body. Rest. Use your mind to guide the energy from the Ovarian Palace to The front part of the perineum.

4. Arouse the breasts again, and with an inhalation clench the fists, feet, neck and jaws. Draw up the entire genital area, urogenital diaphragm, anus, and especially the vagina, squeezing the energy tightly to the clitoris and pulling it up to the perineum. Rest for a while, inhale again and contract the front part of the anus, pulling the sexual energy down from the ovaries to the perineum. Hold your breath for a while and inhale again, contract the middle part of the anus and then the back part of the anus, pull the sexual energy up through the perineum, and continue to draw it up to your coccyx to enter the hiatus in the sacrum.

Arch the sacrum back and outward, straightening it, to activate the Sacral Pump. Hold the energy here and continue to inhale three to nine times, pulling the sexual energy in from the Ovarian Palace and sexual organs, with increasingly harder contractions if necessary, until the energy in your clitoris and your vagina subsides. Squeezing the buttocks mote tightly may be helpful. When you are out of breath, exhale: then relax and let your sacrum and neck return to their normal positions, and rest to induce the activation of the Sacral and Cranial Pumps as the Chi enters the spinal cord through the sacrum.

5. To draw the energy to T-11, repeat the same procedure described in 1. through 4. above. Bow your spine outward and straighten your spine to accommodate the dense sexual energy and increase the pumping action. Retain the energy at T-11 until this point fills with energy. Bring the energy from the Ovarian Palace to T-11 nine times with hard contractions, inhaling each time without exhaling. Exhale and relax every part of your body, mentally guiding the Chi to flow from the Ovarian Palace to T-11.

6. To draw the energy to C-7, practice in the same manner as described above. As you bring the energy to C-7, inhale and push the top of the sternum back toward the base of the neck to straighten the entire spine, increase the pumping-up of the energy, activate the thymus gland, and join the thoracic and cervical vertebrae.

7. To draw the energy to your Jade Pillow, practice in the same manner as previously described. Inhale and pull up to the Jade Pillow, pushing the chin in toward the back and base of the skull to activate the Cranial Pump. Clench the teeth, squeeze the muscles at the back of the skull, and press your tongue hard to the palate to increase the pumping action.

8. Next draw the energy to the Pai-Hui, or crown of the head. Repeat the same process, maintaining a straight upper spine. Turn your eyes and all your senses up to the top of the skull. Press your tongue firmly to the palate to help activate the Cranial Pump. Continue to pull the energy to the top of your head until you feel the aroused energy at the lower center subside. Practice nine hard contractions and continue to inhale, each time pulling the energy from the Ovarian Palace up to the crown. Use your mind, eyes and all your senses to spiral the sexual creative energy nine, eighteen, or thirty-six times, first in a clockwise, and then in a counterclockwise direction. When the spiraling has finished, rest for a while and feel the energy enter the brain. Eventually by settling your mind on the ovaries and the gland at the crown of the head, you will bring the sexual energy from the ovaries to the brain by using only the power of the mind and all the senses.

9. The cool energy can be left in the brain or when you feel the brain is full, let the extra energy (Golden Nectar) flow down the Functional (front) Channel to the third eye, nose, throat, heart center solar plexus, and finally to the navel where it can be stored.

10. During lovemaking do not store the energy in the brain, but circulate it to direct the excess energy to revitalize the organs and glands. Squeeze your buttocks and perineum, and press the lower-trunk energy into and up the spine. At the same time press the energy in your upper body downward, holding the contraction as long as possible. Then exhale completely and relax the entire body

Fig. 6.15 Internal Alchemy begins at the Cauldron.

The Chi will continue to circle up the back and down the front of your body to the navel. Continue cycling the sexual energy in this way until your orgasm travels upward into the organs, glands and higher center

H. The Orgasmic Draw is the Basis for Alchemical Sex

To make full use of the Chi Ching gathered at the navel requires study of the Taoist methods of meditation. Slightly behind or below the navel is the Lower Tan Tien Center, the lower field of energy in the body within which the Taoists store Chi before refining it back upward. The Chi moves in circles among the lower, middle, and upper Tan Tien. Each time it spirals past it is refined into a higher quality of Chi. The process of refining and balancing the energy is taught in the Microcosmic Orbit, the Fusion of Five Elements, and the Lesser Enlightenment of Kan and Li courses.

It is not unlike taking crude honey mixed with wax, dirt and dead bees, and methodically refining it into the sweetest of nectars. Taoists treat the ovaries like raw honey. The Orgasmic Draw is the step of preventing the raw honey from leaking out of an old bucket and storing it in a new and well-sealed "jar" In this "jar" or "cauldron," placed at the level of the navel about two-thirds of the way back toward the spine, the ancient Masters mixed and cooked the different Chi energies of the body in a process they called "alchemy" the precursor of modern chemistry. (Fig. 6.15)

The secret alchemical agent they used was nothing more than ordinary sexual "essence," i.e., Ching. Without it, however, none of the higher levels of alchemical meditation would work. The Sexual Kung Fu exercises of Ovarian Breathing, Ovarian Compression, and the Orgasmic Draw may seem simple and too rudimentary to affect spiritual development, but their proper mastery is essential before you can move on to a loving relationship in full command of your sexual and spiritual powers. Your sexual essence is an elixir of life and the fountain of your youth, and is well worth training vigorously to safeguard.

Chapter 7
Egg Exercises
Tips to Increase Sexual Energy

A.Introduction to Egg Exercises- Vaginal Weight Lifting

The use of a stone egg to strengthen the vagina is a practice which evolved in ancient China. As time went on, the secret of this practice remained in the Royal Palace and was taught only to the queen and concubines. Many who mastered the technique experienced very good health, remaining young and bountiful, with sexual organs in old age as tight and resilient as those of a young, unmarried lady. Some believe that the queen and concubines practiced the technique in order to please the king while making love. Originally, however the Egg Exercise and Vaginal Weight Lifting were implemented for improving health, both physically and spiritually, since these exercises provide more power to the Chi Muscle to lift the sexual energy inward and upward where it will be transformed into higher spiritual energy.

The egg is a marvelous way to strengthen and control the Chi Muscle. It is easier to practice control of this muscle with an egg in the vagina since, as the egg moves, you can feel the direction in which the Chi Muscle moves more distinctly. Controlling this voluntary muscle means control of the many involuntary muscles in this area as well. Also, as you master the use of this muscle of the vagina and perineum, you simultaneously tone up the lower abdomen. Thus, your performance of Ovarian Breathing, the Orgasmic Draw, and the Organs' Orgasm greatly improves, and the flow of sexual hormones increases.

Vaginal Weight Lifting is a very powerful practice to strengthen, in addition to the Chi Muscle, the urogenital and pelvic diaphragms. The strength of these two diaphragms is very important since these diaphragms serve as floors to the sexual organs and all vital organs. When the Chi Muscle and diaphragms are loose, Chi pressure will leak out from the organs as they stack upon each other, dropping all their weight to rest upon the perineum. When strong, the muscle and the diaphragm function as seals, preventing leakage of life-force and sexual energies.

1. Selection of your Egg

Gem and mineral shops generally have a large selection of sizes and materials as well as prices. We researched and tested several different materials and found a volcanic rock called obsidian carved into egg shapes which contained the properties that we are looking for: embracing the Yang power of the volcano, but originating from the Yin power of the center of the Earth. These characteristics attract and concentrate the Yin essence of a woman. Further details, as well as the eggs themselves, can be obtained from the UniversalTao System.

When you look at the eggs you will have to decide what size looks like it might feel comfortable in your vagina. The eggs range in size from that of a quail egg to jumbo supermarket eggs. Most women choose a medium-sized one, that is, an egg approximately one inch in diameter made of either stone or wood. Wooden eggs can be easily drilled for the attachment of weights, and are therefore suited for the Vaginal Weight Lifting practice. We prefer to use stone eggs, such as obsidian, for the internal sucking exercise because of their smooth, non-porous nature. The smaller the egg, the more work your muscles will have to do because they will have to contract more strongly to cause any movement of the egg. Select an egg with a smooth surface.

2. Care for the Egg

Proper attention and care to one's feminine hygiene is an absolute necessity prior to beginning this practice. Cleanliness of the vaginal canal and the eggs are equally important. Wooden eggs should be boiled or cleaned every one to two months with a diluted vinegar solution (one tablespoon per quart of water) and allowed to dry for at least one hour; since the wooden egg easily absorbs vaginal fluid and can be a culture for germs if permitted to remain wet. A stone egg should be boiled by bringing it to the boiling point, and then allowing it to cool down. Boiling the stone egg is necessary prior to its first use. After that, simply wash it with water after each time you use it. A word of caution about using soap or detergent: some people are allergic to certain chemicals that are found in soap and detergent, especially when inserted into the channel where the membranes are very sensitive. Also, many women are unknowingly allergic to alcohol (isopropyl or rubbing type), therefore its use should be avoided for cleansing purposes.

3. Caution in Practicing the Egg Exercises

a. Before practicing the egg exercises, you must first master Ovarian Breathing.

b. You must be fully aroused before inserting the egg. If you produce very little fluid naturally, use a lubricant.

c. Married women should use a smaller egg.

d. Do not practice lying down.

e. If a problem arises and the egg becomes stuck, do not panic. Lie down and relax and the egg will come out.

4. Using the Egg

A. Beginning the Exercise

The first time you use the egg, you will probably want to, and should, exercise all precaution until you become accustomed to it. Each time before practicing the egg exercise, you must warm yourself by massaging the breasts, making sure the vagina is expanded and some lubricating fluid is being emitted. In this chapter we provide you with a simple breast massage to warm you up. If you decide to practice immediately after the Orgasmic Draw, there is no need to try this simple version of massage because you have already massaged the breasts before the Orgasmic Draw. Once you master the Egg Exercise you can practice it in conjunction with the Orgasmic Draw or Ovarian Breathing by placing the egg in the vagina while practicing. However it is important that you, separate every exercise at first, and then join them at a later time when you become more proficient.

To assist you in inserting the egg easily if necessary, use a lubricating jelly: any spermicidal jelly or cream that is not petroleum based, any natural lubricating oil, such as a raw cooking oil, that you know is safe, or any lubricant that you have used that you do not have a chemical reaction to. Always insert the wider end of the egg first. Once inserted, assume the standard Horse Stance posture (feet shoulders' width apart and firmly grounded: ankles and knees bent: groin folded: spine and neck in alignment). Elevate your arms in front of you to a 45-degree angle with your palms facing upward. Assume a clenched fist position. It is from this basic rooting stance that each of the Egg Exercises is Performed. (Fig. 7.1(a) and (b))

(a) Feet shoulder's width apart and firmly grounded.

(b) Side View

Fig. 7.1 Horse Stance for the Egg Exercise

The cervix represents the back limit of the vagina. Squeezing the muscles the way you would to have a bowel movement will expel the egg. In the beginning make sure not to practice on a cement floor so that if the egg drops out, it will not break. You can also place a towel under your feet.

Fig. 7.2 Three Sections of the Vagina

B. Three Sections of the Vaginal Canal (Fig. 7.2)

With the practices of Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Draw, you began to gain control of your Chi Muscle. To gain further control through the Egg Exercise, we divide the vaginal canal into three sections.

(1) The external vaginal orifice and front of the vaginal canal

The first section includes the muscles of the external vaginal orifice and the front part of the vaginal canal. When the egg is inserted, you will contract the uterus, closing the orifice tightly so that the egg cannot drop out.

(2) The anterior of the cervix

The second section to be contracted consists of the muscles of the vaginal canal immediately in front of the cervix.

(3) The middle of the vaginal canal

Fig. 7.3 Moving the Egg

The third section encompasses the muscles of the middle of the vaginal canal. These are the muscles that will move the egg up and down, left and right, and tilt it in different directions. (Fig. 7.3) You will practice moving and using these muscles until you master their movement as easily as using your hand. As you play with the direction you will learn to differentiate each movement of these muscles. If you have a male partner he will soon notice the results of this practice. Practice for a few minutes at a time, as often as you like. Insert the egg before practicing Tai Chi, Iron Shirt, or any of the other physical practices. Gradually increase the length of time you retain it. Just remember that it is there, since laughing, sneezing, or coughing can sometimes cause the egg to blast out of the vagina quite unexpectedly.

5. Two Eggs Technique

You can upgrade the practice by using two eggs in the vagina at the same time, moving them up and down, in different directions, or banging them together to achieve a vibration that will stimulate the inside organs. (Fig. 7.4) Two eggs are more difficult to manage, quite like drawing a square and circle simultaneously using both hands. It is important to know how to manage one egg well first.

Once you are well trained and are master of the Chi Muscle, you can dispense with the eggs, using your mind and the appropriate muscles to move the sexual energy as you wish.

B. Breast Massage Techniques Preliminary to the Egg Exercise

The importance of a preliminary massage before practicing the Egg Exercise and Vaginal Weight Lifting cannot be overlooked. Its purpose is to stimulate hormone secretion from the breasts and ovaries. Once ejected from their glandular source, these hormones become available for transformation into higher energy as they travel along the pathway of the Orgasmic Draw. Performing the massage with a silk or taffeta cloth creates a certain friction which is more conducive to hormonal stimulation, and is, therefore, more efficient in obtaining results.

Begin the massage by gently but firmly pushing the fatty tissue of the mound of each breast against the rib cage, moving two or three fingers of each hand in small circular movements. Start at the central nipple areas and work your way around and outward until each entire breast has been massaged. When using a cloth both sizes can be worked simultaneously if a long enough piece of cloth is used (three feet by ten feet is a good size to work with).

Squeezing Two Eggs Apart

Fig. 7.4 Squeezing Two Eggs Together

Be observant of the body's signals that the hormone secreting process has begun: erect nipples and a subtle filling or hardness of the breast are two positive indicators. Breast massage will increase the energy flow to the breasts, thereby helping to break down congestion which, over a long period of time, can contribute to the development of cancer.

Breast cancer is the leading cause of cancer death in women. If discovered early enough, it can be cured. In the interest of broadening our awareness of the body's ever-changing state of health, we suggest that once a month, ideally after each menstrual period, women regularly incorporate into their practice a simple technique of breast self-examination for early detection of breast cancer. Always look thoroughly for any changes that your breasts may have undergone since your last checkup. Stand in front of a mirror and become familiar with their appearance. Is there any unusual dimpling or puckering of the skin, discoloration, ulceration, hardening or lump? Have the superficial blood vessels grown larger or increased in number? Has the size, shape or contour of your breasts changed? Next, elevate your hands above your head and ask yourself the same questions.

After completing the breast massage, the genital area should be massaged. Using the same cloth and fingertip circular motions, cover the entire mons and labial area inch by inch. After having sufficiently stimulated the clitoris, warm, moist vaginal secretions will mark the body's readiness for the egg's insertion. (For a more detailed approach to breast massage, return to Chapter 6).

C. Summary of Egg Exercises Step-By-Step

1. Insert the Egg

When you feel you are ready, insert the egg into the vagina, large end first.

2. Horse Stance Alignment

Align your body in the basic Horse Stance described earlier.

3. Contract the First Section

Isolate and contract the muscle groups responsible for closing the external vaginal orifice tightly. This will help to keep the egg in the vaginal canal.

4. Contract the Second Section

Inhale and contract the vaginal canal muscles immediately in front of the cervix so that you are now contracting two sections at the same time. Keep both points closed. There is no need to use hard muscle contractions. The strength required depends a great deal on the control of these muscles you have gained by practicing the Ovarian exercises of Chapters 5 and 6.

Fig. 7.5 Moving the Egg up.

5. Squeeze the Third Section

Slightly squeeze the egg from the middle of the vaginal canal until you feel that you have a good grip on it. Inhale and squeeze again, gradually increasing the squeeze, and then inhale more and squeeze harder (Fig. 7.5) Once you feel you have a good grip on the egg, slowly move it up and down. Start with a slow motion, gradually increasing to a fast motion. When you are out of breath, exhale and rest. The resting period is very important. It is at this time that you will feel Chi build up in this area. Try to master each movement before continuing to the next step.

Fig. 7.6 Using the Second Section to move the Egg Sideways.

6. Use the Second Section to Move the Egg Left and Right

Next move the egg left and right using the top, or second, section. Practice until you master this action. (Fig. 7.6)

7. Use the First Section to Move the Egg Left and Right

Next move the egg left and right from the bottom, or first, section. Using the mind and some muscle movement are important since you cannot move the egg with hard muscle contractions alone. There are many involuntary muscles within the vaginal canal which the mind and Chi Muscle help to move.

Fig. 7.7 Using Both Sections to move the Egg Sideways.

8. Use Both Sections to Move the Egg Left and Right

Now move the egg left and right as you wish, holding it by the top and bottom muscles. Master this step before continuing to the next exercise. (Fig. 7.7)

9. Use Both Sections to Tilt the Egg

Next tilt the egg up and down from the top and the bottom. Master this action.

10. Combine all Movements

Combine all of these movements, moving the egg left and right, tilting it up and down, moving it up to touch the cervix, and then down to the external vaginal orifice. Rest. All during the Egg Exercise the contraction of the vaginal canal in the area in front of the cervix and the external orifice is to remain constant until you have finished moving the egg.

This particular Egg Exercise should be practiced two to three times per week. You may, and should, perform this very same exercise daily without actually inserting the egg by following the same sequence using the contractile strength of the vaginal muscles to suck in an imaginary egg and move it up, down, left and right.

To enhance your development you should begin using a smaller egg. Later the larger eggs may be used to mark the progress in your “sucking” abilities. Eventually the practice of egg-sucking will become so mastered that you will be able to suck the egg into the vagina from the outside with a vacuum-like force. Such a powerful sucking activity enhances experiences in your life such as childbearing or lovemaking. Imagine the intense pleasure of your lover as you demonstrate to him your power and skill.

D. Egg Exercise during Ovarian Breathing and Orgasmic Draw

Once you master the Egg Exercise described above, you can combine the practice with Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Draw. Each will enhance the others practice.

1. Prepare with Breast Massage

Prepare with the breast massage until you feel yourself ready, and insert the egg into your vagina.

2. Align Yourself in the Horse Stance

Align your body in the basic Horse Stance described earlier.

3. Close the External Vaginal Orifice

Isolate and contract the individual muscle groups responsible for tightly closing the external vaginal orifice.

4. Gather the Energy at the Ovarian Palace

Gather the energy from the ovaries and the breasts at the Ovarian Palace. Inhale slowly and deeply. Draw the sexual energy down through the uterus to the clitoris and hold it there.

5. Grip and Move the Egg

Contract and hold the lower; then middle and upper vaginal muscles and feel your grip on the egg. Then push the egg deeply up into the vaginal canal. Move it up and down and feel the increasing sexual energy.

6. Begin Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Draw

As you feel more energy gather at the vaginal canal, follow the procedures of Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Draw. Pull the energy to the front part of the perineum, to the sacrum, T-11, C-7, C-1, Jade Pillow, and crown. Circulate the energy in the brain and bring it down the front channel to the third eye, tongue, throat, heart center solar plexus and navel. Collect the energy at the navel. Please review the details of the practice of Ovarian Breathing and the Orgasmic Draw in Chapters 5 and 6.

E. Vaginal Weight Lifting (Fig. 7.8)

The only difference between the Egg Exercise and Vaginal Weight Lifting procedure is the addition of a weight to the specially drilled egg. As mentioned earlier in weight lifting, we use wooden eggs. Usually an egg is chosen of approximately a one-inch diameter with holes drilled in it through which a string can be threaded for attachment to a weight. Use a sturdy string that can sustain at least ten to twenty pounds of weight, or use three strands of string. Begin with a one-half pound weight. You can buy a half-pound plate that has a hole through which the string can be tied, or use a small cotton or plastic bag into which a weight can be placed and the bag easily attached to the egg's string and hung.

Fig. 7.8 Vaginal Weight Lifting

Suspending weights from the egg is a most effective way to increase the strength of the pelvic and urogenital diaphragms and the vaginal muscles. This is also a tremendous exercise for the cervix, the ovaries, and the organs and glands. With the increase in weight the vagina alone does not have enough strength to lift the weight, making it necessary for all the internal organs and glands to join in contributing to the strength. The heavier the weight the more counter pressure must be exerted by the vagina, the cervix, the ovaries, the diaphragm, the organs and glands. This extended effort will result in increased Chi pressure and hormone production. Make sure you can handle the weight well before adding more to it.

The exact sequence of steps is then followed as described in the Egg Exercise above. This time, however do not move the egg up and down. Hold it by tightening and squeezing the external and middle sections of the vaginal canal around the egg and pulling the egg up. Do not release it. This exercise is to be performed one time only, two to three times per week, with the weight gradually increasing in one-half pound increments, and not exceeding ten pounds.

1. Practical Exercise Step-By-Step

A. Insert the egg while holding the string and weight.

Place a chair in front of you and then place the weight on the chair: If you are not already prepared, start with the breast massage, followed by massaging the mons, the perineum, and the coccyx. When you feel the Chi is ready insert the wooden egg with the string attached into the vagina, always attempting to increase the force of suction used to draw it in. Use the other hand to hold the string with the weight.

B. Assume the Horse Stance.

Align your body in the basic Horse Stance described earlier.

C. Grip the egg using the muscles of the vaginal canal and release the string and weight.

Inhale, closing the external and internal vagina tightly. At the same time contract the uterus so that the vaginal canal has been closed on both ends. Inhale, squeeze the egg tightly, and pull it up until you feel you have gripped the egg firmly, then slowly release the string with the weight attached. Do not remove your hand in case you did not grip the egg firmly enough. If the egg with the weight attached falls out, it might hurt you.

D. Use the cervix to pull the weight up.

Hold your breath and contract harder. Inhale and start to pull from the cervix and feel the force of the cervix helping to pull up the weight. When you feel you are holding the egg with the weight securely start to rock the pelvis, thus rocking the weight, 30 to 60 times. (Fig. 7.9) This will generate a tremendous energy. When you feel the energy build up, inhale slowly and deeply down to the ovaries, gathering your sexual energy, and carry it through the uterus and down to the clitoris. Hold it there.

Fig. 7.9 Swinging the Weight Back and Forth.

E. Employ all the muscles of the vaginal canal.

Contract and hold the lower then the middle and upper vaginal muscles, so that the egg pushes deeply up into the vaginal canal and the weight will not pull the egg out.

F. Bring the energy into the head.

Now draw all the energy you have just gathered up the spine and into the head, as you continue to hold the egg deeply inside of you

G. Continue pulling the energy into the brain.

Still holding the same breath, continue gathering and pulling the sexual energy up into the head, where the brain can now be bathed in this wondrous nourishment.

H. Hold the energy in the brain.

Hold this energy in your brain, initially for 30 to 45 seconds, and gradually increase this time period.

I. Bring the energy to the navel.

Finally, stick the tongue up to the palate, exhale, bring the energy down, and collect it in the navel point.

J. Rest the weight on the chair and expel the egg.

Grip the string on the weight and place the weight on the chair Let the egg go, utilizing the contractile strength of the vaginal muscles to expel it.

K. The ovaries pull and lift the egg and weight upward.

When you feel you can pull from the cervix well, begin to use the force of the ovaries. You will try only the left side first, then the right ovary; and finally both sizes together When you feel you can once again secure the egg in the vaginal canal, use your mind and start to contract the left ovary, wrap the Chi around that ovary, and then pull from the left ovary toward the cervix and the vaginal canal, pulling The egg and attached weight upward. Do the same on the right side, and then both sides together.

L. The kidneys pull the egg and weight.

Next move to the kidneys and the adrenal glands situated on top of them. Practice using the force of each kidney separately first in order to identify the feeling. Inhale and use the contraction of both kidneys to help pull the weight up. Then, starting with the left kidney and making sure you feel the force coming from there, use your mind to contract the muscles around the left kidney even more, and wrap it with Chi. Then pull the left kidney down again, pulling it toward the left ovary and the bladder. The ovary, in turn, will pull on the cervix: the cervix will pull on the vaginal canal; the vaginal canal will pull on the egg: and the egg will pull on the weight. In other words, once you have secured the egg in the vaginal canal, you will pull with the higher organs and glands which, in turn, will pull on the lower organs and glands, and they, in their turn, will pull on the egg and weight. Practice the same procedure with the right kidney. Once you have mastered the left and right kidneys, combine both kidneys in the practice. This will give you a great deal of internal force to pull an even heavier weight.

M. The spleen and liver pull the egg and weight.

Next move up to the spleen and liver. Start again on the left side, contracting the muscles around the spleen, situated beneath the left side of the rib cage. Contract and wrap the Chi around and into the spleen. Pull the spleen toward the left kidney, pull the kidney to the bladder and left ovary, the left ovary to the cervix, the cervix to the vaginal canal, and the vaginal canal to the egg and weight. Practice the same procedure on the liver which lies under the right side of the rib cage. Pack, wrap and pull the liver up and toward the right kidney, to the bladder and right ovary, to the cervix, to the vaginal canal, and to the egg and weight.

N. The lungs are employed next.

Moving to the lungs, start with the left lung first. Practice contracting the left lung and wrapping Chi around it until you actually feel the lung contracting. When you have again secured the egg in the vagina, begin to contract the lung with more force and pull from the lung to the spleen, then to the kidney, bladder and left ovary, cervix, vaginal canal, and egg and weight. Practice in the same manner on the right side, beginning with the right lung.

O. Be cautious with the heart as it pulls on the egg and weight.

As you move on to the next organ, the heart, be cautious, making sure that you are well in control of the other organs first. The heart and lungs can easily become congested with energy and can cause chest pain and difficulty in breathing. If you have this problem, tap the area around the heart and practice the healing sound of the heart (as described in the book Taoist Ways to Transform Stress into Vitality). Practice until you can control the contraction of the heart muscle and wrap the Chi around the heart. Again, secure the egg in the vaginal canal, contract the heart and lungs and pull up toward the spleen, liver adrenal glands and kidneys, bladder and ovaries, cervix, vaginal canal, egg and weight.

P. The thymus gland is difficult to contract.

The thymus gland is difficult to contract because of its location under the sternum. The only way to do this is to sink the chest and sternum down, press the sternum to the back, and contract and wrap it with Chi. Mastering this contraction and wrapping the heart and lungs with Chi will help greatly in contracting the thymus gland. Once again, secure the egg in the vaginal canal, sink the sternum to the back and contract the lungs, from left to right, toward the thymus under the sternum, then contract the heart to the thymus which is in close proximity. Pressing and contracting the heart will greatly increase the force of the thymus. Feel all three organs and the gland create the force to pull the spleen, liver, kidneys, bladder ovaries, cervix, vaginal canal, egg and weight.

Q. Pulling from the pituitary and pineal glands all the way to the brain.

The pituitary and pineal glands are the most difficult to master If, however you master all the other organs, these glands will be easier to learn to control. The tongue and eyes act as major tools in exerting force on the pituitary and pineal glands. Practice first, by pressing the tongue to the palate and turning the eyes upward. Contract the eye muscles toward the middle of the brain to the pituitary gland. Contract the muscles of the skull and squeeze the brain into itself toward the pituitary gland, located in the middle of the brain. Concentrate on and contract the middle part of the anus and pull all the way up into the brain. Contract the lungs, heart and thymus gland and push up toward the middle of the brain. Now secure the egg in the vaginal canal, press your tongue firmly to the palate with the tip of the tongue, touching the lower jaw behind the teeth and the flat part of the tongue touching the middle of the palate. Turn your eyes up toward the middle of the brain, and squeeze the head muscles toward the brain's middle area. Contract the lungs, heart, and thymus gland, and press upward to the middle section of the brain. The pituitary gland, together with all of the other glands and organs pull up the spleen, liver kidneys, bladder, ovaries, cervix, vaginal canal, egg and weight. Repeat the practice, now focusing on the pineal gland.

When finished with all of these steps, make sure that you circulate the energy for a few rounds in the Microcosmic Orbit, finally collecting it in the navel. Since all the steps of this exercise are very important and extremely powerful, you must use caution. Gradually you will feel all the organs and glands contributing to the internal force that will pull the weight. If you have already mastered the organs' orgasm, you will handle this exercise with ease.

R. Cleanse the Egg Thoroughly.

Since the mucous secretions on the egg are an ideal medium for bacterial growth, be sure to cleanse the egg thoroughly after each use.

S. Massage yourself.

Massage the Hui-Yin point in the perineum. Massage the mons and the coccyx. This massaging after each exercise is very important. It will help you clear the remaining energy so that the body can absorb it easily.

T. Channel the energy in the Microcosmic Orbit.

Gently tap the lower abdomen with your palm to remove the excess energy from the ovaries, vagina and clitoris. Sit down quietly and channel the excess energy in the Microcosmic Orbit, so that all your organs will benefit.

F. Herbs to Tone Your Ovaries - Special Recipes for Women

Women who experience any weakness of their sexual organs will find it quite to their advantage to follow two of Maneewan Chia's simple and delicious recipes.

1. Ovaries' Strengthening Tonic

To gradually increase the energy flow in the ovaries, sample this mixture.

1 cup whiskey
1 cup honey
1 cup lemon juice

Stir the mixture well until the honey dissolves. Store the mixture in a previously sterilized jar. Shake the jar well before each use. Drink one to two tablespoons daily.

Caution: If you are experiencing a very heavy menstrual flow, refrain from taking the mixture for a few days until you have normalized. This recipe will last several months, and the more it ages, the better it becomes. Store it in a cool dry place.

2. Don Quai-Chicken Soup

As an herb containing numerous invaluable properties, Don Quai should become an integral component of a woman's health care regimen.

Loaded with good nutrition for the ovaries and hormones, this herb is essentially required by a woman's body throughout her lifetime. It is especially good as a blood tonic, being quite rich in iron, and it is great for alleviating a variety of menstrual problems. Don Quai is taken only one to two times per month and only after the menstrual cycle has ended, never during the cycle.

This herb can be obtained in Chinese herb stores located in every Chinatown. Many of these stores have mail order services.

Simply place one to two heads of the herb (about one inch in size) in chicken broth or soup, and season as desired. Simmer in a slow cooker for approximately three to five hours.

Vegetarians can make Don Quai in the same manner using the slow cooker and a meatless broth.

After using Don Quai on a regular basis for a one- or two-month peroid, you will notice a definite increase in your strength.

G. Sunning (Fig. 7.10)

If you are lucky enough to have a sunny area with some privacy; you will probably enjoy this practice.

The sun's energy is very healing and soothing to the genitals and can be absorbed by the ovaries through the genitals. The best time of day is in the early morning (between seven a.m. and nine a.m.) and in the late afternoon (between three p.m. and five p.m.)

Absorbing Yang Energy

This position completes the energy circulation through the hands and feet.

Palms Down,
Thumbs Touching

Soles of Feet are touching.

Fig. 7.10 Sunning

Sunning should be done no more than five minutes in the beginning eventually working up to ten minutes.

Massage the mons area and alongside the outer lips. Open the labia to the sun and use your mind to draw the solar energy into your ovaries. Let this energy mix with your own energy as you circulate it in the Microcosmic Orbit.

Chapter 8
Dual Cultivation

A. Introduction to Dual Cultivation

1. Opening the Healing Love Energy Channel

Most people would agree that sex is enjoyable. In this book you are learning how to utilize the normal sexual energy that you create and how to multiply it. By now you should be aware of the fact that if you do not transform the sexual energy that you produce, but let it drain out, you lessen your vitality. This is accompanied by more and more psychologically draining effects, such as tiredness or depression, or actual physical suffering, such as pain in the back or kidney areas. If you continue to deplete yourself, eventually you will drain the vitality from all the organs and glands, making the body weak, sick and old.

As previous chapters have indicated, in order to transform the sexual energy, you must direct it upward to a higher energy center. Doing this requires channeling the flow of this energy. We have stressed the need and importance of opening the channels of the Microcosmic Orbit, the main route through which the energy begins to travel.

In ancient times, the ways to develop Chi flow were regarded as top secret, especially the way to channel sexual healing energy. Sexual energy is extremely powerful as a means to attain rejuvenation and a higher spiritual energy. There are textbooks, such as the Plain Lady book, a sexology book written thousands of years ago in ancient China by an unknown author, demonstrating various traditional positions for having sex and promoting healing. But these books do not show how to channel the energy. At the time this book became available, the Taoist system of channeling energy was not available to the general public, but remained a secret taught only verbally to the Emperor and a few others who were not permitted to put it into writing.

We feel today that the time is right to teach people how to benefit from this transformed energy, or Healing Love, because many people misuse their sexual energy, hurting themselves and others.

Our purpose in writing this book is to help people benefit from the channeling of this energy.

2. Sexual Organs are the Roots of Life.

The Taoist system regards the sexual organs as the roots of life, connected to all other glands and organs. Once you begin to practice the methods taught in this book, you will begin to feel the close relationship of the glands and organs, especially the pineal and pituitary glands, kidneys, liver, lungs, and heart.

3. Energizing all the Organs and Glands

The ovaries have a close connection with the sexual organs, and by properly channeling their energy using certain lovemaking and hand positions, we can learn to use sexual healing energy to vitalize our entire systems. There are hundreds of lovemaking positions and hand gestures. The purpose of a position is to stimulate, according to reflexes, and to energize all the internal organs. These positions help only if the energy channel through which you move the energy upward is open; otherwise, the lovemaking positions and hand gestures will not have much meaning. The exercises described in this book are part of the Healing Love practice: however to a certain extent, they can also stand alone as guidelines to your own sexual practice. In particular the Anus Chi Muscle exercise and the Breast Massage will help you get in touch with your organs' and glands' energy.

4. Exchanging Energy with your Partner

Many couples have used the techniques described here; they are no longer mysterious and they are no longer only in the province of Taoist Masters. These techniques can increase the possibility that you will experience Beyond Orgasm (Valley Orgasm) whenever you have the desire. This is one of the goals of this book.

Synchronizing your breathing with your partner's and then harmonizing your breathing seems to come quite naturally to many people. Lying with noses in proximity, you begin to feel the two breaths be come one. Breathing in and out together is the principal way to begin to build up Chi in both you and your partner: This buildup of Chi can be a relaxing time, or it can be arousing, depending upon your intention.

No doubt you and your partner are both eager to enjoy your sexual pleasures together. Use this book as a tool in learning how to practice and use the Orgasmic Draw in order to multiply your orgasms and bring you both to the point of Valley Orgasm. As you practice the Orgasmic Draw, your partner practices the Big Draw as taught in the companion book Taoist Secrets of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy. These practices will give you both a great deal of energy to share. This energy can be transferred back and forth between you and your partner through your tongues or genitals--each organ acting as a switch to transfer energy between the two channels that complete each one's Microcosmic Orbit. In fact, with practice you will be able to exchange energy in a variety of ways, including over physical distance. Some people will actually feel the energy circulate in their own Microcosmic Orbit and will feel that energy transfer into their partner. Some couples have described the feeling of the energy as a cocoon surrounding them, and some feel the energy between them or above them.

5. Valley Orgasm and Hhw to get there.

Difficult to explain in words, a person must reach a certain level in lovemaking to understand what is meant by Valley Orgasm (Beyond Orgasm). The major sensation is the atmosphere between you and your lover. If you are both in a low mood, or one of you is in a low energy cycle, it becomes difficult to reach this point. Meditating to move the energy in the Microcosmic Orbit will help bring each of you to the same energy level and is most important to the initiation of sexual pleasure. The more you and your partner can meditate and practice the Orgasmic and Big Draw together the more both of you will harmonically tune in to each other.

Practicing such techniques as Tongue Kung Fu, as described in the book Taoist Secrets of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy, will greatly contribute to foreplay and sexual arousal. When you feel you are ready to engage in lovemaking, and have built up sexual arousal substantially you can begin to use the Orgasmic Draw, while your partner uses the Big Draw. After each Orgasmic or Big Draw, the energy starts to move between you, fusing you into an energetic or meditative state that can make you both feel connected and simultaneously experience a cosmic tranquility. You can understand how difficult it is to describe this state; it is similar to describing what meditation feels like. You must experience it yourself. In order for you and your partner to experience the energy, you must begin with the basic training described in this chapter initially using some external help (i.e., breathing techniques, muscle locks, placing of hands, etc.) to guide you into the internal practice (mind control). We will elaborate on a few lovemaking and hand positions to help you and your partner open the channels faster so that the exchange of Valley Orgasms will be easier.

6. Sexual Organs' Exercise Positions

There are a few basic positions that we use in lovemaking, and from these basic few come hundreds of others. Many simply alter the positions of the legs: one leg up and one leg down, or both legs up, etc. This slight differential accounts for many positions, but as we have emphasized, although certain positions help you to reach a certain area of the sexual organs to stimulate certain reflexes, it is the channeling of the sexual healing energy that is most important. If you cannot channel the energy; these positions and hands gestures are meaningless. The nine basic positions are as follows:

A. Face to Face

(1) The woman lies on her back with the man on top. (Fig. 8.1(a))

(2) The woman lies on her side with her hips twisted so that her pelvis is facing upward. (Fig. 8.1(b))

(3) The man lies on his back with the woman on top. (Fig. 8.1(c))

(4) The man is in a sitting position and the woman sits on his lap. (Fig. 8.1(d))

(5) The man and woman lies on their sides facing each other (Fig. 8.1(e))

B. Back Facing

(1) The woman bends over: supporting herself with her hands and knees, and the man kneels behind her: (Fig. 8.2(a))

(2) The man lies on his back, while the woman is on her knees facing his feet. (Fig. 8.2 (b))

(3) The man sits up, and the woman sits on his lap facing his feet. (Fig. 8.2(c))

(4) The man and woman lies on their sides with the man facing the woman's back. (Fig. 8.2(d))

Fig. 8.1 Face-to-Face Positions

Fig. 8.2 Back-Facing

The basic principle is that the one who moves is the one who brings healing to the other while the one who does not move receives the healing. The inactive person can easily concentrate. When the mind is quiet, this partner will be able to feel his or her partner's sexual healing energy.

7. Hand Gestures link the Meridians of the Fingers and Toes with their Corresponding Organs.

The hands and feet are the outer extremities of the body and they are linked to the organs, glands and nervous system through a system of meridians, or energy routes, through which the energy of the organs and glands flows. Finger gestures have been used frequently in the ritual Taoist practices and are most useful to join the circuit and channel the energy through the meridians.

In lovemaking we stimulate and increase the sexual healing energy to flow through the subtle meridian channels. If we do not direct the energy back from the extremities, the energy can leak out through the hands and feet. Knowing the fingers' and toes' corresponding meridians can help to develop the ability to channel the outward flow of energy back through the meridians to the area you choose to direct it.

There are hundreds of hand gestures used in various other systems. If you are not trained and familiar with their usage, you will not be able to discern their power, although many people claim to have such ability. Some people spend a lot of time learning many gestures which in actuality have similar uses or only one use. When careful study is made, there are only a few basic hand positions that are effective. The simplest ones are the most useful; however the most important factor is the energy flow, not the simplicity.

A. Fingers and their Corresponding Organs

The fingers correspond to certain organs as described below and this connection influences bodily functions.

(1) The thumbs correspond to the lungs meridian (Fig. 8-3(a));

(2) The index fingers correspond to the large intestine meridian (Fig. 8-3(b)):

(3) The middle fingers correspond to the pericardium meridian (Fig. 8-3 (b)):

(4) The ring fingers correspond to the triple warmer meridian (Fig. 8-3(b)):

Fig. 8.3 Fingers and Corresponding Organs

(5) The pinkie fingers correspond to the heart and small intestine meridian. (Fig. 8-3(a) and (b)).

B. The toes correspond to specific organs

The toes also correspond to specific organs, thereby affecting the body's functions. (Fig. 8.4)

(1) The big toes correspond to the liver and spleen meridian;
(2) The second toes correspond to the stomach meridian;
(3) The fourth toes correspond to the gall bladder meridian;
(4) The small toes correspond to the bladder meridian.

B. Descriptions of Positions and Hand Gestures for Healing Love

1. Love Making Positions

According to the Plain Lady book mentioned above (also called Shu Nu Ching, or White Madame), there are eight healing positions for men and seven for women. All these positions are helpful to heighten the lovemaking experience, but their most important function is healing: through the use of the energy that is generated. Since the Plain Lady, book does not teach moving energy, a process which requires meditation practice, all the positions described in that book for healing have to be practiced many times a day for many days to reap any benefits. In the sexual healing energy practice we are describing here, we began, with such energy practices as Ovarian Breathing, the Orgasmic Upward Draw, the Egg Exercise, etc., all of which assist you in gaining control of your sexual energy and directing the energy to the place that you designate without merely depending upon reflexes and the positions used.

Although we will describe in detail only two positions, these two positions can be used to benefit both partners. As both partners alternately move, they alternately bring Chi to the area, gland or organ of his or her partner: Remember the basic principle is that the one who moves is the one who brings healing to the other while the one who does not move can easily quiet the mind and concentrate to feel and receive the partner's sexual healing energy.

Once you master the energy and can direct the energy as you wish using the mind and some muscles, the positions and gestures will not be very important.

A. Man on Top Position (Fig. 8.5)

This is the most common of the lovemaking positions. The woman lies on her back with her legs spread. She may have a pillow under her buttocks to raise her pelvis. The man lies flat on top of the woman or supports some or all of his weight on his elbows, hands or knees. Remember the Taoist theory that men are like fire and women are like water: Fire is easy to light, or is activated faster and burns easily, as most men usually become active sexually initially and seem aggressive. A woman, like water may be passive in the beginning, and usually needs to be moved to lovemaking by a man. So in the beginning of lovemaking, it is beneficial for the woman to lies on her back and the man to use foreplay to bring the woman to the boiling point. Once a woman is active and aroused, she should play an active, or aggressive, part also by such activities as kissing him, playing with his tongue and ears, and holding and massaging his penis. All these activities will create a sense of harmony. Ordinarily the couple will then first move into the basic position, and then continue with other positions, most likely ending up in the basic man on top position again.

Fig. 8.5 Man on Top Position

8. Benefits of the Man on Top Position

There are benefits to this position.

(1) First, the entire systems of both the woman and man become energized. The Plain Lady book recommends practicing three sets of nine shallow penetrations and one deep penetration three times a day for twenty days. (The nine shallow thrusts stimulate the plexus of nerves surrounding the woman's G-Spot and are best for exchanging sexual energies, while the deep thrust forces air out of the vagina, creating a vacuum inside the woman during the nine shallow thrusts that follow. This has a very stimulating effect on the woman.) In many years of experience in teaching and practice, we have found that both partners can be energied in one extended lovemaking session in which sexual healing energy is brought directly to the organs and glands. We stress the importance of the man not ejaculating and thus losing the energy. In this more passive position it is easy for the woman to draw and direct the healing energy up the spine, as she learned to do in Single Cultivation practicing the Orgasmic Upward Draw, and then down the front channel. In this way she will be able to guide the sexual healing energy to her organs and eventually through her partner's Orbit to his organs.

(2) Secondly, the face to face position is greatly satisfying to the senses and emotions. It permits all five sensory organs of both partners to come in contact: the tongues, ears, eyes, mouths, noses, and all hair and skin. These senses, especially the tongues and eyes, are the major carriers of life-force energy. We have mentioned that the tongue works like a switch. Once you have completed the Microcosmic Orbit by using the connective tongue, the Chi flows through the tongue. As you kiss and move your tongue to touch your partner or his tongue touches your sensory organs, you can feel those senses become stimulated which, in turn, stimulate the flow of energy from your corresponding organs.

(3) In this position it is easy for the woman and man to help each other open or clear their Microcosmic Orbit channels easily by moving a hand to the point that needs the energy flow.

(4) This position also gives a woman the greatest stimulation. Her clitoris is stimulated, and the man is able to reach her G-Spot. The weight of the man on top gives pressure to the woman's pubic bone, as well as to her breasts, and these pressures will help the woman become stimulated much faster.

(5) The woman can follow rhythmically by wriggling her hips, bumping and grinding in response to the pressure of the man as he presses down and thrusts inside. These movements create a certain kind of Chi pressure in the organs and glands, doubling the Chi in the cavities of the body, thereby permitting the energy to circulate much faster and exchange more easily.

(6) In this position, the farther up in the air the woman legs are, the deeper the penetration the man can accomplish in his thrusting, making this a particularly good position for a couple trying for a pregnancy. It is important, however to make sure that the uterus is not penetrated.

Fig. 8.6 Woman on Top Position

C. Woman on Top Position (Fig. 8.6)

Known as the sixth position in the Plain Lady book, the position with the woman on top will help to increase blood circulation.

As we live our modern lives, we have a tendency to overeat fatty foods which cause the blood to clot and settle in certain parts of the organs. This clotting causes a slow-down of the blood flow and creates a situation in which heat cannot be released or circulated to a cooler part of the body where the temperatures can be exchanged. The temperature of the whole body rises, resulting in an overheating of the organs. During lovemaking when we generate sexual, organ, and gland energy and fuse them into a very special kind of energy which we call Love's Special Energy, a harmonic fusion occurs which helps to dissolve these blood clots. The kidneys and liver play the major role in this work.

In this position, the man can easily pull sexual energy to the kidneys and liver. When the woman is on top, the woman is freer to be active and so it is easy for her to direct the stimulation of the vagina and clitoris and maintain a certain angle to her sexual organs in a way that only she knows will stimulate her. Therefore, this position can help a woman with menstrual problems, such as cramps, most of which are caused by insufficient blood circulation in the ovaries and cervix. By directly stimulating the sexual glands, the clitoris, and the G-Spot, and pulling the sexual healing energy directly to the ovaries and cervix, the problem can be alleviated.

To attain this position the man lies on his back and the woman, on her knees and facing him, lowers herself onto his erect penis. Either the man or woman can guide the penis into the vagina. Couples may start in this position or arrive at it by rolling over from the man on top or the side by side position. Begin with the man in motion in order for the woman to receive the healing energy and reach the boiling point. Embrace each other making sure you do not bend the penis or let it slip out of the vagina.

D. Benefits and Drawbacks of the Woman on Top Position

There are both good and bad points to this position.

(1) The woman on top makes the woman experience a more active role, a sense of superiority, a free feeling of movement, and a sense of doing whatever she wishes. This helps to make the woman more open to the world and able to better understand men. Some women become tense when they consider that men try to rule the world in every respect. However it is the rule of nature that Yin and Yang must be balanced. In every situation women play an equally important role. In Taoism we regard timing as very important. When the Yang is too extreme, the Yin takes over. When the Yin is too extreme, the Yang takes over. Likewise, during the beginning of sex the man is on top to arouse the woman, because he, like fire, is aroused more easily than the woman. Once the woman is aroused, she will assume the top position to arouse the man. In this way the roles are interchangeable.

In the top position the woman can experience putting the penis into her vagina, and can take as long as she desires to insert it to give the feeling of prolonged genital sensitivity. Both will feel the gentleness of the slowly spreading vagina as the penis is inserted.

(2) The woman can direct the glans of the penis to stimulate it in the most sensitive way by placing it only in the two inches that form the outer vagina. It is difficult for a man to remain in only the first two inches. The man tends to want to plunge deeper into the tighter area which alleviates his anticipation, but which also, because of its tightness, makes him finish fast.

The woman receives the sexual healing energy by permitting the man to do the thrusting as she guides his penis to the area she would like to have stimulated. In this position the man or woman can use their hands to stimulate the clitoris which will help the woman reach the boiling point faster.

(3) The man can enjoy the stimulation of liver energy by using his eyes to watch the expression of the aroused woman, her face and her breasts, and see the sexual organs in contact, moving in and out of each other. Once the eyes are stimulated, the man can bring the sexual energy to the liver by slightly contracting the right size of the anus. The woman can use her free hand to arouse her nipples, or her partner's nipples. This will greatly stimulate both partners' organs and glands.

(4) The woman on top is a good position for the later months of pregnancy since it allows intercourse without her growing belly getting in the way. It is also good for the man who has a big stomach in relieving the pressure since, during the sexual act, the stomachs will meet first rather than the sex organs. Older men, and men who have heart problems, are also helped by this position since the man does not expend vigorous energy Because the man can be less active, he can easily guide the energy to strengthen the heart.

(5) The woman on top has to be very careful that she does not move too vigorously which may bend and hurt the erect penis. This type of injury takes a long time to heal. Make sure that the penis has a full erection. If the penis becomes soft, start with slow movements to build up again to the high energy point. When the penis is soft, or during vigorous thrusting, the penis can slip out or half-way out of the vagina, and this is when it can get hurt easily

2. Traditional Lovemaking Positions and Healing

The following are a few classic lovemaking and healing positions as outlined in the Plain Lady book. We list these positions for your reference only. With a properly opened energy channel you can guide the energy to heal yourself as you wish at any time and in any position, so it does not matter at all how many positions you use. For the most part you can use the few basic positions as outlined and change them into hundreds of positions. We want you to concentrate on the energy, not on the positions or gestures. Practice will help you to understand the energy. Many people like to read and listen to philosophy but if they do not practice and experience it, they find it very difficult to understand. Working on the energy is the best way to experience the higher spiritual work.

There are several positions of healing for men and women. Remember that when the man is more active, he gives the healing. The woman lies still to receive it, quieting her mind to feel the energy., and using her concentration to guide the energy only for the purpose and to the place she needs healing. When the man lies still, the woman does the healing.

Fig. 8.7 First Position is for Healing.

A. The First Position is for Healing (Fig. 8.7).

The first position is for healing, supplying energy for women who are experiencing any kind of menstrual problem, such as cramps or excessive bleeding, loss of feeling in the vagina, or any other female problem. The woman, lying on either side or on her back with her legs spread wide open, has the task simply to maintain that position and receive the healing energy of the man who is accommodating her position with his own and is penetrating. Practice up to two sets of nine penetrations in this position per day for fifteen days.

Fig. 8.8 Second Position is for Energizing the Body and Healing the Sexual Organs.

B. The Second Position is for energizing the body and healing the sexual organs. (Fig. 8.8)

Position number two is for energizing the body, and is especially beneficial to those who suffer from low energy. By healing the female sexual organs, the basic energizing organs of the body, general weakness and lack of energy will be improved. To achieve this position, the woman lies on her back with her head and shoulders supported by a big pillow, and the legs spread wide apart. This position tilts the head forward and tends to curve the vaginal channel. The man enters from the front, penetrating in three sets of nine, three times a day for twenty days.

Fig. 8.9 Third Position is for Strengthening all the Internal Organs

C. Position Three is for strengthening all the Internal Organs .(Fig. 8.9)

The third position is for healing and strengthening all the internal organs. The woman lies on either side with both legs held together and bent backward from the knees. The man, lying in front of her: penetrates from the front, performing four sets of nine penetrations up to four times a day for twenty days.

D. Position Four is for Healing Bone Problems.(Fig. 8.10)

The fourth position is for healing any kind of bone problems, such as bone weakness. In addition to helping speed up the healing process of broken bones, this position also alleviates circulatory system problems and heals arthritis. (One cause of arthritis, according to Chinese medicine, is bad circulation.) By increasing metabolism and thereby circulation, the risk of disease of the bone marrow, or leukemia, is also lessened. To attain this position, the woman lies on her left side with the left leg bent backward as far as possible, and her right leg stretched out straight and free. The man faces the woman to penetrate, practicing five sets of nine penetrations, up to five times a day for ten days.

For weakness in the bones and joints and circulation problems, the woman lies on the left side with the left bent backwards as far as possible. The right leg should be straight. the man lies on his right side facing the woman, penetrating gently in a rhythm of nine.

Fig. 8.10 Fourth Position is for Healing Bone Problems.

E. The Fifth Position heals Blood Vessel Problems. (Fig. 8.11)

Position number five is for any kind of blood vessel problem, such as varicose veins, hardening of the arteries, high or low blood pressure, or blood clots. Excessive blood clotting, practically ignored in Western medicine, is a very important part of the theory of pathology in Chinese medicine, and is treated as a kind of blood disease. The position is the same as the fourth position, except it is executed with the woman on her right side in six sets of nine penetrations, up to six times a day for ten days.

For blood vessel problems, varicose veins, hardening of the arteries and high blood pressure, the woman lies on her right side with the right leg bent back as far as possible. the left leg is straight while the man penetrates, moving in a rhythm of nine

Fig. 8.11 Fifth Position Heals Blood Vessel Problems

For increasing blood production, high blood pressure or other blood-related problems, the man lies on his back while the woman sits on top facing him. The woman remains passive while the man moves.

Fig. 8.12 Sixth Position increases Blood Count.

F. Position Six increases Blood Count. (Fig. 8.12)

This position is for generating and building more blood, especially in those who lack the capacity for generating new blood, such as a woman who bleeds excessively or is anemic. It is also beneficial in stabilizing blood pressure. For this position the man is on his back in a relaxed position and the woman is upright, facing him, on her knees and on top of him. She does not move; it is the man who moves up and down beneath her: The woman must spread her legs appropriately to be able to hold this position properly.

G. Position Seven is for Lymphatic System Problems.(Fig. 8.13)

This position improves the functioning of the lymphatic system.The man again lies on his back and relaxes while the woman kneels over him facing toward his feet on her hands and knees. the man penetrates and moves in this position. The woman can move slightly if she chooses, but basically it is the man who is giving the healing.

For problems related to the lymphatic system, the man lies on his back, the woman over him on her knees. The woman remains still, while the man moves in sets of nine.

Fig. 8.13 Seventh Position is for Lymphatic System Position.

H. Position Eight is to tone the entire Body. (Fig. 8.14)

This position is for healing the body in general. It is a difficult position. The woman is on her knees and bending all the way over backwards, as far back as she can go. The farther she can bend and the closer she comes to a backbend, the more ideal. If it is impossible to go very far, use a pillow to prop yourself up, and bend as far back as you can without hurting yourself, spreading the legs wide enough so that the man can penetrate from the front. He performs most of the movement.

For all-purpose healing the woman should lie on her back with the legs bent at the knees and the back flat on the bed. The man penetrates from the front, moving in sets of nine.

Fig. 8.14 Eighth Position is to tone the Entire Body.

I. Position Nine is for lack of Energy. (Fig. 8.15)

This position is for those who feel weak all the time, have blurry eyes, perspire frequently and profusely often feel faint, experience fast heartbeats, or any similar symptoms. During contact in this position, the woman is basically the one who moves, rotating her hips in a circular pattern, and it is she who does the healing. If the man becomes too excited and in danger of ejaculating, the woman has to rest for a while. The man can perform the, Big Draw to regain control or rest so that he does not ejaculate. The woman is on her back, and the man, leaning on his hands so as not to put all of his weight on her penetrates from the front as deeply as possible. This will allow enough room for the woman to rotate, first nine times in a clockwise direction, resting, rotating nine times in a counterclockwise direction, and then resting again. If it is comfortable, she can rotate all the way around. She is doing the work, and should continue to do so until she feels she has generated enough energy. This can be practiced nine times a day for ten days.

Fig. 8.15 Nine Position is for Lack of Energy.

J. Position Ten heals the Sexual Glands and Organs, the Endocrine Glands, the Pancreas and Liver. (Fig. 8.16)

This position helps to heal and improve the functioning of the sexual glands, sexual organs, endocrine glands and liver. It is particularly good for those suffering from diabetes. For this position the woman lies on her back and wraps her legs around the man's thighs, not his buttocks or back. The man penetrates shallowly an inch and a half using only the head of the penis. The woman rotates her hips both clockwise and counterclockwise for nine times and then rests. Initially she can rotate nine times in one direction and then rest, and then return nine times in the opposite direction and rest.

Fig. 8.17 Sacral Pump Energy Point

3. Basic Hand Positions to Energize the Body. (Fig. 8.17)

Using hands to assist in the circulation of sexual healing energy in the Microcosmic Orbit to energize the system is one of the most important aids in this Taoist practice. During lovemaking the more you can extend and draw an orgasm upward rather than outward, by performing the Orgasmic Draw while your male partner uses the Big Draw to draw in his own sexual healing and control the loss of semen, the more the sexual energy can be increased. At this point if we can guide the energy flow into the proper channels, the benefit will be tremendous.

There are distinctions among our different energy centers which expand as our awareness expands. As we open ourselves up and discover these distinctions, we open ourselves to their possibilities. It is important to realize that even when you keep yourself open to recognize the distinctions as they exist in you, others may recognize some you may not be aware of. Do not let your ego limit you. As your awareness expands, it is the quality of your maturing awareness that makes the distinctions. Working at something to develop awareness of it and being able to make distinctions are what opens up a subject for us.

The first area in which you begin to feel the energy is in the sex centers, which, as you have learned, are located differently in men and women. In males it is found at the base of the penis and the pubic bone area, while in females, in the Ovarian Palace. When the sex center is not activated and becomes “closed,” many different sexual difficulties arise, as well as feelings of self-destructiveness, self-hatred, a negative attitude and orientation toward life, low or no energy or enthusiasm, and listlessness. The feeling is agitated and lazy at the same time. This all promotes violent behavior. Bring your attention to this area and radiate, like the sun radiates, your sexual energy from your organs. When energy begins to move and the sex center begins to open up, the sense is one of creative and personal power with the ability to get things done. There is an appreciation for fun and pleasure in life, and vitality.

The perineum area has the characteristics of being grounded, solid, and peaceful when it is open, resulting in a certainty and a security within ourselves and a security within change. When it is closed, there is paranoia, or fear of change. Feeling insecure, wishy-washy, fickle, upset or lonely are the sensations experienced. During the process of your practice, when energy is stuck there, you can feel shaking, jerking or chills. Radiate your sexual energy down into the perineum and create a star or sun glowing there that is beautiful. Feel grounded, solid, peaceful, filled with certainty and the ability to be secure within change. You are now ready to bring the sexual energy to the first energizing point.

A. Sacral Pump Energy Point

As you or your partner approach orgasm and you practice your respective Draws, exchange the excess Yin and Yang energies and feel the orgasm move upward. Lie still and quiet for a moment, embracing each other and put both of your palms on your partner's buttocks, with the fingers touching the crest of the buttocks, and the palms covering the buttocks toward the sacrum. (Fig. 8.17) The man should do the same to the woman in each of these exercises. Feel the sexual healing energy from your partner's hands pass to your buttocks and give you assistance in raising your own sexual healing energy up the spine. At the same time slightly pull up the vagina and the front part of the anus, and then pull up the middle and back part of the anus to draw up the sexual healing energy, to the Sacral Pump. Feel a warmth and tingling in the sacrum, or other sensations as this point opens up.

Enjoy this moment of peace. Feel the tension and stress begin to melt away in the legs, hips, pelvis, chest and head as you radiate this point. Think of this point as the place containing rootedness to past and present that goes down into the legs, connecting with the nerves there. When it is closed, the past seems a prison, housing unconscious fears and hopelessness that things will remain as they always have been, never improving. Sense and radiate at this point all the treasures in your past that will become your resource, and the blossoming of all your deep potentials as they become part of your daily living, balancing you in time and space. The feeling is often wide because the energy is awake everywhere. Here is the place where we can blend the earth energy, sexual energy and refined energy. Take as long as you wish to enjoy this point.

Fig. 8.18 Kidneys' Energy Point

B. Kidneys' Energy Point

When the feeling in the sexual organs subsides, the energy flow is low and you can resume lovemaking, building up to the height of sexual healing energy. Perform the Orgasmic and Big Draw again, exchange the excess Yin and Yang energies, and embrace again in stillness. Both partners should now place their hands and palms on the other's left and right hips with the fingers touching each other on the hips, and the palms covering the hips and facing toward the kidneys and adrenal glands. (Fig. 8.18) These points are key energy sources. At the same time slightly pull up the front, middle, and back parts of the anus and bring the sexual-healing energy up to the Door of Life point (located opposite the navel between Lumbar 2 and Lumbar 3). Hold the energy at this point for a while, then slightly pull up the left and right part of the anus, bringing more energy directly to the kidneys. Wrap the sexual energy around the kidneys like a cocoon, and then pack the energy into the kidneys.

The Taoist system regards the kidneys as transformers. When the kidneys are strong, they fill with Chi pressure, enabling them to perform the very important task of cleaning out the toxins and waste materials which have become embedded in the cells. Once the toxins are cleaned out, the cells will energize. Taoists also regard the kidneys and each kidney's surrounding area as the places where prenatal energy (our principal energy) and sexual essences are stored. The refined foods, pollution, toxins, etc., of modern life gradually deplete the kidneys as a source of energy. Energy depletion from the kidneys, blockage of energy flow, or a closing of the kidney point are believed to be major causes of many disturbances, such as back pain, imbalance, depression, the feeling of being taken advantage of and fear.

(1) Excessive loss of semen creates fear.

Excessive loss of sperm energy drains the kidneys. This depletion is the major reason for fear in men, causing them to lose confidence in sex and in life, not an uncommon situation for men in today's world. Using sexual stimulants creates a speedy depletion of a man's sexual energy, similar to trying to pour gasoline onto old half-burned wood; you only speed up and use up the vital energy stored in the body that is so necessary to life. If your partner ejaculates, holding him at these specific kidney points will be the most important way to revitalize him, thereby helping him to recover lost energy much faster than any kind of drug or sexual stimulant.

Holding your partner's little fingers can also help to overcome this fear. The little fingers are the beginning and ending of the heart and small intestine meridian. When the kidneys generate fear, this fear will first affect the adrenal glands, and these glands will stimulate hormones that affect the heart, thereby increasing the meridian energy, a condition that can tilt the whole system off balance. Holding the little fingers will regulate the flow and balance of energy. In this way your partner can recover his confidence, and give his heart to you. Remember that lovemaking is caring about each other. If he cares about you, you must care about him.

When the kidney point is open and radiating, there is a sense of openness, generosity, abundance and balance. All fears are outshone in that radiance.

Fig. 8.19 Adrenal Glands Point at T-11

C. Adrenal Glands Point at T-11

When you feel that the sexual energy is low, resume lovemaking to the point of high energy. Next move the energy up to the rejuvenation energy center or Thoracic-11 (T-11), located at the spinal joint of the two lowest floating ribs. You and your partner should put the heel of both palms on each of these lowest ribs with the palms covering between the second and third lumbar vertebrae. (Fig. 8.19) These areas are where the kidneys are located, above which the adrenals rest. The adrenal glands, located on a long muscular band which can be felt along the entire back in this area, secrete certain hormones to increase the growth and vital force of the trillions of cells of the body. It is the adrenal glands that will make cells last longer and stay younger.

Our modern lives abound with tremendous stress. We are fearful on the streets, in planes, and in the working place. We are burdened with all kinds of excitement, such as the stimulation of television or radio commercials constantly trying to sell more things to us. All of this stress depletes the adrenal glands' function, and this depletion locks the adrenal glands' point and becomes the main cause of hypertension, listlessness, depression, sadness, frustration, insomnia, and low-key performance.

To bring the sexual energy to the adrenal glands, slightly pull up the front, middle, and back of the anus, and thus the Chi Muscle. Pull the sexual energy up to T-11 and feel the energy there. Then contract the left and right anus and pull up more energy to the kidneys and the adrenal glands. Wrap and pack the energy there, and feel the warm sexual energy vitalize the glands. Remember that these exercises can be performed simultaneously by both partners.

When the adrenal glands' point is open, you will feel energetic, confident, filled with a sense of vitality, and the ability to get things accomplished.

Fig. 8.20 Liver and Spleen Point

D. Liver and Spleen Energy Point

The fourth Upward Draw (or Big Draw for your partner) energizing point is the liver and spleen point, situated at the ninth and tenth ribs and on the muscular band just below the scapulae. Put your fingers on the scapulae with the middle of the palms immediately below the lower tip of the scapulae. (Fig. 8.20) As you cover this area, feel your Chi energy activate your partner's energy Slightly contract the front, middle, back and then the left and right sides of the anus, and bring your own energy up to the liver and spleen, continuing up to the point between the scapulae. The liver is the main storage house of energy and contains the capacity for natural beauty. The liver and spleen energy point, when open, provides a sense of freedom and the ability to take risks for ourselves and others. Opening this energy point and radiating energy there can also help to relieve anger, panic, worry and anxiety, fears of the past, back pain, release the tension of the diaphragm, generate deeper breaths, and improve digestion. You might release gas and begin to yawn a great deal as your digestive system is clearing itself. You sense an opening to the present moment.

In the beginning you can practice drawing upward to one or two points only. When you are more advanced, all of these upward contractions will become more automatic, and eventually you will be able to energize the whole line of points at once. Do not, however confuse the points with the actual organs. These points simply correspond to the organs.

Fig. 8.21 Heart and Lungs' Point

E. Heart and Lungs' Point

The fifth Upward Draw (or Big Draw) point is the heart and lungs energizing point, located between the fourth and fifth ribs. Feel the crest of the scapulae and follow each scapula down to the center point between them at the spinal cord, opposite the heart center. Use your palms to cover the area between the scapulae and the spinal cord. (Fig. 8.21) Feel your energy pass to your partner and your partner's energy pass to you. Slightly contract the front, middle, back, left and right parts of the anus, and bring the sexual energy to the lungs and heart. Be very careful in pulling the energy to the heart and lungs since excess energy at these points can cause pain in the chest. The completion of the Microcosmic Orbit is very helpful in preventing such congestion. The Healing Sounds of the heart and lungs are also helpful in relieving congestion, as are brushing-down with the palms or stroking or tapping the chest. (See the book Taoist Ways to Transform Stress into Vitality for an elaboration of the Six Healing Sounds).

In addition to chest pains the heart center, when closed, leaves us with a feeling of ignorance of our real relationship to things. We may feel sorry for ourselves, unloved, and incapable of love. We often feel under attack. We can feel overwhelmed, rushed, cruel, arrogant and lonely. Usually the worst feeling is one of unworthiness or lack of deserving. When that heart center is open, we feel sunshine from the inside. We have a sense of joy and love that is sometimes a floating sensation. In all of our meditations it is important to fill our hearts with loving, smiling energy, because when we feel love, we are truly related to all things. There is a sense of honor and respect. When open this point will also help to increase circulation and improve respiration, which will quickly energize the entire body. It can help to relieve upper back pain, shoulder: neck and arm tensions and pains, and provide a way to recover from tiredness. Allow this energy to circulate through your being to create the feeling of gratitude that will be the catalyst for all your spiritual work and enlightenment.

F. C-7 Point

The sixth energizing point is the C-7 point, the largest protrusion of the spinal column located at the junction of the shoulder and the base of the neck. This point controls all the tendons of the body. The Taoists regard this as the great union point of the Chi flow connecting the hands, head and spine. Opening and connecting this point is very important to the practices of Healing Hand Kung Fu, Iron Shirt Chi Kung, and Tai Chi Chi Kung. (A description of these practices can be found in the last chapter of this book entitled The Universal Tao System: Courses Given in Various Centers). Place your left hand on C-7 and the right hand on the sacrum. (Fig. 8.22) Contract and bring the sexual energy up to this point.

Fig. 8.22 C-7 Point

The C-7 energy point, when it is closed, stirs within us the feeling of denial of our connectedness, as if we stand as individuals against the rest of the world. It also creates the feeling of being inappropriate and ill-fitting, or not being in the right place. It is demonstrated in a stubborn viewpoint, while at the same time being burdened by our inappropriateness. As the point opens up and radiates the energy, the experience is as though a mantle is being draped from our necks down onto our arms, giving us the ability to embrace each other in our humanity, opening our viewpoints and flexibility, our appropriateness, manifested in the feeling of connectedness. As the feeling spreads farther down our arms to our hands, we become mote aware of the healing ability in our palms.

Fig. 8.23 Neck Point

G. Neck Point

The seventh energizing point is located at the middle of the back of the neck, between the third and fourth cervical vertebrae. Use your left palm to cover this point and the right palm to cover the sacrum as you slightly contract the front, middle, and back parts of the anus. (Fig. 8.23) (There is no need to contract the left and right parts.) Bring the energy to the neck and feel the neck energize. The neck is the busiest traffic area in the body. All the controls of the body including all emotions, are signaled from the brain and pass through this “bottleneck.” When under stress and emotional strain, the neck begins to accumulate and jam with tension.

The neck is the passageway of many meridians channeling the organs’ Chi energy to and from higher centers. In the middle of the neck runs the Governor Channel, while the bladder, triple warmer and large intestine meridians travel along the sizes of the neck. Emotions, generating from the organs (anger from the liver fear from the kidneys and bladder, grief from the lungs and large intestine.

hastiness from the heart and the small intestine, and worry from the spleen, stomach, and pancreas) “jam” in the neck causing the neck to be stiff.

Oftentimes when your partner has lost too much sexual energy, it will result in an increase in tension, creating a greater emotional “jamming” in the neck. As a result your partner will be easily angered, fearful, and frustrated. The neck point is a marvelous place to release the tensions arid emotions of your partner. Hold this point gently.

There is no need to contract the anus, just hold your partner and mentally guide the sexual healing energy to melt the tensions and emotions away. You can lightly massage to help release the tension. This will increase your partner’s relaxation tremendously

Fig. 8.24 Base of the Skull (Jade Pillow) Energizing Point

H. Jade Pillow Energizing Point

The eighth energizing point, the Jade Pillow, is located between C-1 and the base of the skull (the occipital bone) in a little hollow between two muscle bands and outsize of the spinal column. Embrace your partner quietly and place your left palm over the base of the skull on the hollow place, with the right palm over his sacrum. (Fig. 8-24) Feel the heat that is generated as the sexual healing energy passes to your partner while your partner’s energy passes to you. There is no need to contract the anus. Use your concentration to direct your energy to melt tension and clear the mind.

Radiating the energy in the Jade Pillow will impart to you a sense of being able to draw inspiration in. This point is connected very much with our breathing, as well as a part of the brain that is located there. When it is blocked, the sensation is of a burden that is suffocating you. As you guide sexual energy to this point, and the energy accumulates there, you can work out this block. The brain revitalizes, the mind clears, consciousness increases, and memory improves. There is a limitless feeling as of a sky. As it opens, breathing becomes easier and an inspirational sensation occurs, as if something beyond our imagination can enter and operate through us. Rest your attention at this point, quieting the mind, and look into the spaciousness and luminosity. This point also influences the eyes, ears, nose and mouth.

I. Crown Energizing Point

The ninth point, at the top of the head above the mid-brain, is called the crown point (the Pai-Hui, or GO-20), and is the seat of the pineal body. Its functions are related to sensitivity and the sexual cycle. The crown point governs hearing, body rhythms, equilibrium, the perception of light through the eyes and skin, and is the superior counter support of the brain and spinal cord. In Chinese it is called the “Hundred Point Joint:”.

When the crown energy point is closed, we do not feel in charge of our lives, but rather out of control and reckless. We are filled with delusions and pride, and experience erratic mood swings and headaches. When the crown is open, we are guided by higher forces. We radiate happiness, blossoming like a flower giving off a fragrance. We rule over our own expression and experience.

In the latter part of the higher Taoist practice, this point serves as a compass directing a person’s soul and spirit to the place where he or she is eventually supposed to go. Once this point is fully developed, you will see a clear creative light, giving direction and sustenance to your spirit body.

Once you reach this higher level of sexual healing energy, very slightly pull up the front, middle and back of the anus and the Chi Muscle, and bring the Chi to the top of the head. (Fig. 8-25) Assist this movement by looking up with your eyes while concentrating on the highest point. In the beginning you might feel pressure or a sense of expansion in the middle of the head. This is an indication of energy reaching this point. Use your mind, your eyes and all the senses to move the energy in a clockwise motion, circulating it nine: eighteen, twenty-four, or thirty-six times, depending upon how you feel.

Fig. 8.25 Crown Energizing Point

Again it is important to emphasize the opening of the Microcosmic Orbit. With the Orbit open, you will easily be able to guide the sexual healing energy up to the top of the head, and when energy has filled this point, it will overflow, pouring down to the middle of the eyebrows where the pituitary gland is housed. The Taoists regard this point as the "Original Cavity of the Spirit." The crown energizing point houses the master endocrine control gland, the pineal gland, regulating growth, gonadal, adrenal and thyroid functions.

J. Third Eye Point

The third eye point, located between the eyes in the center of the forehead, radiates like sunshine, or the opening of a flower as the sexual energy flows down from the top of the head to this area. When the forehead is open there is a sense of purpose, a direct and simple knowledge, an intuitive wisdom and sense of direction in life. A sense of your own personal being emerges. As the positive energy accumulates there and ripens, you smell fragrances, taste the nectar trickling down onto the tongue, or see a beautiful, blue pearl. When closed, the feeling is of the mind wandering and indecisive, fickle, and often agitated. An internal dialogue of self-criticism and invalidation continues endlessly. When this center is closed, you feel you have no direct knowledge or perception.

K. Throat Center

From the third eye point, the energy will continue to flow down to the nasal passages, the palate, the tongue, the throat center .The throat center is located at the notch at the base of the throat and top of the sternum. It is a place of communication and change. When open, our expressions flow, both verbal and non-verbal. This point has the power of the word: what you say and what you ask for come about. Openness in that center promotes speech, so that the sentences we use are the ones we live out. An open throat center also brings about lucidity in dreams, the expressions between our souls and our other selves. When the center is closed, you can feel choked up, as with guilt, and you may have difficulty swallowing, as if there were a lump in the throat. You may feel an unwillingness to change. Feel the energy radiate into the throat, as though you are sunbathing there. Let go of all things and all memories of that closed feeling. Feel the throat open and blossom with the power of speech. Be aware of the lucidity in your dreams and a flexibility manifested in your ability to express yourself.

The energy continues to flow down to the heart center again, at the middle of the breast, one inch from the lower end of the sternum. This heart center point is a very important point in the woman's practice. It is the seat of energy transformation, and thus the seat of healing and loving energy in a woman. From the heart point the energy will flow down to the solar plexus, and then down to the navel.

L. Navel Center

As the navel center opens, we feel a sense of balance, equanimity and centeredness, of allowing ourselves to be as we are, and everything else to be as it is, which takes no effort. The experience is one of mindfulness. An open navel center allows us to let things be, put a value on everything, and feel true abundance. When it is closed, there is a lack of balance and centering. The navel center is a storage place for excess energy, and so is a storage place for the energy of our work. As we continue to bring the energy to the navel center the navel naturally centers and opens. As you feel the energy accumulating in the navel, you will find it to be the place of value, the original connection you had with your mother and the place of nourishment as you came into this world. Here we feel the natural abundance of all things.

Try to practice holding one point at a time, and move up one by one in sequence. Do not practice all the points in one session in the beginning. Once you feel that all your partner's channels are open, you can choose the appropriste points to use at that time. Judge by the needs of your partner. Discuss the hand positions ahead of time with your partner describing what you would like to accomplish, and share the entire book with him so that he can understand the practice. Your mutual understanding and working together on the practices described here will result in harmony.

Once you have completely opened your partner's back channel with the help of your hands, you can use the hands to help speed up the flow of sexual energy.

C. Step-By-Step Practice to Balance and Harmonize the Total System

While your sexual organs are in contact with your partner, you are joining with his or her front channel, the Functional Channel. The energy flowing through each one's. Functional Channel is more easily joined when there is sexual arousal. At this time a lot of energy is generated from the organs and glands, and it all flows down to the sexual region. Remember that if you do not redirect it up, the most vital force that your body creates will be lost to the universe, with no benefit to you at all unless your intention is to bear a child.

1. Guide the Aroused Sexual Energy up the Spine.

Begin by guiding the aroused sexual healing energy up the spinal column to the points listed below one at a time with the assistance of the hands. As you become more advanced in the practice, you can put your hands on different points, thereby causing the energy to jump faster.

A. Kidneys' Point

Start with foreplay to bring your partner or your partner to bring you, up to the boiling point. Remember that if the organs, glands and sexual energy are not ready when you engage in lovemaking, there will be less energy to exchange. This can be harmful to the organs, glands, and sex organs. When you feel the sexual healing energy is activated, embrace each other for a while. Then both of you can begin to use your hands simultaneously or one can singularly touch the other if you both choose. Put your right hand on the sacrum with the middle finger touching the tip of the coccyx and the palm covering the sacrum, especially the opening of the sacral hiatus. (Fig. 8.26) Feel the heat being absorbed into the spinal cord as it helps to activate the Sacral Pump which moves the energy upward. Place your left hand on the Door of Life, opposite the navel and between Lumbar 2 and Lumbar 3. Feel the sexual energy moving upward from the sexual region, past the sacrum and up to the kidneys' point. Use the anus muscle to hold and guide the energy up, if necessary At this time you can inhale to pack and wrap the sexual healing energy, bathing the kidneys with healing, creative and generative energy.

Fig. 8.26 Move the Energy to the Kidneys Point.

B. T-11 Point

When you feel the sexual energy level is low, your partner or you should resume a three shallow-one deep, a six shallow-one deep, or a nine shallow-one deep series of penetrations. Taoist Masters discovered the G-Spot many thousands of years ago. In all their manuals on sex they always advised shallow thrusts because the glans, or head, of the man's penis will stimulate the glans, or clitoris, of the woman, and fit right behind the pelvic bone where the G-Spot is. Build the energy to the point in which both of you can exchange the energy. Embrace quietly for a while with the right hand still holding the sacrum, and move the left hand to the T-11, the point of the adrenal glands. (Fig. 8.27) Hold this position until both of you feel the energy move.

Fig. 8.27 Move the Energy to the T-11 Point.

C. Liver and Spleen Point

Repeat the above step, but this time move the left hand to your partner's liver and the spleen point, below and between the scapulae. (Fig. 8.28)

Fig. 8.28 Move the Energy to the Liver and Spleen Point.

Fig. 8.29 Move the Energy to the Heart Point.

D. Heart Point

Repeat step (b) again. After both of you have built up to the height of sexual-healing energy, embrace again. The right hand remains at the sacrum and the left hand moves to the heart point, located opposite the heart center and between the fourth and fifth ribs. (Fig. 8.29)

Fig. 8.30 Move the Energy to the C-7 Point.

E. G-7 Point

Build the sexual energy to its highest point again and embrace. Maintain the position of the right hand and move the left hand to the C-7 point at the base of the neck. (Fig. 8.30) Feel the sexual energy being drawn up, activated toy your partner's palms, the anus Chi Muscle, and the eyes-mind concentration.

Fig. 8.31 Move the Energy to the Jade Pillow Point.

F. Jade Pillow Point

Build up the sexual energy and embrace. The right hand remains on the sacrum. The left hand is moved to the base of the skull.

(Fig. 8.31) When you join this point with the sacrum point, you will activate the Sacral Pump and Cranial Pump, and so will greatly feel the flow of sexual energy. The consistent increase in the activity of these pumps is very important to your health, and mental and spiritual practice.

Fig. 8.32 Move the Energy to the Crown Point.

G. Crown Point

Build up to highest point of sexual energy arousal and embrace, with the right hand remaining on the sacrum. Move the left hand to the top of the crown. (Fig. 8.32) If the channels are well open, you will gradually feel energy flow like a fountain of youth up to the head, and then a sprinkling of the energy in the brain. Once it fills the brain, the energy will shower down the front channel to the tongue, the heart, and then down to the navel.

H. Exchange the energy using the eyes, nose and tongue.

Now look into your partner's eyes. At this point there is a lot of energy in the eyes that can be exchanged. You can feel that you are looking into your partner's soul. His and your eyes, like magnets, draw and pull from each other: At this moment the energy exchange through the eyes and tongue is very deep.

Rub your nose against your partner's nose. Feel a spark of energy jump from one to the other.

Move your tongue into your partner's mouth. Touch his tongue and massage it with your tongue. Feel the sparkling energy pass from your tongue to your partner's tongue. The fragrance of the energy flowing from mouth to mouth, from palate to palate, is beyond words.

The eyes, nose and tongue of each of you help to join and encourage the flow of sexual energy down the front channels. If you and your partner now have a lot of saliva, be sure that you both are in good health before swallowing it.

Fig. 8.33 Body Clock Chart

I. Certain times of the day heighten the Healing effect. (Fig. 8.33)

The Taoists believe that the organs of the body and their corresponding meridians are activated and stimulated during certain times of the day. Since good health exists when there is a complete balance of energy within the organs and meridians of the body, sexual activity being stimulating and energizing when properly done, can further deplete a body that is suffering from an energy imbalance when practiced at a low energy time. Since the sex act leaves a person open and vulnerable to universal energies, it is wise to choose a time when the universal energy will be beneficial.

The best time for sex is in the early morning when your body is well rested. A particularly bad time for sex is in the late evening, especially when you are tired or under emotional stress, because the organs' energy is not strong enough to handle the sexual energy. A nap or rest beforehand is recommended if this is the only time convenient for you.

The hand positions described in this chapter are used in most of the positions that we described previously in this chapter: These positions can help you and your partner stimulate each other in one particular area of the sexual organs to initiate a greater reflex of the organs. But the most important part of the practice is to open the channels so that the sexual energy can abundantly flow directly to the organs and glands to stimulate them as well. Once you master the opening of the channels, you can direct the sexual energy more with your mind and less with your hands, or without using the hands entirely.

Try to practice one position at a time to make sure you both feel the opening of the channels. If you are quite sure you are open, make sure that your partner is also open. If you cannot open your partner's channel, you can send some more of your sexual energy to him, or if you cannot open your channel, your partner can send his sexual energy to you. When a woman sends her sexual energy at this time, as well as during the time of exchanging energy she enhances the lovemaking and helps her partner by squeezing his penis tightly. First she must be sure that her partner is in a safe stage of arousal, or he may ejaculate. Squeeze and hold for a while, then release. (Fig. 8.34)

Exhale and mentally send the sexual energy to the point where your partner needs help, covering it with your palms. With practice you will feel your energy pass more easily through your hands to reach the point that you intended. You will sense the energy, even taste it.

Fig. 8.34 To help the man delay or stop ejaculation, the woman grips tightly with her vagina the head and shaft of the penis.

D. Valley Orgasm

A Valley Orgasm is the means to attaining more pleasure, more healing energy, and more energy to transform into a higher spiritual energy. A Valley Orgasm in a man occurs when he is 99 percent of the way to ejaculation. At this point he pulls out of the vagina and, practices the Big Draw to milk his prostate gland of semen, and rather than release it outwardly, send it in an inward and upward direction where the energy will be transformed. He relaxes, allowing the sexual organs to settle down to approximately a 60 percent arousal, and then he begins again by practicing sets of nine shallow-one deep penetrations to bring him again 99 percent of the way to ejaculation. Again he does the Big Draw, the exchange, and then relaxes, setting down a bit and then coming back up again. Each time he draws back and sends the energy upward, he doubles and triples his sexual energy. He can continue to multiply it in this way and draw the energy to higher centers as long as he does not let the sexual energy escape. Sexual energy is the one energy that can be multiplied without end and can continue increasing. Each time the orgasmic feeling will come up higher than the last time:

each time it is brought through the Microcosmic Orbit to all the organs and glands. This kind of higher center organs' and glands' orgasm is very different from the lower orgasm which is confined to the genitals, very brief and leads to vital energy loss.

Do not confuse the orgasm with ejaculation: they are two different things. An orgasm can last as long as you want, and can travel as high as you want. Once the man has ejaculated, however the orgasm is gone. The most pleasurable time is the peak of the orgasm right before ejaculation. Many people want to go beyond that point, however and if they have not been trained to control it, the point beyond ejaculation will be the end of the orgasm, and thus the end of the buildup of sexual energy at that time.

The Valley Orgasm in women is more intense than in men. Women can achieve almost as high an orgasm as they desire, and can cultivate their orgasm higher and higher. In an earlier chapter we stated that women do not lose much energy in normal sex, and that most of their energy is lost during menstruation. Even though women can have an ejaculation during sexual intercourse as men do, they lose only fluid and not an egg. Men during ejaculation lose about 200 million sperm. Women can arrive 99 percent of the way to the point of orgasm, perform the Orgasmic Draw to bring the orgasm higher in the Microcosmic Orbit, exchange energy with the organs, rest, and begin again to achieve a higher orgasm. Each time the woman holds back, the sexual energy doubles, triples and keeps on growing as long as she holds back, drawing the energy upward and inward.

Compared with men, women have a much easier time learning the sexual draw exercise, since women do not have to control ejaculation. Also, the emotional hookup that ties men to their ejaculations is not true for women and their periods. The notion of reducing menstrual tension does not threaten most women's view of their femininity.

1. Increasing Sexual Energy through Several Upward Draws

As we have described, in a Valley Orgasm we use several upward draws to bring the energy inward and upward. It seems that the more that is drawn up, the more energy is produced again in inexhaustible amounts, provided the energy is not released outward. This drawing up or holding back consists of one round of both partners approaching 99 percent of orgasm, drawing the sexual energy up, and controlling the sexual organs to return them to 60 percent orgasm. Each time you perform the upward draw you will increase internal energy significantly and it will become more and more internal. Instead of losing all that energy as in ordinary sex, and feeling depressed and exhausted afterwards, after an upward draw you will have more energy than before and feel refreshed and filled with healing energy.

In some cases people have so much tension and anger that when they allow their sexual energy to release outward, they feel they have released the tension too. However in actuality the tension is building up again and now they have no other way to handle it. The only way to rid themselves of it is to dump out their life-force, mixing their sexual energy with anger and other negative emotions.

The ancient Taoist System described the benefits of these methods in detail as follows:

A. First Upward Draw

After you or your partner have reached the 99 percent of orgasm point and have first used the Orgasmic or Big Draw to draw the sexual orgasm energy upward, this sexual energy will rise to increase the energy of the entire body.

B. Second Upward Draw

The second upward draw will strengthen the senses and rejuvenate the entire body.

C. Third Upward Draw

With the third upward draw the body starts to improve the immune system to resist disease, illness, flus and colds. Many of my students have used this system to help them overcome a cold or the flu.

D. Fourth Upward Draw

The fourth upward draw will help to stabilize and balance the internal organs. Many people are born with misplaced or unstabilized organs. One person's ears are lower while another's are higher or of a different shape. The same thing holds true for internal anatomy as for external anatomy. In some the kidneys may be too far back, or too far forward. The stomach may be in a dropped position, the pancreas too high, or the lungs too high, too low, too big, or too small. These unstabilized organs can cause all kinds of physical problems for us. Chronic problems, unbeknownst to the afflicted individual, could be caused by a mislocation of his or her organs. A dropped stomach or uterus, for example, can be improved by the power of sexual energy. Once you can increase the internal Chi pressure, it will start to stabilize the organs.

E. Fifth Upward Draw

The fifth upward draw improves blood vessel problems or high blood pressure, and, in an anemia's case, increases blood production.

F. Sixth Upward Draw

The sixth upward draw can help to strengthen lower back problems.

G. Seventh Upward Draw

The seventh upward draw strengthens the extremities, bones and bone marrow.

H. Eighth Upward Draw

The eighth upward draw can help to strengthen the spleen and the body's aura. This will help to protect the person from bad emotions being thrust upon him or her externally.

I. Ninth Upward Draw

The ninth upward draw will help to build and strengthen the spiritualized body and serves as spiritual food.

J. Tenth Upward Draw

The tenth upward draw is a completely spiritualized or psychic state, not limited by time and space.

2. Dual Cultivation of the Valley Orgasm

A. Solo Practice as Preparation

Initially the Orgasmic Draw is physically demanding. However with solo practice the orgasm is moved more smoothly from the genital area up to the brain by internal control and eventually is directed solely by the mind. It is important to do a lot of solo practice before attempting this with a partner mainly to avoid discouragement. According to Shere Hite, author of The Hite Report, most women who masturbate achieve orgasm within a few minutes. However with a partner a woman can prolong the arousal period and often become distinctly more aroused. The precision and timing of the Orgasmic and Big Draw come with practice. With a cooperative partner there is yet another world to experience.

B. Exchanging Energy

When you approach orgasm and do the Orgasmic Draw, the aroused ovary energy goes up to the brain. As you pump it up, this cool energy accumulates in the head. If you have practiced the Microcosmic Orbit you know that the tongue acts as a switch in your own body, uniting the two acupuncture meridians that make up the Orbit. The genitals also are a switch, and thus, no matter what your position, energy that has been built up can now be funneled into your partner's Microcosmic Orbit and vice versa.

The energy can travel in a variety of routes. One route can be from your tongue to your partner's tongue, down your partner's Functional Channel to the navel, then down to his genitals, switching over to your genitals, up your spine and round and round. It can circulate through both of your Microcosmic Orbits simultaneously, or you both might experience the energy outside of your bodies, feeling like a cocoon around you both, or a presence above your heads, etc. Since a woman's aroused energy is not as hot as a man's, your partner might perceive the cool energy from you, or you may notice warm energy from him entering your body.

Each woman's perception can be different. Some might feel cold energy, like a draft, traveling through her head. Some might feel like permitting the pulsation to go out, and then pulling it in and drawing it up.

C. Sexual Vampirism

The issue of one partner draining the other's sexual/life-force energy is an old one in Taoist circles. Legend has it that old men in China would seek out young women who did not have any children women who, in the old man's frame of reference, had a maximum of Yin energy. Then, without letting the woman know what they were doing, they would do the Big Draw while their penis was in the vagina, and drain out the women's Yin energy thereby increasing their own energy at the woman's expense. A woman who masters this system can be more powerful than a man. Woman can drain a man's energy many times faster than man can drain woman's. There are many stories existing about people who have used the system in the wrong way and with the wrong intention, and who have become too powerful in an evil way. Using the system in a selfish way tends to lead to an evil energy, which will eventually destroy the practitioner. However the same sexual energy properly used can help you achieve good health and higher spiritual attainment.

According to the Taoists, even assuming no evil intentions, the draining of a partner's energy can happen unintentionally especially if only one partner knows the practice. The safeguard against this is the circulation of the energy through both partners' bodies. This exchange of energy eliminates the possibility of one partner gaining energy while the other one loses.

3. Transforming Sexual Energy into Spiritual Love: Cultivating the Valley Orgasm

A. Yin and Yang Exchange

"Yang can function only with the cooperation of Yin, Yin can grow only in the presence of Yang". -Yellow Emperor's Female Consultant on Sex.

Our universe changes perpetually because of the eternal flow of Yin and Yang energies. The very essence of Yin-Yang exchange is the cyclical alternation of day and night. Due to this alternating energy flow, or respiration of the heavens, living things can grow. Were there only day and no night, all would be burnt: or if there were only night and no day, nothing would have strength to grow. As living things, humans are also subject to the law of Yin and Yang exchange.

The human being can live happily only if he or she is in harmony with the principles of life. If one violates the law of the Yin and Yang interchange, by forbidding the sexual communion of Yin and Yang energy, energy will not flow in the body. The life-force will slowly stagnate and leak out. Life will become a long slide into depression, interspersed by spasms of enslavement to the passions.

If you have learned to increase your orgasm through the Orgasmic Upward Draw, you are on the threshold of a new experience. That experience will alter your perceptions of your own body and mind. It will change the way you see your lover and change your understanding of sex and love.

"Drawing Nectar up to the Golden Flower" is incomplete without the exchange of Yin and Yang energy. (Fig. 8.35) The Golden Flower is the light at the crown of the head. The Orgasmic Draw pulls up and conserves your nectar, or sexual essence. It is the exchange of your Ching with your lover's that transforms it, and in the process gives an experience of sex which is deeply shared as love. Your orgasm be totally unlike that known as a simple, local, outward-pouring and short orgasm. As you make love over a period of time, the pleasure spreads, filling the Microcosmic Orbit and the entire body Unlike the ordinary quick orgasm, or peak orgasm, whose thrilling moment is confined primarily to the genital area, this orgasm will deliver to you a new sense of equilibrium that will be stored in your body long after your pleasure has become a fleeting memory

Taoists advocate the Valley Orgasm as a continual rolling expansion of the orgasm throughout the whole body prolonging inward orgasm to a half-hour one hour two hours, or longer in a gradual, but ultimately greatly heightened ecstasy. You can enjoy this form of sexual love indefinitely without paying for your pleasure with your life-force.

During the Valley Orgasm, lovers can relax and have all the time in the world to share their tenderness. There is no frenzied explosion, only wave after wave of higher subtle energies bathing the entwined man and woman. The Valley Orgasm is not a technique, but rather a certain kind of experience that the lovers allow to happen to themselves, encouraged by a time-tested process.

The Valley Orgasm is made up of all the methods you have learned thus far: the Orgasmic Draw for women, the Big Draw for men, the healing positions, the hand-energized positions, and increasing sexual energy through the upward draw. All this combines to make the best orgasm you can have. Yin and Yang exchange is one of the major parts of the Valley Orgasm.

Fig. 8.35 "Drawing Nectar Up to the Golden Flower"

4. Valley Orgasm Step-By-Step

A. First Upward Draw

(1) Timing

Bear in mind that when the woman is active, she can control the thrusting of nine shallow-one deep in order to stimulate the glans of the clitoris and the G-Spot, with the shallow thrusts entering only approximately two inches into the vaginal orifice, thereby touching the G-Spot. When you become stimulated, start to amplify the orgasm to a higher more intense sensation. Use the Ovarian Breathing technique, gently open and close the vagina, and slightly pull the Chi Muscle up to bring the orgasm higher. When you reach the point of orgasm, rest with the glans of your partner's penis touching the G-Spot. If it is in the proper spot, it will feel as though fitting in a slot. Rest here and exchange the sexual energy.

Fig. 8.36 The woman holds tightly the head of the penis in the ares of the G-Spot. Through muscular pressure she massages the penis.

You must take care that your partner does not reach the point of no return. When he is near of ejaculation, pull his penis out to the point of your G-Spot where the energy can be exchanged. Rest at this point. If you are good at helping your partner to stop or control the ejaculation. you can squeeze the base, not the head, of the glans of the penis, and this will block the urge to ejaculate. (Fig. 8.36) There is danger in bad timing; therefore, if you do not master this firm gripping technique, your partner can lose his semen. This means that you must use this grip before the urge to ejaculate occurs, and not right at the moment of ejaculation. A firm grip accounts for the success of this technique. Important to developing this grip are the Orgasmic Draw and the Egg and Vaginal Weight Lifting exercises. Delaying ejaculation will also help your partner to maintain his erection, enabling you both to proceed to the next exchange faster (Fig. 8.37) For additional information on delaying ejaculation in men, please read the section entitled “The Secrets of Semen Retention” in the book Taoist Secrets of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy.

Fig. 8.37 The woman presses on the penis to prevent loss of erection.

Fig. 8.38 Exhale and let cool woman's Yin energy flow into your partner.

Relax and exchange the energy. At this point, it would be good for your partner to practice the hard contractions of the Big Draw first until he is able to move his Yang sexual energy upward and gain control of it. Once he learns and masters this, you will not have to grip the glans of his penis to assist him in this control. Feel his hot, male, Yang energy begin to pass to you. This hot energy is unlike your energy. Once you feel it, inhale and take your turn to practice the Orgasmic Draw, drawing your Yin sexual energy plus his Yang sexual energy up to the higher center. First permit the energy to flow into your Microcosmic Orbit. Then exhale, and let the cool, female Yin energy flow into your partner .(Fig. 8.38) At this point your partner can use the gentleness of Testicle Breathing (as described later in this chapter) to absorb the cold Yin testicle energy into his system.

Remember you cannot receive his power without giving freely of your own. The exchange heals both partners. Man needs the soft receptive energies a woman provides to achieve perfect balance. Similarly, woman needs the expanding male energies to attain her own higher harmony. This is nature's underlying reason for attraction between the sexes.

If the man has been inactive, he will now perform the thrusting. When he approaches the point of orgasm, again he should withdraw the penis to the area of the G-Spot and execute the hard contractions of the Big Draw until he gains control again, exhaling his excess Yang energy to you. You will follow with the Orgasmic Draw to draw your energy plus his upward, and send him your excess Yin energy.

(2) Embracing after Lovemaking

When you cease active lovemaking, begin your embrace in any pleasing position. If the man is heavy, the woman is usually on top. If the woman is stronger than the man, she is usually on the bottom so that he can draw the power more readily. If the woman is weak, she may be on top where she can draw easily. In any case, make sure it is a position you can rest in for a long while. You should keep two extra pillows handy for this purpose.

(3) Coordinate your Breathing with your Lover's.

Remember that "Chi" means "air" or "breath" in Chinese. Life is breath. All living activity has the quality of inhalation, exhalation, or some Combination of the two. This is why Chinese philosophy classifies everything as Yin (exhalation) or Yang (inhalation) to a greater or lesser degree. The act of love is essentially an act of respiration. You breathe your Ching into your lover's body and soul. You inhale this life energy by drawing it up to the head, and exhale it by venting it to your partner.

It follows that after both of you have exchanged the sexual energy and embraced, you will coordinate your breathing. In a chest to chest position, each partner places an ear near the other's nose. In this position you can easily feel the other's breathing. In the act of love the breathing cycles stimulate and harmonize all of life's processes. Physically breathing together unifies the two partners and focuses the rhythm of all of their energies so that together they may contact the source of their own life current. You should become so sensitive to the presence of your partner's breathing that each deep, strong breath is as powerful as the feeling of your partner pushing his penis into your vagina.

To coordinate your breathing you will exhale deeply first and feel the Yin essence of breath penetrate into your partner. Wait for your partner to inhale and absorb this Yin essence, and then exhale, sending the Yang essence of his breath to you. (Fig. 8-39) Continue to coordinate the breathing until both of you feel in balance.

Fig. 8.39 Absorb Yin and Yang after Lovemaking.

(4) Inhale Power up the Spine to the Head:

Exhale out the G-Spot and Penis

After you breathe together for a time, gradually draw the power up to the crown of the head. Upon inhalation the man mentally conceives the Yin power moving from the vagina into the penis: the woman uses her mind to bring the Yang power from the penis into the G-Spot and clitoris. Both draw the power back to the perineum, or Hui-Yin, and the coccyx, or Chang-Chiang, and bring it up to T-11, C-7, C-1, the Jade Pillow and up to the crown, or Pai-Hui. From there the energy travels through the tongue which, throughout the entire exercise, is to be raised to the top of the mouth. The goal is not to use muscular force, as in the Orgasmic Draw or Big Draw, but simply to use the power of thought to direct the sexual energy. "Think" the energy up to the crown point. Although this instruction seems incomprehensible at first, those who have begun the practice of Sexual Kung Fu will begin to feel the power and will understand intuitively what is meant. The power will rise to the head eventually as your mind learns how to direct its own Chi energy to connect mind and body.

In the beginning you can accelerate the exchange of Yin and Yang power with the help of the hands' energizing points and long, deep, muscular contractions. When you feel the expansion and heat from the glans of your partner and your vagina fills with fluids, inhale slowly and deeply through the nostrils. While you inhale, contract the vagina, perineum, anus and buttocks, and as you slightly tighten this contraction, "think" the energy into the clitoris and G-Spot, past the Hui-Yin, into the Chang-Chiang and up the spine to the crown of the head. When you have finished the inhalation, hold the breath and contraction for as long as possible. Keep drawing the power up to the head until you can hold the breath no longer.

When your partner releases his breath, consciously giving you his excess hot, Yang energy, you must exhale deeply to bestow the Yin energy upon him. Release all tension by relaxing the head, throat, chest, abdomen and pelvis. Let the relaxation spread from the top to the bottom of the body in a wave. When the gentle wave reaches the pelvic region, send the Yin energy into your partner through the clitoris and G-Spot. This contraction and relaxation should be executed gently, creating a feeling of pulsation traveling between your body and his.

Lovingly offer him the essential energy. This surrender shall carry with it all the emotions of love and devotion. This is not sentimentality. It with inspire him to surrender his nourishing Yang essence and to totally embrace the Yin within Yang. This is the nature of a woman's fulfillment. If you attempt to withhold your energy, he will sense, consciously or unconsciously, your feeling of separateness, even though it may be nothing more than an obstruction in the energy flow (usually in the heart). Allow him to absorb the Yin energy he needs as you surrender the excess. The Yang energy will flood your entire body while the Yin floods his.

If you are just beginning to practice, you may be so overwhelmed by the sensation of sexual love that it will seem impossible to distinguish his Yang energy from your Yin. Everything may seem hot and explosive and as though comprised of a single energy. As you build up your nervous system to handle higher charges of energy using the healing and meditative techniques, the exchange of Yin and Yang energy will gradually evolve into awareness. If you build energy at successive points in the body, greater powers of exchange will be available to you and your partner. Begin by drawing the power to the Hui-Yin, or perineum, and meditating there.

In this first upward draw of the Valley Orgasm, if both of you have an open Microcosmic Orbit and can circulate the healing and energizing sexual energy, the Orbits will fill with energy, passing it through all the organs and glands, thereby helping to energize the entire body system.

(5) Helping your partner to Clear and Open a Blockage.

If you have more power than your partner; help him now to open his centers by directing your power to his unopened centers. Both must concentrate on these points. The Chi will flow to whatever place the mind focuses on. Proceed one point at a time. Both can use the palm-energizing method and concentration to help open the blockage.

Remember that you cannot open all the points in one sexual embrace. To open one point may take many exchanges of Yin and Yang. If your partner ejaculates there will be no energy to exchange since most of it will be lost and little will remain to be transferred.

The resting periods are most important since it is at this time that you can actually feel the energy exchange. This is the time that you and your partner can assist each other in clearing blockages, or you can help him to open his Microcosmic Orbit.

(a) Embrace each other and then put your right hand on your partner's sacrum with the middle finger touching the tip of the coccyx and the palm covering the sacrum, especially the opening of the hiatus. Feel the heat being absorbed into the spinal column and helping to activate the Sacral Pump, which will be instrumental in moving the energy upward. Place your left palm on his Door of Life, opposite the navel and between Lumbar 2 and Lumbar 3. This will help your partner move the sexual energy up to the kidneys' area. Your partner does the same to you. Once you become adept at this and feel the point opening, move up to the next point.

(b) Move the left hand to the T-11, the adrenal glands' point, with your right hand remaining on the sacrum.

(c) Next move the left hand up to the liver and spleen point, below and between the scapulae, maintaining the right hand on the sacrum.

(d) The next point is the heart and lung point, located between the fourth and fifth ribs and opposite the heart center. Again, place the left hand on this point, leaving the right hand on the sacrum.

(e) Progress upward through the remaining points: the C-7, the middle of the back of the neck, the Jade Pillow near the base of the skull, and the top of the crown. Move onto each point gradually to make sure it is open. For more details on the hands' energizing points, refer to earlier descriptions in this chapter.

It is also possible to jump over a point if you feel you need more energy at another moment in time. If both of you are fairly open, you can both simply place your right hands on your sacrum, and your left hands on the bases of the skulls or the tops of the crowns.

(6) Return to Lovemaking

Decide on who is to be the active one and return to lovemaking. After another round of 81 shallow and 9 deep thrusts, as you again approach orgasm or your partner ejaculation, you will gradually feel the orgasm move up the spine a little bit. It can spread to the entire back, or climb higher than the normal orgasms you have had before. With the first Valley Orgasm, feel the orgasm climb, approaching the organs. Rest, drop down into the valley again, and this time climb higher. Rest again, drop down into the next valley and climb even higher. You will find that each valley will have a different orgasmic sensation, and you will not always return to the same old valley.

B. Second Upward Draw

Resume lovemaking, build up the sexual energy to the limit that you can tolerate. Rest with the penis glans touching the G-Spot. Permit your partner to perform the Big Draw a second time to prevent ejaculation in order for the orgasm to rise higher. When your partner releases his Yang energy, you can perform the Orgasmic Draw, bringing the energy all the way up to the head and the senses by means of the sacrum and the spine. This upward draw can help to strengthen the senses.

Using gentle contractions and pull-ups of the Chi Muscle is very important in directing the energy to the senses.

(1) Bring the Sexual Energy to both Eyes.

Pull up the left and right perineum to bring the sexual energy to both eyes. When you feel either hot or cold energy at the eyes, move them around beginning with a clockwise direction (Fig. 8.40(a)) and returning in a counterclockwise direction in order to absorb the energy inward. (Fig. 8.40(b))

(a) Use the mind and eyes to help circulate the energy nine times,

(b) and counterclockwise nine times.

Fig. 8.40 Using the Eyes to direct the Sexual Energy.

(2) Bring the Healing Energy to both Ears.

Bring the healing energy to both ears by pulling up the left and right sides of the perineum and moving your ears around if possible. If this is impossible, mentally move the energy around the ears.

(3) Bring the Healing Energy to the Tongue.

Contract and pull up the middle part of the perineum, and bring the healing energy to the tongue. Move the tongue around.

(4) Bring the Energy to the Nose.

Contract and pull up the front part of the perineum, and bring the energy to the nose. When finished, exchange the energy with your partner:

C. Third Upward Draw

It requires practice for you to control the sexual energy well enough to proceed to the third upward draw. Proceed gradually, making certain that as you continue along each step, you have firm control over your sexual energy first. Meanwhile, your partner also plays a big part since he must control his own sexual energy.

(1) Bring the Energy up the Spine to the Crown.

Resume lovemaking, building up the sexual energy to the limit that you can take. Rest the penis glans at the G-Spot. Let your partner perform the Big Draw a third time to prevent ejaculation so that the Orgasm can be raised higher. When your partner releases his Yang energy you can perform the Orgasmic Draw, bringing the energy through the sacrum all the way up the spine to the crown. Remember that the third upward draw helps to improve the immune system's resistance to disease. The glands, especially the thymus gland, and the bone marrow play a substantial role in a healthy immune system.

(2) Use your Eyes and Mind to move the Energy.

When the energy reaches the brain, turn your eyes, ears, and tongue up to the pineal and pituitary glands, moving the eyes and using the mind to move the generative sexual energy for the purpose of revitalizing the glands.

Fig. 8.41 Blossoming of the Thymus Gland

(3) Flow of Nectar to the Thymus Gland.

When the pineal and pituitary glands are filled with the sexual energy, they will produce a certain kind of fluid that we have been describing as nectar. This nectar is a mixture of sexual energy and hormones released from the glands. The property of this very special kind of hormone has special life-giving and healing energy. It will flow down through the palate to the throat and thymus gland.

Creative sexual energy has a very close relationship with the thymus gland, with each one enhancing the other: When there is an excessive loss of sexual or ovaries' energy the first to 6e affected are the pineal, pituitary and thymus glands.

As the fluid and the energy flow into the thymus gland, you gradually will feel the gland blossom like a Flower (Fig. 8.41) this will be manifested in a sensation of fullness underneath the sternum. The thymus gland is regarded by Taoists as the seat of greater enlightenment, the seat of love and the seat of life-force or Chi, energy.

(4) The Ribs absorb the overflow of Nectar.

Once the nectar has filled the thymus gland, the overflow of energy, will be absorbed into the ribs, thereby helping to increase bone marrow in which is produced white blood cells, which help protect the body against foreign substances and infection. The flat chest bones are the major producers of white blood cells.

D. The Fourth Upward Draw will help to stabilize the internal organs.

Once you can master the third upward draw, and have filled the glands with the energy, you can begin to bring the sexual energy to the organs. Again you will employ the assistance of the Chi Muscle in the perineum region as an important aid. You will use gentle contractions and slight pull-ups to help. By the time you have reached this level of practice, your body has become more adept at controlling the sexual energy. You will now bring the sexual energy directly to the organs to transform it into a higher energy, otherwise the system can become allergic to its own raw sexual energy. The Taoist Masters discovered that all the energizing points of the spine (the sacrum, T-11, C-7, C-1, Jade Pillow, etc.) can help to transform the raw sexual energy into what will be the primary stage of life-force energy.

(1) Bring the Sexual Energy and the orgasmic vibration to the Ovaries and Kidneys. (Fig. 8.42)

Proceed as before, approach the high point of orgasm, rest and exchange the energy. After the exchange, begin to bring the energy to the ovaries and then to the kidneys. Using gentle contractions and slight pull-ups, left and right, of the Chi Muscle as an aid, bring the sexual energy and the vibration of the orgasm to the ovaries. Start with the left side first, and wrap the energy around the left ovary. Then bring the vibration of the orgasm and the sexual energy to wrap the left kidney. Gradually you will feel the energy start to vitalize the glands and organs. This orgasmic vibration felt at the ovary and kidney has a very different sensation than genital orgasm. It can feel gentle, cool, and clean, filling you with the sensational fulfillment of a true orgasm. Each organ and gland will create a different kind of orgasm from the other but all will be different and more fulfilling than genital orgasm. Once you have mastered bringing the sexual energy and orgasmic vibration to the left ovary and kidney, begin to bring the energy to the right side. When you feel the fulfillment on the right side, bring this fulfillment to both sides simultaneously. You will gradually feel the kidneys' and ovaries' region as stronger warmer and filled with life-force. You should master each organ, then gradually move on to the next one, continuing one at a time.

Fig. 8.42 Bringing Sexual Energy to the Kidneys

(2) Bring the Sexual Energy and orgasmic vibration to the Spleen and Liver.

The next organs to bring the energy to are the spleen and liver: Using gentle contractions again and slightly pulling up the left and right sides of the Chi Muscle, bring the sexual energy and its orgasmic vibration up to the left ovary. Pause for a while. Bring it up to the left kidney; pause and wrap the energy and the orgasm around this kidney, inhaling and pulling it up to the left side underneath the rib cage to the spleen. Wrap the sexual energy and the orgasmic vibration around the spleen, gradually increasing the orgasmic sensation which, again, will feel very different from the other organs' orgasm, and more fulfilling than a genital orgasm. Next, bring the energy and orgasm to the right side and the right ovary, the right kidney and then the liver. Giving a more intense orgasm than any other organ, the liver can generate the sensations of warmth, expansion, energy, loveliness, kindness, and a very euphoric and satisfying kind of feeling.

(3) Bring the Orgasm and Sexual Energy to the Lungs.

Next bring the orgasm and the sexual energy to the left lung, first passing through the left ovary, left kidney, spleen, and finally to the lung. Once you master the left side, begin to bring the energy to the right side, and then both sides together. Each person can have a different orgasmic feeling.

E. The Fifth Upward Draw increases the amount of blood vessels and blood circulation.

(1) Wrap and energize the cervix with the sexual energy.

After the fifth exchange of energy, pull the middle part of the Chi Muscle at the perineum up toward the cervix, which has a great supply of blood flowing through it. When strong, it will help tremendously in increasing blood circulation as it is wrapped and energized with the orgasmic feeling.

(2) Pull the energy up to the aorta and vena cava.

Next pull up to the aorta and vena cava, the main arteries and veins leading from and to the heart, respectively. When these are strong, the flow of blood will increase. Bringing the orgasmic vibration and sexual energy to these vessels will help increase the flow of blood through the heart. In the later practice of the higher levels of the Universal Tao, the mind is used to amplify the orgasmic vibrations in these vessels to create an even greater flow of blood.

(3) Pull up the Sexual Energy to the Heart.

Next pull up sexual energy to the heart, the organ responsible for pumping the blood. Wrap and energize the heart, bring the orgasmic vibration there, and feel the heart unfold like a blossoming flower.

Remember that in attempting to bring the energy to the heart you must be very cautious, since the heart easily becomes congested with excess energy causing pain and breathing difficulties. As previously indicated, if you experience these problems, practice the Heart Sound, gently tap the chest around the heart, and brush down your chest with your hands to try to force the excess energy out of this area. Then do not practice the heart upward draw for several days. Instead, return to the fourth upward draw until you master that.

F. Sixth Upward Draw, the plateau phase: circulate your microcosmic orbit into your lover's orbit.

Depending upon the level of vital energy and the spiritual development of the individual lovers, a couple over time will experience new "openings" that occur during their lovemaking. This means you will suddenly find you have made a quantum leap in your feelings and awareness. This usually happens during the plateau phase of the Yin Yang exchange. The period of lovemaking when you are not thrusting passionately is referred to as the "plateau" phase, as opposed to the `peaks," the moments prior to the orgasm that is averted by doing the Orgasmic Draw and Big Draw. The plateau is the physically passive exchange of energy that occurs between the peaks.

The subtle energies within your resting bodies are not passive at all, but are moving dynamically between partners, building to a new level of sexual-electromagnetic tension. It is an internal wave of energy building up, similar to an ocean wave that gathers momentum and crashes, only to be replaced by the next wave. After the sexual energy has been raised to a high intensity by thrusting and drawing it up the spine on the route of the Microcosmic Orbit with the Orgasmic Draw and the Big Draw, the Yin-Yang exchange can begin to happen in many different ways.

Fig. 8.43 Fusion of the Microcosmic Orbits

(1) Joining the Two Microcosmic Orbits

In the beginning the energy exchange between lovers may seem to be chaotic and occurring between any two points of bodily contact. As you grow more accustomed to the energy gained by stopping the man's ejaculation, you will begin to discriminate the clearly defined channels of the Microcosmic Orbit rising up the spine and descending the front of the body. During the plateau phase of lovemaking you may feel a warm flowing current passing between your vagina and his penis and between your lips.

These are two individual Microcosmic Orbits joined into one larger flow circling your two bodies. (Fig. 8.43) This experience will greatly enhance the balance of energy in both lovers and deepen the bond of loving in their life. The Chi flow is increased in amplitude; you may even feel like a warm electric current is passing between you. This effect often occurs in lovers in good health, who have practiced the Orgasmic Draw and the Big Draw, after only a few lovemaking sessions.

Both the man's and woman's Microcosmic circuits can be joined in a number of different ways. The most common is the intersection of their two circular Orbits at the mouths and genitals, forming a Figure eight. The Figure eight can cross as the Microcosmic energy drawn by the man up his spine is passed into the woman through his tongue, which acts like an electrical switch. The male energy then enters her Microcosmic Orbit and travels down her front, or Functional Channel, and down through her vagina, into his penis and back up his spine.

The woman circulates her Orbit in a parallel fashion, up her back channel and down his front channel, before it reenters her body at the vagina and proceeds back to her perineum and spine. This is the simplest way to direct this level of exchange of Yin and Yang energy.

Each couple can play with different Figure eight patterns of exchange. At first you may verbally tell your lover what you are concentrating on. Later as you become more sensitive to your own and your lover's energy, the Chi exchange itself will become a silent language, punctuated by the pleasure of sending a tingling warm current into your lover the Figure eight may cross at your mouths only, or at your genitals. It may snake around your Governor Channels, up your spine and down his, or vice versa.

At this level many couples experience spontaneous openings of some of the eight special psychic channels taught in the Fusion of the Five Elements Meditation of theUniversal Tao. (Fig. 8.44) These channels include the positive and negative arm and leg routes, the Belt Routes spiraling around the body and the Thrusting Route up the center of the body. Do not be alarmed if your energy begins moving in ways you are not accustomed to. Many lovers experience a column of energy rising on a line midway between their bodies. If this is your experience, simply relax and enjoy the interplay of these subtle energies. Some couples report the Chi shooting up to the top of their heads and showering down a fountain of “nectar”. Others feel as though wrapped in a cocoon with their lover with lines of invisible energy being spun around them.

Fig. 8.44 Spontaneous Opening of the Nine Belt Routes during Heightened States of Energy Arousal

When you have opened all your psychic channels and you know what is possible in terms of energy exchanges, you will then be free to choose the path of expressing your love at will. It is interesting that lovers who know nothing of these esoteric methods sometimes have similar experiences during normal sex. Although unable to exchange energy at will, they do know the sensations first-hand from the spontaneous opening of their subtle energy channels. The Taoist practices of Healing Love are designed to focus your awareness on the infinite possibilities that lie within you. This concentrated awareness is what spontaneously sparks these experiences of divine energy exchange. In this sense love is universally the path to the greatest freedom: thus, the more you share with your lover; the more choices are open to you.

5. Cultivating the Valley Orgasm

The Valley Orgasm is a true fusion of two lovers' beings, shared in an intensified and balanced way. As an even higher experience of Yin Yang exchange that goes beyond the Microcosmic, it may occur spontaneously in any couple dedicated to expanding their love and spiritual awareness. No technique can guarantee it will happen, but the methods taught here vastly increase the probability of a couple enjoying regular Valley Orgasms during lovemaking. It is a state of prolonged orgasm, the balancing of Yin and Yang, a function of opposites, a melting. However do not be disappointed if you learn to block ejaculation and master the Orgasmic Draw and Big Draw, but do not soon have a Valley Orgasm. This happens frequently and should be expected, especially in a stressful urban setting where there are so many distracting forces working against the sustained balance of subtle energies.

A.Cultivation in the Three Tan Tiens

During a Valley Orgasm the lovers simultaneously experience an opening of a specific energy center. This releases a tremendous energy that is truly thrilling as it radiates to fill every cell of your body and joins you with your lover. The Hindus call these centers "chakras". The Taoists refer to them as lower middle and upper Tan Tiens, and locate them in the abdomen, heart, and head. (Fig. 8-45)

Fig. 8.45 Taoist Practices of Healing Love open the Way to experience the Greatest Freedom.

In truth, the entire body is one Tan Tien, or energy center but in practice it is easier to learn with smaller vortexes of energy until you can handle the greater power. The sequence of opening them is generally to start with the lowest center and move up. If the higher centers open before the lower ones, the energy may be unstable and short-lived. In that case the lovers should direct their higher energy into the lower centers to create a more grounded polarity. Filling the lower body with higher energies will lend greater fullness to the feeling of intimacy and create a greater foundation for future exploration of the spiritual world of the two lovers.

By opening these energy centers you transform your sexual essence into spirit. The Valley Orgasm is actually a fusion of Ching, Chi and Shen (sexual, life-force and spiritual energy) in two lovers. (Fig. 8.46) All three are normally present in everyone, but in a divided and weakened state. The two lovers can supply energies missing in their partner and bring out recessive energies with the simple presence of the opposite subtle polar energy. When you open a new energy center your mind makes a leap in awareness by fusing these three in a spontaneous alchemical process. Your own spirit is purified and is one step closer to becoming centered in your body. It is important to know that these centers cannot be forced open, any more than a child can suddenly be forced to grow up. There are natural stages. That is why you must relax to entice the Tan Tiens to open; then you will experience a Valley Orgasm as a spontaneous gift, a sparkling jewel bestowed upon you by the Tao. This state has been described as one of profound clarity and serenity but even these phrases are insufficient to convey its deep beauty and truth.

B. Cultivation of Deep Relaxation

The more deeply you learn to relax during the Yin-Yang exchange, the more deeply you can surrender yourself to your lover the more likely you are to reach the balance of polar forces needed to open each center. This process happens in a split second, but can take months or years of subtle fine tuning of energy between lovers. That is why a commitment is usually needed to get to the higher levels of Dual Cultivation--it requires a great deal of time to understand the play of subtle forces, and to refine your more gross physical and emotional energies.

Fig. 8.46 Bringing Sexual Energy to the Kidneys

C. Development of a Strong Nervous System

Your nervous system must also be strong enough to handle the increased flow of Chi experienced during a Valley Orgasm. Any Tai Chi, Yoga, Chi Kung or other purifying meditative work is invaluable in developing this kind of strength as it speeds up and clarifies the process.

D. Mental Spiraling of the Energy

The Valley Orgasm can happen when both lovers have harmonized their will power and their breathing during the Yin-Yang exchange. The energy is flowing between the man and woman as they collectively focus their attentions on each center. It helps to mentally spiral the energy in a three-inch diameter circle (male clockwise, female counter clockwise) at a point about three inches inside the body near each center You should experiment with the location of the point you focus on, as some people find the energy is more powerful a little closer to the spine.

The Chi energy likes to move in a spiraling motion; therefore, by mentally spiraling at key points, you may trigger the release of a far more powerful Valley Orgasm. This spiraling movement of the Chi itself is caused by the interaction of male and female energies. This can be seen geometrically in the symbol of the female--the circle, and that of the male--a straight line with an arrowhead. The fusion of these two signs is a spiral: a circular energy containing a linear energy moving toward the center of the circle. When a man and woman make love, the same thing occurs: the Yang Chi enters the circle of the Yin Chi. The Chi fuses, and the circle of energy expands and spirals upward through both bodies. The energy will naturally travel in a sequence, spiraling through the following centers.

(1) Navel Center, or Lower Tan Tien

Many routes of the body join at the navel center or lower Tan Tien. When the navel is open, all routes in the body will be joined. You will regain something of the terrific vitality of the newborn baby for its energy has been fed to it by the mother through the navel.

(2) Solar Plexus

The solar plexus controls the digestive system, stomach, spleen and liver. This will greatly strengthen your health and will. At the solar plexus center the power is much stronger purer and widespread. However you must first open the navel for the power to flow up.

(3) Heart Center, or Middle Tan Tien

Important to strengthening the heart, lungs and thymus gland and to amplify your power of love, sympathy and rejuvenation is your heart center. This is the center of the middle Tan Tien, and extends into the areas immediately above and below it.

Fig. 8.47 The Vallrey Orgasm is actually the fusion of Ching (Essential Energy), Shen (Spirit) andChi (Vital Energy).

(4) Throat

The throat energy center is the thyroid gland and is the energy's doorway between man and heaven. Since it controls speech, it is also known as the center.

(5) Yin-Tang, or Third Eye

The Yin-Yang, or third eye, is located between the eyebrows, and controls the nervous system and soul. Its development calms the person and lessens the influence of stress and fear.

(6) Pai-Hui (Crown) or Upper Tan Tien

Finally direct the power to the Pai-Hui, the crown, the center of spiritual knowledge, and the doorway to higher spiritual evolution.

6. Valley Orgasm Summary

a. First make love actively using three or six shallow strokes for each deep one, or nine shallow and one deep.

b. Stop thrusting when you feel you are approaching orgasm. Use the Orgasmic Upward Draw, or your male partner the Big Draw, to bring power up to the Pai- Hui (crown).

c. Embrace and synchronize the breathing. Place yourselves in comfortable positions without undue stress on the limbs.

d. Open the Microcosmic Orbit by directing your Chi around the circuit with the power of thought.

e. Exchange power by circulating your energy in and around your entwined bodies using meditation. Focus your attention on the polar balance of energy in your lower Tan Tien. When the power builds, move it upward in a wave toward your middle and upper Tan Tien.

f. When your energy has been transformed up, or you feel the loss of 50 percent of your arousal, start to thrust again if you wish and build up more energy, keeping the urogenital diaphragm closed, and stopping before ejaculation.

g. Exchange power several times. Each time try to bring the energy up to increasingly higher centers, meditating on each Tan Tien for as long as you feel comfortable.

The exchanging practice is a mental and spiritual operation. The higher energy in woman is different from man, a study that merits a complete undertaking and is projected for a later volume.

E. Helpful Hints

Many women who have partners will want to share the techniques learned here with their partners to enhance their mutual experiences. The following are some helpful hints in sharing the practice.

1. For Lesbian Couples

Women who share these techniques with their women partners will find it easy to communicate the information, since they both practice the same exercises. One area that the Taoists claim is important is the polarity of Yin and Yang. For Valley Orgasm to be experienced, the Taoists say that the polarity of Yin and Yang work together to produce a synthesis of their opposing qualities. If both partners are women, therefore Yin in nature, there may not be enough tension, or magnetic energy available to "lift off: ' as it were. One way to increase the polarization is for one partner to acquire more Yang energy. Since the most Yang source in our environment is the sun, one partner can take more sun, the absorption of which will increase her Yang energy. If possible, she can take the solar energy into her ovaries via the genitals, if she has the privacy to do this. Otherwise, she can sit in the sun and "think," or mentally direct, the energy into her ovaries.

2. In Teaching your Man

Once a woman masters these techniques, she can more easily share the information with her partner. The best way would be for him to carefully read the instructions in the companion volume, Taoist Secrets Of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy. Short of that, a woman should know that when teaching a man, there are some essential differences that must be considered.

A. Testicle Breathing

Testicle Breathing is performed similarly to Ovarian Breathing. A man has a visible testimony of his testicles lifting up with a contraction of the pubococcygeal muscle (PC Muscle). Also, temperature-wise, the energy for the man is cool or cold (remember the ovarian energy during Ovarian Breathing is warm). Therefore, it is not necessary to emphasize bringing down this energy into the navel--the cool energy in his head will not harm the brain. He is welcome, of course, to bring the energy down to the navel and circulate it in the Microcosmic Orbit.

B. Big Draw for Men

Having a partner who believes that withholding ejaculation is an acceptable idea removes one major obstacle. The will to want to try this method is already a step in the right direction, and you will soon have a partner with whom to practice and with whom to escalate the pleasure of sexual contact. Teaching the Big Draw to a man is a matter of great magnitude since men have a hard time controlling ejaculation. First of all, it will take a lot of solo practice before he feels comfortable with his control over his ejaculation. With you the additional excitement makes it more difficult to control. The role of coach and trainer, willing to guide him through the steps of the Big Draw, will serve you both best.

We have received varying reports from women students who have helped to cultivate the practice in their partners. One described her experience as if she were at a sporting event, rooting him on, which made her feel involved in his Big Draw and gave her something to do as she waited. Another woman felt neglected, noting that all the emphasis was on his Big Draw. In her workshop training it was emphasized that the woman had to be patient for a time in order to help him. Therefore, attitude plays a large role in your success.

C. Stopping Ejaculation

The Brauers, in their book ESO: Extended Sexual Orgasm, offer several techniques for delaying ejaculation and orgasm. One simple way is for both men and women to push down, as though having a bowel movement, and feel the genitals bulge. Holding the breath naturally accompanies this maneuver. It seems to work very temporarily however: while you are actually bearing down the sexual sensations do not exist, then when you inhale and relax you are almost back where you started. It is, though, a chance to switch gears to a different kind of stimulation.

Another technique to delay ejaculation described in the Brauers' book is called the "scrotal pull." Its effectiveness is based on the fact that ejaculation will not occur when the testicles are low rather than being pressed against the body. You can both learn how to do this. The Bauers instruct the man to “grasp the scrotum between your testicles with the thumb and forefinger of your left hand. When you are near orgasm, pull firmly down.” Another way is to “make a ring with your left thumb and forefinger between your testicles and body and pull downward.”‘

The companion book for men, Taoist Secrets of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy, describes other helpful techniques to delay ejaculation in men. The “Cold Water Skinny-Dip” is one method: that is, having a bowl of cold water by the bed for him to stick his penis in if he wishes to take a breather to get more control over himself. Another technique is the “Century Count,” which is counting to 100 very slowly.

Sharing the techniques of the practice of Healing Love promotes kindness, understanding, selflessness, pleasure and happiness in you and your partner and is well worth the time spent in learning.

Chapter 9
Interview: Ovarian Kung Fu Practitioner

The following interview with a 43-year-old Ovarian Kung Fu Practitioner and movement teacher was conducted by a Taoist teacher: Michael Winn.

Question: How long have you been practicing Ovarian Kung Fu?

Answer: For three years.

Question: Did you find the techniques difficult to learn?

Answer: I found them easy to learn, especially since from the very beginning the benefits were so immediately obvious. I was motivated to practice, but it did require a certain amount of time to completely embody them and make them a part of my life.

Question: Did you learn them alone or with a partner?

Answer: Initially I practiced alone having just ended a relationship. I immediately found they empowered me with control of my own sexual energy, and rediscovered sexuality as a resource for cultivating myself.

Question: What do you mean by resource?

Answer: In the sense that the Taoists speak of cultivating one's nature, refining energy for personal and spiritual development, with sexual energy being one raw material from which that refinement is accomplished. I actually had the experience of being able to direct my sexual energy within my body, and watch it transform my body and my emotions.

Question: Did you have a sense of sexual energy as a resource before you began Taoist practices?

Answer: No, not specifically as a resource. I felt confused after growing up in this Western culture which perpetuates a sense of separation of body and spirit. I am naturally a very sensuous person and totally enjoy the physical aspects of sex. I always had a sense of the mystical quality or spiritual communion possible in a sexually and emotionally intimate relationship. I longed for inner union and knew I would need to experience that union within myself before I would be able to experience it with a partner. This longing fueled my spiritual quest, leading me to meditation and eventually to the Taoist sexual practices.

Learning the Taoist sexual practices helped ground my meditations in my body and in my daily relationships. I was attracted to them because of the value placed on harmonizing heaven and earth, spirit and body. Sexual energy became for me a valuable resource as a fuel for my spiritual journey. I discovered I could enjoy sex and transform it into spiritual energy at the same time. The pleasure of sex actually became more intense and exquisite. Pleasure became ecstasy and ecstasy grew into bliss.

Question: Does this mean that sex is now something that you can have with yourself?

Answer: Yes. Almost like a twenty-four-hour-a-day experience of my being alive as a sexual being. That energy is now there and available to me constantly. Before I was stuck in a bit of a polarity: I was either blocking the sexual energy if I wasn't in a relationship in which I could express it, or feeling impelled to get involved in a relationship in order to experience it. Now I feel more sexually aroused and alive. I feel my energy is at its fullest potential, and are more "turned on" by life all the time. Now I don't feel that I always have to interact with a man in order to express it. Because my sexual energy flows in clearer channels, I can tolerate a higher level of energy without feeling an urgency to discharge it.

Question: What happens with the sexual energy when you are not interacting and making love?

Answer: When I first began doing Ovarian Breathing, I discovered immediately that I could move the sexual energy easily from my genitals throughout my whole body. It's very simple, but very powerful. I can increase my ability to be connected and present in life. Over time I have been able to refine it so that I can share more energy with other people in my work and daily relationships. It doesn't come across necessarily as purely sexual, but I know it is my sexual energy that I have transformed into healing and loving energy.

Question: Do you think that men are more attracted to you now that you do the Ovarian practice?

Answer: They seem to be.

Question: Has it changed the kind of men that you attract?

Answer: I would say that I seem to be more attractive to people in general. Although I seem to be more attractive to men, judging by the feedback that I get, I am attracting in a way that feels comfortable. I do not feel that men are leering at me. I used to feel that whenever I was strongly in touch with the full power of my sexual energy that I was somehow putting out a strong sexual message, inviting a kind of response that I really didn't want. Now I feel that people are interested in me as a whole person.

Question: Would you call this a personal magnetism?

Answer: Yes. A personal magnetism.

Question: Have you ever practiced Ovarian Kung Fu with a man?

Answer: Yes. I practiced by myself for about three months, and then I was very fortunate in attracting a man who had been doing the Taoist sexual practices for a period of time.

Question: During those first three months, did you see any changes in your menstrual period, or did you experience any other physical changes?

Answer: My periods had been healthy and trouble-free so I really didn't notice any change. But friends who have begun the practice who have had any kind of difficulty before have experienced dramatic improvement in terms of a relief of menstrual cramps, a shorter flow, and fewer pre-menstrual symptoms.

Question: What about emotions? Sexuality is supposed to be linked with emotions in many different ways. Once you began this practice, did change your connection to your emotions?

Answer: Yes. Since at the time I began Ovarian Kung Fu I was already involved with other Taoist practices, it's difficult to differentiate which was having the effect on my emotions. I know that the Fusion of the Five Elements, Part I. had a profound effect on my emotional state since it involved recycling negative emotions into a purer form of energy. Combining that with the Taoist sexual practice, I gained a tremendous sense of personal responsibility of being in charge of and able to direct both my sexual and emotional energy Question: Do you feel the Fusion and Ovarian Kung Fu practices go together?

Answer: Yes. It is wonderful to do the Taoist sexual practice with a partner but it is extremely helpful to do the Fusion practice because it keeps the emotional energy so clear. It puts a relationship on a wholly different level without the normal kind of emotional confusion that often comes into a male-female relationship.

Question: Do you feel it is dangerous for someone to do just the sexual practice if it is not balanced by clearing out all the negative emotions?

Answer: I would say that really depends upon the person. If two people are very responsible about their emotions, acknowledging them so that they are able to let them go, then they will probably do well with just the sexual practices. But they would still benefit from doing the rest of the meditation practices as well. For couples who have any emotional confusion, I would say it is essential to do Fusion at the same time as the regular sexual practices.

Question: Do you know of anyone who is doing these practices who has had problems with them?

Answer: No, I don't. Everyone I know who has practiced them has been quite enthusiastic about the benefits.

Question: And there are no side effects?

Answer: I have never known anyone, male or female, who has had any side effects. This practice allows sexual energy to be transmuted and not just conserved. It also refines and spreads it throughout the body, revitalizing the whole body in mind and spirit. So the practice itself removes the negative side effects of sexual desire, which for most people appears as sexual frustration. Sexual frustration is simply blocked sexual energy.

Question: Once you became involved with your lover; did you find a big difference between the other lovers you've had who were not doing these practices?

Answer: Yes. It was quite dramatically and wonderfully different. This relationship, which continues happily, has all the elements that had been wonderful in my other relationships in terms of closeness and pleasure, but goes far beyond anything that I have ever experienced before. The whole quality of the relationship is very clear.

We experience very clear communication, a flow, and a true bonding on many, many levels that I hadn't experienced before. We are connected emotionally, mentally and psychically, and are often able to know what the other is thinking. We feel that even at long distances we are able to make love. We have a feeling of the spiritual connection that is very, very satisfying.

Question: What about women who learned the practices but who have been unable to find a man who would do these practices? Do you have any friends like that?

Answer: I think everyone I have known who has learned the practices has wanted to find a partner. It is interesting to me that people I speak with about the benefits of the practice are all initially cynical and suspicious. Most of us experience a lot of our greatest pleasure in life sexually, so we do not really want to give up the known for the unknown. Since this practice has spiritual benefits, most people think that it won't feel quite as good on the physical level. People are often a little reluctant initially to try. But everyone I know, once they learn the practices, wants to find a partner with whom to practice because they find the quality of their sexual experience far more pleasurable and satisfying, and they want to find someone with whom to share.

Question: What problems exist for the woman who does the practice, while her partner does not?

Answer: The quality of these relationships is probably better than previous relationships. Some of the refined sexual energy spills over and the partner probably picks up on it on subconscious levels.

Question: Do you think there is danger of abuse, of someone drawing the energy out from the other person, something like "sexual vampirism"?

Answer: A method can always be abused. It is very important for anyone planning to do these practices with a partner to have a clear commitment to sharing fully to attain mutual spiritual growth.

Question: Can you describe your experience of orgasm with your partner?

Answer: The orgasm is a Valley Orgasm, rather than a Peak Orgasm. I experience a slow wave of energy rising within me. This actively stimulating phase rises to a prolonged peak of excitement, then I deeply relax in the "valley" for a period. I repeat this cycle two, three or more times. Each succeeding peak of excitement is higher and each valley is more deeply relaxing so that more and more of my whole body-mind-spirit is at the same time aroused and deeply surrendering.

The Valley Orgasm occurs spontaneously in the state of deep relaxation, and it is a very powerful experience which I feel in every cell, every particle of my being as an exquisite, ecstatic melting. The feeling of connection with my partner is profound. My whole being is shared with his, and his with mine, as one flow that knows no boundaries.

Sometimes our awareness expands to include the whole cosmos, and there is a powerful sense of being omnipresent and a part of all things. Sometimes the orgasm has felt like nuclear fusion and fusion occurring simultaneously as though I am both expanding infinitely and fusing into a point of nothingness. I have experienced a tremendous spectrum of sensations each time. In the beginning sometimes we spent the whole day making love and meditating with the energy we generated. I am always in awe of the tremendous power residing in male and female. We are all closer to being gods and goddesses than we think.

Question: Are you able to distinguish your energy from his during the cycling and sharing?

Answer: I definitely can distinguish his energy and can also feel the quality of the merging. I had been practicing the Microcosmic Orbit Meditation for about a year before I began doing the sexual practice, and had practiced the Single Cultivation of Ovarian Kung Fu for several months before actually being with my partner: Because my partner was also experienced in the practice, our merging was really spontaneous without any need to control it. I could feel from our first sharing the energy moving naturally into the Microcosmic, Belt and Thrusting Channels. If you meditate in these channels daily, your lovemaking energy will flow effortlessly into them.

Question: How long do you make love during this practice?

Answer: Several hours. Sometimes two hours, sometimes three or four. Quite frequently we experience the peaks and valleys all night, but with naps during some of the valleys. There is a saying that in love there is no sense of time. This really describes Taoist lovemaking. There is a sense of all the time in the world, of being in eternity and of having more and more energy available. Now that we have created so many connections, we don't really need to spend as much time. Once we made love for only 30 seconds before experiencing a Valley Orgasm, but the polarity between us was so powerful that the Valley Orgasm lasted for hours. Now we are much more tuned to each other and feel that we are making love all the time.

Question: Are these cycles of the peaks and valleys determined by the male's erection?

Answer: I would say that the cycles of peaks and valleys is deter mined by both people. Both partners move to greater and greater excitement, and when a partner feels he or she is coming to the point of no return, then both partners pull the energy up to mingle it and share it in the quiet valley stage. It has always seemed spontaneous when another crest and wave begins, drawing both of us into it.

Question: During that resting period when you have reached the high peak of stimulation and have allowed that Chi energy to move up the body until the whole body feels tingling, warm and vibrant, is there a danger of feeling unconscious with this energy?

Answer: If I'm extremely fatigued there is a tendency to be more unconscious with it. My experience in general is of going into a totally altered state, finding a melting point with my partner in which I am very aware and yet very at ease. Then I can meditate and further refine our lovemaking.

Question: The technique of the Valley Orgasm as it is described requires you to meditate at different levels, or Tan Tiens. Did you find yourself able to meditate at specific centers with this energy?

Answer: It's very hard to generalize because every experience is unique. I found initially that the energy first moved in the Microcosmic Orbit, but I also started noticing that it would move through the whole body. It would tend with each valley to move up through another center. There would be times in the valleys when it would seem like a showering-up, sometimes more in the center or in the back, while at other times it would be like the rush of a rocket taking off, straight up.

Question: Does this feeling linger after lovemaking?

Answer: There is the sense of being a unique male and female each in our respective bodies, and yet being all man and all woman, god and goddess. I have clearly experienced this before in other sexual relationships, but in this relationship it exists all the time.

Question: After practicing in this relationship for almost three years, what has been the evolution of this practice?

Answer: I would say that one of the aspects of all the Taoist practices is the sense of active awareness of drawing energy in directly from the stars, the sun, the earth, and from one's sexual partner What I feel is that I have been able to absorb, be nourished by, and bring into my own life some of the real masculine, Yang, qualities of my partner. With my partner's Yang energy as a resource available to me, I have been able to be more assertive, more creative, and more outspoken. The exchange with my partner of the whole essence of his being has enabled me to amplify my own personality and to include his qualities.

Question: How has the male energy you absorbed affected your daily meditations?

Answer: I want to be more integrated, including integrating the male and female energies within myself. Becoming more integrated and more balanced is one of the benefits of this practice. Being able to exchange with my partner has really enhanced my spiritual growth.

The same energy that could have been lost at times in emotional confusion or through miscommunication has become an energy resource that is available for my own growth. There is clarity that is illuminating in terms of my emotional and spiritual life. It is also more refined energy.

My partner's energy is now available for my spiritual growth, and my energy is available for him.

Question: What do you feel is the highest level of this practice?

Answer: Refinement of one's own sexual, emotional, and mental energies into subtle spiritual energy and into a spiritual body that lives within the physical body yet is free to move anywhere in time and space is the highest level. The sexual practice conserves and refines the fuel, but it is within the Kan and Li meditations that the real alchemy occurs. The essence of the Kan and Li practice is fire and water male and female energies uniting creatively within each Tan Tien or center in the body.

Through the self-intercourse of Kan and Li, one impregnates oneself, nourishes the fetus, and finally gives birth to a spiritual child that dwells within. Then the challenge is to nourish the spiritual child with strong, refined energy and virtue through the ups and downs of daily living. And how does my partner fit into this? I enhance his self-generation as he helps me with mine.

Question: You can be both the mother and father of this spiritual child by having the additional help of outside masculine energy?

Answer: Yes. What I like so much about the Taoist practices is that in cultivating our own nature, we attain our fullest flowering and give birth to ourselves. With a partner in Dual Cultivation, there is obviously an added energy and mutual support in addition to joy and pleasure. I also know that I can cultivate my own sexual energy myself, and be creative with it.

Question: Do you feel the sexual cultivation practice is essential to your spiritual growth?

Answer: Yes, but it is not essential to have a partner. These practices can be done by a woman who has a commitment to celibacy as a way of utilizing her sexual energy for her own spiritual growth and directing the transformed energy toward service to others. For a woman who does want a partner eventually Single Cultivation allows her to take her time to choose her partner well without rushing into a relationship purely to satisfy sexual needs. So I would say Single Cultivation is essential. Dual Cultivation is valuable, but optional.

There is something else that I feel is very important since we are talking about the benefits. From the beginning these practices were very tranformative, enhancing my sense of being in control of my own energy and my own destiny. I have grown more responsible and able to use my energies creatively.

Question: Is the Tao all about controlling your emotions and energies? How does this figure in being effortless and flowing free?

Answer: I think about life as a river. Before I practiced Fusion and Ovarian Kung Fu, I felt in my emotional and sexual life as if I were a leaf on a current, and it was the current of circumstance that would sometimes direct me. Now, knowing these Taoist practices, I feel that t am more like a raft, and I can use the current for the purpose of following the river. When I look at my past and all the suffering that I went through in some of my emotional and sexual relationships, and I look at friends now, I see that the Taoist practices allow us to be in the river in a way that's harmonious and flowing without being knocked against the rocks. We are the navigators.

Question: Let's talk a little about the psychology of relationships. How do you feel this practice changes the psychology of the battle of the sexes?

Answer: I think it is essential for both partners to enter into a relationship with the intention of moving the energy up and fully sharing, because it is an exchange of energy designed to be redirected toward growth. This growth will naturally take its own direction, emotionally and spiritually. As the energy moves up during the practice, it takes care of itself. Everything else will flow naturally from that. The power struggle tends to dissolve. When things occur that must be clarified, the tools are available. It seems there is a harmony and a flow that is present that really extends far beyond the sexual act. There is also the other tremendous benefit of feeling attuned to the other person, wherever he might be.

Question: Why do you think this happens?

Answer: My experience is that as the energy moves up there are bondings, at the heart level, and the mental and spiritual level, and those bondings are very profound.

Question: I have some specific questions about the actual technique. Do you really feel the energy flow up the spine in very direct pathways? It seems when you are making love these energies all get mixed together: This is a little confusing.

Answer: I think there is an interesting distinction between practicing on my own, if I am stimulating myself, my whole being is totally involved with another person. More of my whole body gets aroused when I am with my partner. So when the energies move up, they are more likely to expand and to fill my whole body. When I am alone I have a clearer sense of the energy going up my spine. If I'm with my partner I have a sense of the energy moving up through my whole body. Sometimes I have the sense of not only my own energy but also of his, as one column or wave moving upward.

Question: Have you discovered any additional techniques to aid this sexual practice?

Answer: My lover and I have discovered certain things spontaneously. It requires a great deal more discipline for men to cultivate this practice than it does for women. For women, it is really control of the pelvic-floor muscles.

All I really need to do is contract my pelvic-floor muscles in the direction of my coccyx and tilt my pelvis slightly and the energy will just begin to move up. Sometime I will stroke up my partner's spine with my hand or he will stroke up my back as we are beginning to go into the resting phase. This gives us both the clear sense that we are directing the energy up. Sometimes we touch each other's heads on the crown, and this helps focus the energy there. The energy then begins to shower down. One of the most delicious and exquisite qualities of the Valley Orgasm is that the energy moves up the whole body and through the crown, sometimes moving out of the body and then showers down like an exquisitely delicious nectar showering down through all the cells and all the atoms of the body.

Question: Have you found the practice has increased or decreased your sexual desire?

Answer: My sexual desire is about the same, but I feel much more satisfied. Also, my perception of sex and sexual relationships has continued to expand. I feel I am very slowly moving toward my goal of being totally alive, making love with the whole universe in every movement. I feel immensely grateful to have a partner with whom to practice loving.

We feel that we are always together and whether we are physically together or apart, we can make love and share our energies. Our transformed sexual and emotional energies nourish our spirits and are shared with others as love.

Healing Love through the Tao

Cultivating Female Sexual Energy

Mantak Chia

Illustrated by Juan Li

The sexual guidance and exercises presented in this book are being introduced plainly to the Western public for the first time. For thousands of years Taoist Masters only taught these secrets to very small numbers of people (who were sworn to silence), in the royal courts and in esoteric circles. This Taoist Master, as a practitioner of this ancient sexology, feels the need to share this knowledge with the world.

There are two main practices which the author teaches women to cultivate and enhance their sexual energy. One is Ovarian Breathing, which can shorten menstruation, reduce cramps and compress more life-force energy (Chi) into the ovaries for more sexual power. Another, the Orgasmic Upward Draw, can be done solo or with one's sexual partner. When this practice is mastered one can experience a total body orgasm that is beyond ordinary vaginal orgasm without losing life-force energy.

There are two other preparatory exercises taught by the Master Mantak Chia. They are a series of exercises with an egg of wood or stone which is used to strengthen the urogenital and pelvic diaphragms, the glands, tendons and nervous system. These exercises lend themselves to titters by the uninformed, but in fact have been successfully practiced for thousands of years to enhance the potency and pleasure of the women fortunate enough to know about them.

Master Mantak Chia, born in Thailand, comes from the ancient lineage of Taoist Masters. Now based in Northern Thailand, he is also the author of Awaken Healing Energy through the Tao, Taoist Secrets of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy, Taoist Ways to Transform Stress into Vitality, Awaken Healing Light, Chi Self-Massage, Iron Shirt Chi Kung I, Bone Marrow Nei Kung, Fusion of the Five Elements I, Chi Nei Tsang I, Tao Yin, Tai Chi Chi Kung I, Chi Nei Tsang II, Multi-Orgasmic Man, Cosmic Healing I, Mutli-Orgasmic Couple and Cosmic Healing II.

For women of all ages, for women single, married or lesbian, for those who seriously want to cultivate their sexual energy.

I have come upon Master Chia's Taoist practice in my old age and find it the most satisfying and enriching practice of all those I have encountered in a long life of seeking and practicing.

About the Author

Mantak Chia

Master Mantak Chia

Master Mantak Chia is the creator of the Universal Tao System and is the director of the Universal Tao Center and Tao Garden Health Resort and Training Center in the beautiful northern countryside of Thailand. Since childhood he has been studying the Taoist approach to life. His mastery of this ancient knowledge, enhanced by his study of other disciplines, has resulted in the development of the Universal Tao System which is now being taught throughout the world.

Mantak Chia was born in Thailand to Chinese parents in 1944. When he was six years old, Buddhist monks taught him how to sit and "still the mind." While still a grammar school student, he learned traditional Thai boxing. He was then taught Tai Chi Chuan by Master Lu, who soon introduced him to Aikido, Yoga and broader levels of Tai Chi.

Years later, when he was a student in Hong Kong excelling in track and field events, a senior classmate named Cheng Sue-Sue introduced him to his first esoteric teacher and Taoist Master, Master Yi Eng (I Yun). At this point, Master Chia began his studies of the Taoist way of life in earnest. He learned how to circulate energy through the Microcosmic Orbit and, through the practice of Fusion of the Five Elements, how to open the other Six Special Channels. As he studied Inner Alchemy further, he learned the Enlightenment of the Kan and Li, Sealing of the Five Senses, Congress of Heaven and Earth and Reunion of Heaven and Man. It was Master Yi Eng who authorized Master Chia to teach and heal.

When Mantak Chia was in his early twenties he studied with Master Meugi in Singapore, who taught him Kundalini, Taoist Yoga and the Buddha Palm. He was soon able to clear blockages to the flow of energy within his own body. He learned to pass the life force energy through his hands also, so that he could heal Master Meugi's patients. He then learned Chi Nei Tsang from Dr. Mui Yimwattana in Thailand.

A while later, he studied with Master Cheng Yao-Lun who taught him the Shao-Lin Method of Internal Power. He learned the closely guarded secret of the organs, glands and bone marrow exercise known as Bone Marrow Nei Kung and the exercise known as Strengthening and Renewal of the Tendons. Master Cheng Yao-Lun's system combined Thai boxing and Kung Fu. Master Chia also studied at this time with Master Pan Yu, whose system combined Taoist, Buddhist and Zen teachings. Master Pan Yu also taught him about the exchange of Yin and Yang power between men and women, and how to develop the Steel Body.

To understand the mechanisms behind healing energy better, Master Chia studied Western anatomy and medical science for two years. While pursuing his studies, he managed the Gestetner Company, a manufacturer of office equipment and became well acquainted with the technology of offset printing and copying machines.

Using his knowledge of Taoism, combined with the other disciplines, Master Chia began teaching the Universal Tao System. He eventually trained other Instructors to communicate this knowledge and he established the Natural Healing Center in Thailand. Five years later, he decided to move to New York, where in 1979, he opened the Universal Tao Center. During his years in America, Master Chia continued his studies in the Wu system of Tai Chi with Edward Yee in New York.

Since then, Master Chia has taught tens of thousands of students throughout the world. He has trained and certified over 1,200 instructors and practitioners from all over the world. Universal Tao Centers and Chi Nei Tsang Institutes have opened in many locations in North America, Europe, Asia, and Australia.

In 1994, Master Chia moved back to Thailand, where he had begun construction of Tao Garden, the Universal Tao Training Center in Chiang Mai.

Master Chia is a warm, friendly and helpful man who views himself primarily as a teacher. He presents the Universal Tao System in a straightforward and practical manner, while always expanding his knowledge and approach to teaching. He uses a laptop computer for writing and is totally at ease with the latest computer technology.

Master Chia estimates that it will take thirty five books to convey the full Universal Tao System. In June 1990, at a dinner in San Francisco, Master Chia was honored by the International Congress of Chinese Medicine and Qi Gong (Chi Kung), who named him the Qi gong Master of the Year. He is the first recipient of this annual award.

In December 2000, the Tao Garden Health Resort and Universal Tao Training Center was completed with two Meditation Halls, two open air Simple Chi Kung Pavilions, indoor Tai Chi, Tao Tao Yin and Chi Nei Tsang Hall, Tai Chi Natural Swimming Pool, Pakua Communications Center with a complete Taoist Library, Internal World Class Weight Lifting Hall and complete 8 Court Recreational Facilities.

In February 2002, the Immortal Tao practices will be held at Tao Garden for the first time using the Dark Room technology creating a complete environment for the higher level Taoist practices.

He has previously written and published these Universal Tao books:

Important Notice

The practices described in this book have been done successfully for thousands of years by Taoists under individual instruction. Readers who undertake Bone Marrow Nei Kung without personal training by the Universal Tao must realize that certain of these practices, if improperly done, may cause injury or result in health problems.

The use of common sense is necessary, and you must strictly follow the instructions and heed the notices and warnings that accompany each exercise and practice.

If you have not had previous experience with moving energy in the body through meditation, you must realize that this process is real and necessary for your safety. Adverse health effects can be caused by leaving excess energy in the organs or head; therefore, it is particularly important to move this energy through the Microcosmic Orbit and to store it in the Tan Tien as prescribed in the instructions.

The Chi Weight Lifting practice described in Chapter Five is restricted to persons who have been individually trained in a Universal Tao program. It is explained here so that information on this practice is available, and also to serve as a guide for those who have had Universal Tao instruction. Anyone who undertakes these practices on the basis of this book does so entirely at his or her own risk.

We urge every reader to study the exercises carefully before beginning any practice. Do exercises which must be done together and in proper sequence, and strictly follow the instructions, notes, and warnings.

The Universal Tao is not and cannot be responsible for the consequences of any practice or misuse of the information in this book. Where the reader undertakes any exercise without strictly following the instructions, notes, and warnings, the responsibility must lie solely with the reader.

Acknowledgments

I wish to thank foremost those Taoist Masters who were kind enough to share their knowledge with me, never dreaming it would be so enthusiastically received by the Western world.

I thank the artist, Juan Li, for his illustrations and for the artwork on the cover of this book. I also thank the editors, Charles Soupios and Valerie Meszaros, for their suggestions and many long hours devoted to the completion of Bone Marrow Nei Kung.

Further, I wish to express my gratitude to the contributing editors, Michael Winn, Dennis O'Connor, Eric Edelstein, Juan Li, and particularly Ron Diana, all of whom contributed much to the technical aspects of this practice.

There were many other contributors who graciously offered their time and advice to help communicate this system, including Gunther Weil, Ph.D., Rylin Malone, and John-Robert Zielinski. Special thanks are extended to David Miller for overseeing the design and production, and to John Sillari and Marlene San Miguel Groner for proofreading the text.

Without my mother and my son Max, the book would have been academic. For their gifts, I offer my eternal gratitude and love.

Finally, the Universal Tao will remember Felix Morrow, publisher of Universal Tao Books, who died in May 1988 before the completion of Bone Marrow Nei Kung. We are sorry that he could not see the results of his valuable advice and assistance.

Words of Caution

The practices described in this book have been used successfully for thousands of years by Taoists trained by personal instruction. Readers should not undertake the practice without receiving personal transmission and training from a certified instructor of the Universal Tao, since certain of these practices, if done improperly, may cause injury or result in health problems. This book is intended to supplement individual training by the Universal Tao and to serve as a reference guide for these practices. Anyone who undertakes these practices on the basis of this book alone, does so entirely at his or her own risk.

The meditations, practices and techniques described herein are not intended to be used as an alternative or substitute for professional medical treatment and care. If any readers are suffering from illnesses based on mental or emotional disorders, an appropriate professional health care practitioner or therapist should be consulted. Such problems should be corrected before you start training.

Neither the Universal Tao nor its staff and instructors can be responsible for the consequences of any practice or misuse of the information contained in this book. If the reader undertakes any exercise without strictly following the instructions, notes and warnings, the responsibility must lie solely with the reader.

This book does not attempt to give any medical diagnosis, treatment, prescription, or remedial recommendation in relation to any human disease, ailment, suffering or physical condition whatsoever.

The Universal Tao is not and cannot be responsible for the consequences of any practice or misuse of the information in this book. If the reader undertakes any exercise without strictly following the instructions, notes, and warnings, the responsibility must lie solely with the reader.

The book does not give any diagnoses or suggestions for medication. It does provide a means to improve your health in order to overcome imbalances in your system and to provide a richly rewarding sexual experience. People who have high blood pressure, heart disease, or a generally weak condition, should proceed slowly in the practice, particularly Ovarian Breathing. If there is a medical condition, a medical doctor should be consulted.

Introduction

Bone Marrow Nei Kung is a Taoist art of internal cultivation which employs mental and physical techniques to rejuvenate the bone marrow, thereby enhancing the blood and nourishing the life-force within. It is offered by the Universal Tao as a modern approach to health and longevity, but its heritage can be traced back thousands of years to ancient China. The barriers between cultures and the exclusivity of Taoism had hidden its benefits from the West until the recent introduction of acupuncture. Today, Taoist methods are gaining respect throughout the world. The reason for this is simple: they appeal to the body, the mind, and the spirit.

The Universal Tao system is a "living" philosophy in its own right, which means that to use it in life increases one's understanding of it. Indeed, with so many philosophies delineating the "best" way to live, perhaps it is appropriate that the Taoist practices can be applied in this way. A philosophy that cannot be practiced in daily life will rarely be retained, and is therefore not truly alive. If you consider your own mental, physical and spiritual aspirations in this light, perhaps the philosophy of the Tao is already understood.

A. Self-enhancement Through Taoist Practices

One objective of the Universal Tao System is to create an environment conducive to self-cultivation. The idea of changing a government, a belief system, or a society has little value to Taoism because more can be achieved by nurturing the growth of the individual. Those who seek knowledge often inspire others to do the same. This may seem strange to those whose philosophies advocate service to God, or "self surrender." The validity of this concept, however, is not diminished simply because its ideals seem contrary. In fact, one might find that self-cultivation and self-surrender are different expressions of the same ideal as both foster the individual's spiritual growth.

The practice of Taoism builds internal strength and creates peace of mind. It is pointless to worry about the world's problems while still vulnerable to your own. Do not concern yourself with the lack of peace and harmony in your family or among your friends until you have established peace within yourself. Your capacity to help another human being depends upon the surplus of energy that you can channel towards that purpose. Such internal strength cannot be provided for the benefit of others unless you cultivate it within yourself first.

You can only share what you have in abundance. Otherwise, you will drain the energies of those around you as your needs become excessive. An emotion such as love exemplifies this truth. Taoism teaches that the body needs love from the inner self to survive and to nurture those energies that can be shared. Further, you cannot share the energy of love until it overflows beyond the needs of your body. In other words, you must love yourself to cultivate love for others.

In a spirit of altruism, people often demonstrate their desire to assist others beyond the point of necessity. This kind of "help" is detrimental to all concerned. Remember that the tradition of the Universal Tao does not tolerate self-righteousness and condescension among its students. These attitudes limit the freedom of others to choose their own paths in life The world must be accepted on its own terms, for we cannot change it. We have a responsibility, however, to change ourselves. If you can set an example for the rest of the world through your life's endeavors, then you have found the best way to create an impetus for change.

B. Decisions for Life

We assume that it is natural to age and to die, yet we often overlook the unnatural aspects of these processes by anticipating them. In truth, today's society simply lacks the education to understand how aging and death are choices we have made in our worldly endeavors. This is not to say that the human race is unknowingly immortal, but rather that we have far more control over these factors than we know. Death can be a choice in the sense that we can choose to live longer. Aging is a choice in that our bodies need not deteriorate as an effect of time. The effects of aging can be counteracted if we make the choice to do so. Certainly we all die, but we have forgotten that we all have options as to how and when.

Taoists choose to prolong life to create the best circumstances under which they can leave it. Since people know little about realities beyond physical existence, they often fear such knowledge, leaving it in the hands of God. This is how our race has learned survival under the most rigorous conditions of faith. However, this fear has often negated the inner knowledge that God is not responsible for mankind's spiritual search; man is responsible. In Taoism, destiny lies solely in the hands of the participant and not in the hands of God, for we choose our actions in life.

The Taoist practice of temporarily leaving the body to explore the higher realms is as old as the most ancient of civilizations. This need not involve any confrontation with religion. It is part of a philosophy of life using physical and meditative means to cultivate spiritual energy. In the practice of the Universal Tao, this philosophy is not considered to be a religion because it lacks the rituals and worship of deities normally associated with religion. Consider, however, that religion is not necessarily synonymous with spirituality, since our true spiritual nature underlies the beliefs we grow into. Taoist philosophy simply offers a means of spiritual growth without the necessity of pondering religious questions. In the search for truth, one can leave the questions in order to experience the answers.

For some people, the idea of planning to journey beyond what can be physically touched or seen is totally inappropriate. This is perfectly reasonable in terms of spiritual growth because there is much to be learned in the world that we know. There is no reason for anyone to suffer in this reality, when good health can be achieved through these techniques. If one so chooses, one can develop the beginning of a spiritual afterlife before physical death would normally occur. For those who prefer to cultivate only the physical aspects of life, the copious health benefits of the Tao should be rewarding enough. The choice is simple in any case as the system is now available to everyone.

Remember that there is no place in Taoism for the glorification of masters. They are not saints, devils, or deities. These teachers consider it a wasteful expenditure of energy for students to pay them anything more than a casual, but genuine, respect. Taoist philosophy suggests that no "middle-man" is worth the expense when we can find our own answers. The enlightenment we seek demands that our efforts be channeled directly into the spiritual paths we choose. Those who would teach should only be considered helpful guides who offer assistance rather than salvation.

There are many more disciplines available than we need to attain enlightenment. Our spiritual inclinations, therefore, must eventually focus upon choosing wisely rather than searching endlessly. A Taoist cannot rely upon the good graces of a spiritual hierarchy because it is one's own responsibility to learn what spiritual needs are and how to fulfill them. The physical life we have chosen has many tools to offer. The Tao is simply a finger pointing the way.

Preface

Chinese Secrets of Bone Power

By Michael Winn

When I began doing Bone Marrow Nei Kung exercises seven years ago, I had absolutely no feeling for my bones. They seemed hard, rigid, and dense, the very opposite of the qualities I was seeking to cultivate in myself through Tai Chi Chuan movements and meditation. I didn't know my bones were alive and growing every minute, that my life depended on the quality of blood they produced or that I could have a major effect on my health by interacting with them.

I was amazed and surprised that with even the simplest exercises like "Bone Breathing," my bones quickly responded with a wonderful feeling of just having sprung to life. They tingled and began to rhythmically purr like a cat. When I did Tai Chi Chuan, my flesh and organs would disappear, and I could feel my skeleton dancing lightly through the air.

Over the years, doing the same simple practice of breathing and spiraling my Chi around my bones, I am still literally "thrilled to the bone." After I practice "Hitting" my bones gently, it feels like a deep massage that keeps vibrating all day long. The practices have greatly reduced latent fears I had of aging and finding my bones reduced to peanut brittle. Instead, I have the opposite problem, and I'm tickled when my wife complains that my bones have gotten too heavy as she tosses off my arm resting on her in the middle of the night.

Any lingering skepticism I had was erased when I discovered that hitting my jawbone with the wire device for three minutes daily was the most effective cure I had ever found for relieving tight jaw muscles. Jaws have some of the most powerful muscles in the body which is why TMJ (Temporal Mandibular Joint) Syndrome (a symptom of which is tight jaw muscles) is so difficult to cure. Apparently vibrating the jawbone loosens the hold of the tense muscles. This method offers promising relief for the many people suffering from tight jaw muscles in high stress urban areas.

My bones and I have become the best of friends now that I've learned how to play with them and meditate on them. Bone Marrow Nei Kung has given me a practical way to connect the densest part of my physical body with the most subtle emanations of my spirit. The meaning of a Yang family classic Tai Chi Chuan training poem sudenly became clear once I understood the importance of moving from within our bones

> The mind moves the Chi
> So that it may sink deeply and penetrate the bones
> When the Chi flows freely,
> The body easily follows the mind

"Cleansing" my bone marrow was not always smooth sailing. In the beginning, the process of heavy detoxification was not always pleasant, and I occasionally felt ill for a day or two. There were psychological adjustments as well. Exercises like "Chi Weight Lifting" with the sexual organs and the Hitting practice seemed a bit far out at first. I cracked a lot of nervous jokes about religious fanatics flagellating themselves with whips, and I secretly wondered if I had fallen prey to same extreme teaching.

Having practiced these exercises for almost seven years now, I can assure the reader that the Bone Morrow Nei Kung practices are legitimate exercises for physical and spiritual health. The ancient Chinese were incredibly precise, even scientific in their methods of tapping bone power. Mantak Chia hay taken this one step further by integrating modern scientific knowledge of bone chemistry with the ancient knowledge of Chi functioning in the human bones and body.

The name "Bone Marrow Nei Kung" sounds pretty mysterious and esoteric. Master Chia originally taught it as an advanced level of "Iron Shirt Chi Kung." It may help to understand the cultural context of these Chinese terms. In China there are thousands of different "Chi Kung" practices taught by martial artists and meditation masters. Chi Kung literally means "practicing with the breath," which can include any exercise that uses breathing to energize the body. The physical breath activates the "Chi," also interpreted as "subtle breath," which generates increased physical and psychic strength.

Chi Kung is still so popular that on a recent trip to China I saw hundreds of Chinese flock to circus-like traveling road shows that gave Chi Kung top billing. These Chi Kung artists, with no apparent muscular buildup, perform feats like bending thick steel rods pushed into the soft spot on their necks. They break bricks on their heads, let trucks drive over them, and resist sharp knives with their bare skin.

These are high levels of physical accomplishment, but unfortunately they miss the real point of Chi Kung, which is to prepare the body for higher spiritual energies. Through Kung Fu movies and Chi Kung showmen, the practice of Chi Kung has been glorified as a path to superhuman physical power. This frightens off ordinary people from learning the true practices which are simple and give great benefits to health.

"Nei Kung" is a very close relative to Chi Kung. It means "practicing with your internal power" and implies building body-mind power without using physical breathing techniques. Mental concentration, internal imaging, and development of a deep inner sensing of psychophysical processes are the marks of Nei Kung techniques.

Most of the methods of internal alchemy taught at the Universal Tao Centers--the Inner Smile, Microcosmic Orbit, Fusion of the Five Elements, Kan and Li--are all "Nei Kung" techniques. Perhaps because they are more subtle than Chi Kung methods, the Nei Kung methods are fewer in number, and traditionally many have been kept very secret.

When Master Chia visited Taiwan in 1987, he discovered that the going price to learn Bone Marrow Nei Kung was about four thousand U.S. dollars for ten hours of instruction. Plus you had to take an oath of absolute secrecy not to teach anyone else. Master Chia had already learned the practice in Hong Kong more than a decade earlier from Master Cheng Yao-Lun.

When Master Chia learned the method of "Cleansing the Bone Marrow," the price was years of slavish devotion until your teacher, or "Sifu," entrusted you with the secrets. When he completed his training, it was Chia's very impatience with this slow process that inspired him to publish these closely guarded secrets to benefit the thousands of Westerners seeking accurate and practical instruction in Chinese internal arts.

The previously secret Bone Marrow Nei Kung methods of this book are the same ones associated with stories of masters achieving an "iron shirt" or building a "steel body." Contrary to movie legend, this is not a superman body of hardened flesh and muscle, but the inner strength of a body whose bones and organs are so packed with Chi energy that it resists aging and disease. The resilience to withstand the physical stress of hard blows or sudden falls comes from packing the fasciae with Chi that helps the body to "bounce off" outside forces.

Bone Marrow Nei Kung does generate tremendous amounts of Chi, and this makes it a dangerous practice for overzealous students who lack the self discipline lo refine this Chi through meditation. The body can overheat from excess energy, and meditation is the safety valve that transforms this raw energy back into its original spirit or "shen."

This is why in the Universal Tao System it is necessary to learn the Microcosmic Orbit Meditation before one even begins generating additional energy through Chi Kung. Without some way to refine and use the energy, what is the point of cultivating internal power?

I know one advanced student who eagerly did the Chi Weight Lifting exercises of Bone Marrow Nei Kung to generate more sexual energy. He then vibrated it into his bones with the device used in the Hitting practice. He was lifting very heavy weights from his genitals, far in excess of the ten pounds recommended in this book. He was so addicted to his practice that he would carry a suitcase full of weights with him wherever he traveled.

The student made the serious mistake of not meditating to assimilate all of the energy he was creating. He began having dreams that various creatures and people were feeding on him, and he started to become very paranoid. He finally quit the practice altogether after a psychic told him that many low level spirits were parasitically absorbing his excess sexual energy. He quit lifting excessive weights and his energy returned to normal. This is a bizarre and somewhat incredible story, but it should serve as a warning to people who tend to go overboard on a new thing.

Even masters are not exempt from the dangers of over-zealousness. The Taiwanese teacher who was selling the Chi Weight Lifting techniques for thousands of dollars claimed to be able to briefly lift 300 pounds from his genitals. It proved to be too much for him as he recently died at a very young age, allegedly from a blood clot in his testicles that may have travelled up to his brain. Had he chosen to be more practical, using light weights in a regimen balanced with meditation, he might still he alive today.

In ancient China the Taoists who practiced internal cultivation of Chi saw a deep "bone consciousness" as an essential step on their long journey to realizing their immortality. According to the classic Taoist texts, when the postnatal Chi--all the energy acquired by food, sex, thoughts, and emotions since birth--circulates in the Microcosmic Orbit, it stirs loose the prenatal Chi stored in the bone marrow and the brain.

It is this prenatal Chi, also called pre-heaven or primordial Chi, that is refined into spiritual consciousness and gives birth to the immortal embryo in the lower abdomen. This grows up to become the spiritual child and eventually crystallizes into the “light body’ or “immortal body” of the spiritually mature human.

For the Taoists, the bones were a secret key to stabilizing or “grounding” the life of the spirit within the human body. Before this could be done, the bones had to be cleansed, and their vibratory rate--bone consciousness--had to be raised to a more refined level. The movement of Chi in the bones was used to amplify the process of cleansing and purifying the Chi flowing through the meridian system, blood, internal organs, glands, and nervous system.

The bones create the vertical structure in man which allows special energy channels to function in the body such as the “Chung-mo,” which is the thrusting route in the center of the body, and the “belt routes” spiraling around the body. These channels allow man to act as an antenna and receive energy from the electromagnetic fields of the earth, moon, sun, and stars--the stepping stones to our sense of divinity.

In this light, an entire book on Bone Marrow Nei Kung does not seem like such an impossibly esoteric topic. A few years ago this topic would have drawn interest from only select circles of martial artists. Yet Bone Marrow Nei Kung practices can be done by ordinary people who simply wish to be more embodied, more grounded, and healthier in their physical being. These practices were once extremely secret in old China, but today the secrets of the Tao are opening like a flower, and the sweet fragrance is available to anyone drawn to it.

Modern popular literature on bone health is limited mostly to diet and mineral supplement advice on preventing osteoporosis. This disease, which makes bones brittle with age as they become depleted of calcium, is a major tragedy for the elderly, especially women after menopause. Recent studies show that calcium supplements are of dubious value in stopping osteoporosis.

According to scientific studies, what does reverse the process of osteoporosis are exercises that put gentle pressure on the bones and keep them fit, combined with the proper hormonal balance in the body. Bone Marrow Nei Kung gives the bones exercise, increases bone density, and the Sexual Energy Massage technique helps to stimulate hormonal production. Millions of women would benefit from to these exercises as a preventative measure against osteoporosis.

One exception to the gap in modern literature on bones is Gabriel Cousen's landmark book, Spiritual Nutrition and the Rainbow Diet (Cassandra Press, 1986). He points out that our bones are the only solid crystalline substance in our bodies and that scientists have actually been able to measure the electromagnetic fields that bones receive and send to our organs: meridians, blood cells, and nerves. The electrical generating ability of bones is called the "piezo-electric effect" and has been documented by a number of scientific studies. He states:

"The brain, nervous system, and heart also give off electromagnetic fields that resonate with our bones and other crystalline like structures. The crystalline bone structure then amplifies and radiates this energy and information to the rest of the system down to the cellular and subcellular crystalline structures."

This suggests the bones are nothing less than the tuning fork for our whole body. It is the solidity of the bones that makes them such stable transmitters of the deep, rhythmic pulsating energy that biologically connects our smallest atoms to the primordial rhythms of the stars. Bone Marrow Nei Kung gives us a way to systematically increase the purity and range of our body's tuning fork so it hums with a crystal clear vibration.

Bone consciousness has manifested in a variety of other interesting ways outside of the martial arts. In the mainstream Chinese culture a deep reverence for bones is revealed in the great importance placed on burial and ancestor worship. If the bones of your parents or grandparents are buried near a disturbing environment with noise and traffic, or in a site with the wrong elemental balance of water, wind, mountain, etc., then your own life will be disturbed.

According to Chinese theory, this "bone magic" works because the vibrational frequency of your body is very close to the vibrational frequencies of your parents' bodies. If their bones are disturbed, your bones will also be disturbed as we always remain in subtle communication with those closest to ourselves. Our bones never die. They continue acting as transmitters for the departed spirit.

Our bones are like invisible wands concealed within the shrouds of our flesh. We wave them about in life like an orchestra conductor invoking the magic of the higher harmonies. It is when we get old that our bones feel empty and brittle, without the sparkle and dash needed to play life's symphony. And small wonder since we pound them, run and joggle them, use and abuse them in a thousand ways without even giving a thought to making them stronger. Gravity adds its stress by pulling down on them without allowing any relief.

Bone Marrow Nei Kung offers an opportunity to explore the core of our physical body and to learn how to root our spiritual being within that solid physical anchor. The benefits are universal, teaching us to use the unconscious power deep within our bones and make it available for mundane everyday use, as well as for spiritual goals.

The next step is up to us. We must experiment with the Bone Marrow Nei Kung exercises until we feel this ancient knowledge of Chi as a living presence in our bones. As Mantak Chia is fond of saying, "You do it, you get it."

Chapter I
Understanding Bone Marrow Nei Kung

A. Internal Discipline vs External Exercise

The Western world generally believes that daily physical exercise helps to slow the aging process. In our society physical fitness is gauged according to the external manifestations of arduous training. An example of this is the trend towards muscular development through weight lifting. Athletic competition has also influenced many of our concepts of health and well-being. If one considers, however, that body builders and athletes enjoy the same life span as the average human, one might reconsider the assumption that they are the most "physically fit."

The professional athletes we admire expend enormous amounts of energy to attain top positions in their sports. As they overdraw on their resources for long periods of time, their internal organs often lose the capability to feed such exhaustive energy requirements. The inexorable effects of aging then impede them until they can no longer compete. Some may delay the exhaustion of their energy sources through vitamins and nutrition, but their digestive capabilities usually decrease with age, making a dependency upon food and vitamins even less promising. Nutrition and physical exercise are not comprehensive approaches to health, even when they are combined.

In your own fitness training, you may be indirectly exercising the internal organs and glands; however, if you do not emphasize their cultivation above and beyond that of the muscular system, you can ultimately do more damage than good. The organs and glands nourish every function of the body just as the bone marrow nourishes them through the production of blood. Still, we unknowingly tax the internal system beyond its limits because we believe that muscular development should take precedence. Without the energy supplied by the internal organs and glands, there can be no lasting muscular development. In short, muscular strength and stamina may not be the best medium by which to judge overall physical health.

The Taoist approach to health is very different from Western concepts of exercise because the Taoist disciplines are always internally focused. These exercises, therefore, emphasize the cultivation of the organs and glands. After the organs and glands have been enhanced, the needs of the tendons, bones, and muscles are fulfilled accordingly. Bone Marrow Nei Kung replenishes the blood supply and strengthens the internal system, thereby improving every aspect of the body.

Energizing the bone marrow is crucial to the development of that internal power which has a lasting quality unknown to external systems of health. We have all heard that inner beauty lasts when outer beauty begins to fade. The Taoist practices cultivate inner strength and lasting beauty, as they enhance the external aspects of the body.

B. Bone Marrow Nei Kung and the Practice of the Universal Tao

1. Internal Energy Known as Chi

Taoists describe the world as an interaction of positively and negatively charged electromagnetic energies. “Chi” is an overall term used for these energies, which comprise the ultimate nourishment derived from food, air, moon, sun, and stars. Chi is also generated within our bodies by the organs and glands, and it extends around us as part of our emanation. This is why the cultivation of our organ, and glands is so important to the enhancement of our life-force energies.

Just as the positive and negative terminals of a battery must both be engaged to generate power in an electrical circuit, the “Yin” and “Yang” qualities of Chi must both be engaged for the proper functioning of the body. Yin is analogous to the negative charge, and represents a cool, gentle energy often associated with femininity. Yang is the positive charge, and represents a hot, volatile energy that is characteristic of masculinity. Both qualities can be found within us, although there is often a lack of harmony between them. The knowledge of Yin and Yang and their proper balance is critical to our daily lives because an imbalance can create a negative effect.

Chi-also known as “Qi” is a constant factor in every part of our lives. Unfortunately, we often lose it at a faster rate than we can amass it. As our internal sources of energy are not inexhaustible, we can unknowingly drain them beyond repair, creating the possibility of painful aging and an early demise. If the organs and glands could regenerate themselves, however, such possibilities would become remote. Fortunately, what we have sacrificed of our bodies in our worldly pursuits can often be replaced through the absorption and recycling of Chi. In other words, this energy can be used to replenish its sources within our bodies so that we can regenerate our internal systems and better maintain them.

Chi cultivation is the underlying purpose of the Universal Tao. This is the essence of all that a practitioner of this system aspires to. If one wishes to be a healer, success depends upon the ability to channel energy through the hands. If one wishes to be an athlete, success depends upon the ability, to convert energy into strength and endurance. If one wishes to he free of negative influences, success depends upon the ability to transform negative energy into positive energy. One who seeks enlightenment is searching for the highest source of all energy.

2. Bone Marrow Nei Kung in Theory

The purpose of Bone Marrow Nei Kung is to regenerate the blood-producing red marrow of the bones to enhance the blood and the sources of Chi within the body. The system consists of five practices related to the following functions:

a. Breathing in energy from external sources
b. Drawing in and circulating sexual energy throughout the body
c. Vibrating the bones to open their pores for energy absorption
d. Compressing the combined energies into the bones to eliminate fat
e. Enhancing the nervous and lymphatic systems while detoxifying the skin

The techniques of Bone Marrow Nei Kung reverse the effects of aging by regenerating the bone marrow with sexual energy while eliminating the accumulated fat which restricts the production of blood. Exercises are also used to detoxify the body and improve the functions of the nervous and lymphatic systems. Finally, a sixth practice is used by advanced practitioners to further strengthen the internal organs and glands by exercising the fascial layers which surround them. A higher concentration of sexual energy--referred to as Ching Chi--is released into the body through this technique.

Men have reported increased strength, endurance, and sexual powers upon mastering Bone Marrow Nei Kung. Women have reported that the Hitting techniques, used in conjunction with other exercises, are a perfect weapon against cellulite. Bone Marrow Nei Kung is also an excellent medium for weight control as it generates intense heat within the body to burn up large quantities of fat. This system can he used to enhance one's capabilities in all activities, including martial arts, running, weight lifting, football, aerobics, dance, and so on.

The exercises of Bone Marrow Nei Kung should not be considered a strict regimen. Progress is not contingent upon arduous practice except in a martial arts context where the goals are different. Those who cannot devote much time to esoteric disciplines should still be able to progress slowly but steadily to better health. Upon developing a reasonable proficiency with these techniques, practice can be curtailed to every other day, if necessary, to maintain that level of proficiency. These exercises and their prerequisites should only take from 35 minutes to one hour to complete.

C. Overview of Bone Marrow Nei Kung and Related Disciplines

1. Practices of Bone Marrow Nei Kung

Bone Marrow Nei Kung--sometimes referred to as Iron Shirt Chi Kung III--consists of the five interrelated practices. Chi Weight Lifting is a sixth technique described in Chapter Five for advanced practitioners. With the exception of Chi Weight Lifting, all of the following exercises, including the supplemental practices, should be used in your training schedule to some extent. If you wish to receive instruction in these disciplines, it is advised that you contact the Universal Tao for information on the seminars in which Bone Marrow Nei Kung is taught.

a. The Bone Breathing Process: Bone Breathing uses the power of the mind with deep, relaxed inhalations to establish an inward flow of external energy through the fingertips and toes. This energy is used to complement previously stored sexual energy which is released into the body through the Sexual Energy Massage or Chi Weight Lifting and then compressed into the bones. The external energy helps to eliminate the fat accumulated in the bone marrow, thereby assisting in the marrow's regeneration. Bone Breathing may be used with or without Bone Compression, but they are presented as a combined practice in this book.

b. Bone Compression: After external energy has been breathed into a particular area, the muscle contractions of this process force the combined energies into the hones to burn the fat not of the marrow. While Bone Breathing is a mental process used in conjunction with long, soft breath cycles, Bone Compression is a physical process of contracting the muscles, thereby squeezing Chi into the bones. Combining the mental with the physical in this way enhances the results of Bone Marrow Nei Kung.

c. The purpose of the Sexual Energy Massage is to release Ching Chi from the genitals so that it can be disseminated throughout the body and absorbed into the bones. (The term "Ching Chi" actually refers to sexual energy and sexual hormones combined.) The fingers massage the genitals while meditative breathing is used to draw the sexual energy and hormones upward from the genitals into the body. The genitals are later replenished by the rejuvenated organs and the return flow of the microcosmic Orbit Meditation, described in Chapter Six.

Although the combined energies from sexual and external sources are used to burn fat out of the bones, only Ching Chi can regenerate bone marrow. The massage techniques release tremendous amounts of Ching Chi into the body for this purpose. The release of sexual hormones into the bloodstream also stimulates the pineal and pituitary glands. Western science believes that the pituitary gland produces an aging hormone in the absence of this stimulation, contributing to an early death.

d. The first Hitting technique has two applications: one uses a form of compression to force Chi into the bones, the other works without any muscle tension, “Hitting with Packing” amplifies the Bone Compression practice using a special device to strike each successive area of the body or limbs that is being compressed. The device creates vibrations throughout the body which open the pores of the bones to receive condensed energy. Specific lines correlating with known acupuncture meridians are hit along their respective lengths to open their channels for the energy flow.

In the second application, “Hitting to Detoxify,” the striking device is applied without any form of Bone Compression, and the muscles stay relaxed. This detoxifies the body, helping it to absorb Chi. Hitting to Detoxify is recommended for beginning students because it has a less overwhelming effect on the body than the packing method. In both applications, Hitting is one of the most efficient techniques available for detoxifying the body.

e. The last technique, “Hitting with Rattan Sticks,” employs a similar striking sequence to stimulate the nervous and lymphatic systems. The sticks do not emphasize vibrations as the wire device does, but the shock of their contact strengthens skin, muscles, tendons, and bones. They should not be applied to the bones directly.) This method also detoxifies the skin, thereby improving the complexion. Hitting with Rattan Sticks completes the basic procedures of Bone Marrow Nei Kung.

f. Chi Weight Lifting is the last practice described in this text because of its advanced nature and its dependence on the other disciplines. It is similar to the Sexual Energy Massage, but weights are used to increase the pressure on the genitals. The procedure should not be attempted until all of the massage techniques in Chapter Three have been thoroughly mastered. Chi Weight Lifting differs from the Sexual Energy Massage in that it develops strength in the layers of fasciae surrounding the organs and glands. These tissues are engaged to counteract the downward pull of the weight against the genitals, thereby creating an upward flow of energy from the sexual center.

Note: Chi Weight Lifting is included herein to document its practice for instructors and trained students. It is not recommended for beginners or casual readers without a full understanding of its applications as taught at Universal Tao seminars.

g. Using the Bone Marrow Nei Kung Practices

(1) Practitioners usually begin with Bone Breathing and Bone Compression to draw external energies into the body. (In advanced practice, you may prefer to use these steps only during the Hitting with Packing process.)

(2) Either the Sexual Energy Massage or Chi Weight Lifting techniques are then used to release Ching Chi, which is combined with the external energies.

(3) Finally, the Hitting practices must follow the release of sexual energy. First the vibrations are created to help the body assimilate the combined energies into the bones. Then the rattan sticks are used to strengthen the skin and nerves.

2. Required Supplemental Practices for Bone Marrow Nei Kung

The Universal Tao employs many other disciplines integral to Bone Marrow Nei Kung. Most of these practices can be used alone; however, a working knowledge of them all, including certain meditations, is necessary for Bone Marrow Nei Kung. It is the working knowledge of these other disciplines that creates a safer practice. After learning the required supplements, you may emphasize particular aspects of your training according to the needs of your body.

Tremendous energy is released during practice, which can cause an imbalance if one does not know how or where to channel and store an overflow of Chi. This could create problems that would require an acupuncturist to correct in order to avoid dangerous side effects. As a rule, hot energy is never allowed to remain in the organs and glands because it can overheat them. The supplemental practices used with Bone Marrow Nei Kung remove such an overflow of energy to the proper storage areas.

a. Microcosmic Orbit and the Inner Smile

A common denominator of all the physical disciplines, as well as the mental and spiritual work, is the Microcosmic Orbit Meditation, which is initiated by the “Inner Smile.” (See Chapter Six.) In relation to Bone Marrow Nei Kung, the flow of the Microcosmic Orbit is necessary for channeling sexual energy. (Fig. 1.1) Ching Chi is drawn up from the lower centers into this flow and distributed throughout the body. In this way, meditation assists in creating blood cells by circulating Chi to enhance bone marrow.

Fig. 1.1 Stations of the Microcosmic Orbit

Warning: To practice without the Microcosmic Orbit Meditation can cause irregular heartbeat, chest congestion, headaches, pain in the chest or back, and other problems. This meditation is a prerequisite for Bone Marrow Nei Kung. Ignore it at your own peril.

b. Healing Love

Another important exercise for Bone Morrow Nei Kung is the Healing Love practice used in all sexual activities. The loss of sexual energy, or "Ching Chi," depletes the bone marrow and the vital organs which must replace what was lost. Unless one learns how to retain this energy and build up a healthy reserve, the organs and glands must sacrifice one third of their energy to replenish the genitals which produce Ching Chi.

The Healing Love methods for both men and women involve drawing in orgasmic energy and channeling it upward to higher centers, thereby reversing the outward flow of Ching Chi that is normally released during sex. When used in conjunction with the Sexual Energy Massage, these techniques combine to release tremendous amounts of Ching Chi upward into the body, making this practice very useful to Bone Marrow Nei Kung. When used alone, Healing Love methods release abundant sexual energy which can then be stored and cultivated for mental, physical, and spiritual use.

Sexual energy can be transformed into life-force energy, compounded regularly by the Healing Love practice. The use of these methods not only improves the internal organs and glands but also enhances one's sexual satisfaction. The libido lasts for many more hours during sex, and for many more years in one's life. Furthermore, sexual stimulation reaches far beyond the conventional idea of a "climax."

c. Iron Shirt Chi Kung I

The postures of Iron Shirt I can be an excellent medium for the practice of Bone Marrow Nei Kung. In the Iron Shirt techniques, one learns to compress energy into the fasciae surrounding the organs and glands. These protective sheaths of tissue are most conducive to the Chi flow that nourishes the internal system.

Compression of Chi creates its storage space within the fasciae as the fat lodged within the muscles, tendons, and bones is purged and then transformed into more energy. A brief synopsis of the related postures is included in Appendix 1. Iron Shirt Chi Kung I is detailed in the Universal Tao book of the same name.

d. Six Healing Sounds

The Six Healing Sounds are produced sub-vocally and correspond to specific organs: the lungs, kidneys, liver, heart, and spleen. The sixth sound is the "Triple Warmer" which evenly distributes energy throughout the body. When used independently of Bone Marrow Nei Kung, each sound creates its own energy to enhance and detoxify the internal system. All six sounds and their related postures decelerate the body after practice and remove excess heat accumulated in vital areas. These exercises are fully explained in Appendix 1 and also in the Universal Tao book, Taoist Ways to Transform Stress into Vitality.

D. Importance of Internal Exercises

Master of Internal Strength

There once was a master who was very powerful. Many people wanted to learn from him, but he was difficult to have an audience with. This master felt that, unless one had patience, no one was worthy of his lessons. There was a very determined man, however, who waited three years, day after day, to see him. But the master would only appear to discourage those who waited. He would send them away, and they would all leave, except for this one man. Finally, the master became curious about this man who remained each day only to receive such disappointment.

One day the master asked the man, "If I tell you to do something, will you do it?" "I will try my best," the man answered. So the master told him to go over to a tree that grew nearby and pull it out of the ground for him. The man looked at the tree and decided to try it, since this was better than waiting for the treatment that the other people would get. He went over to the tree, grabbed it, and pulled at it. He did this day after day, year after year.

With each passing year, the tree grew bigger, but with each passing year, the man developed more internal strength. Finally one day, after ten years of daily effort, he became very determined to pull that tree out. He felt his body fill with Chi as he approached the tree and grabbed it. His feet were firmly planted on the ground, and he was wrapped around the tree in such a way that his internal strength could best be applied. With great force, he finally pulled the tree out.

The man went to the master and excitedly reported his great triumph. The master said that was fine, and then told him to leave. The man was very surprised and disturbed by the master's response. It appeared that he had been shunned without ever learning from this master after all. The master looked at him and said, "If you can pull that tree out of the ground, whoever in the world would want to fight you?" The man smiled upon realizing that he had indeed been taught what he most needed to know: patience, self-discipline, and internal power. (Fig. 1.2)

Fig. 1.2 Embracing the Tree

1. Chi flow assists the Heart.

This system regards the heart as both a muscle and a vital organ. Taoists would agree that even a strong heart should never be overworked. The heart never truly rests from the time it begins to beat. As blood carries oxygen and nutrients throughout the body, its circulation can be a burden to the heart if physical stress remains constant. (Fig. 1.3) When energized with Chi, however, the blood becomes lighter and easier to move, allowing the heart to work less and maintain a higher energy level. The practice of Bone Marrow Nei Kung helps to develop the Chi flow while improving the heart's capabilities.

Fig. 1.3 The more we push the heart, the more we exhaust its energy.

2. Mind moves Energy

The flow of Chi can be controlled by the mind to greatly reduce the work of the heart. If, for example, your hands and legs are cold, you may concentrate and direct the Chi to flow with the blood to warm those areas. "Pulsing" is a meditation technique used to make the blood flow with less dependence on the pumping of the heart. Pulsing can direct the Chi to help circulate blood throughout the body. The method amplifies the pulse at the crown and at the perineum so that blood can be directed from all three points rather than from the heart alone. This practice is used to assist the heart in Bone Marrow Nei Kung, and it exemplifies some of the physical manifestations of meditation.

Fig. 1.4 A healthy body has an internal pressure of fourteen and seven-tenths pounds of pressure per square inch (P.S.I.) Any reduction of this pressure increases the chances of illness and overall weakness.

3. Developing Chi Pressure

Chi pressure is important in Bone Marrow Nei Kung as energy is compressed into the cavities of the body to provide for the vital functions of the internal system. A healthy body has a Chi pressure level of about fourteen and seven-tenths pounds per square inch. When we are sick, or become old, this pressure decreases, and the body reacts like a car tire losing air. (Fig. 1.4) Bone Marrow Nei Kung employs special breathing techniques, first introduced in Iron Shirt I, to double the Chi pressure in and around the organs and glands. This is like creating an additional, powerful heart to improve one's internal capabilities. The Chi pressure also protects the body from internal injury resulting from external forces.

4. Circulating and Storing Chi through Acupuncture Meridians

During the development of acupuncture, the Taoist masters discovered a network of pathways through which energy could be distributed to all areas of the body. Modern science describes these pathways as conductors of electric current with storage compartments of electromagnetic energy. The Taoists simply referred to them as routes, meridians, or channels. As Chi flows through each channel, it energizes the particular organs associated with that channel. In the practice of Bone Marrow Nei Kung, energy is conducted through these acupuncture meridians to enhance the organs, glands, fasciae, muscles, and bones, rejuvenating the entire body.

5. Chi and the Crystalline Properties of Bones in Western Research

Dr. Gabriel Cousens has compiled many documented studies pertaining to the crystalline properties of the human bone structure. In his book, Spiritual Nutrition and the Rainbow Diet, he reports that bones can receive and emanate electromagnetic fields in the same manner as other crystalline structures. These fields can affect cell nutrition, cell functions, enzyme activity, energy transfer, and many other internal activities. Bone-generated electromagnetic fields relate directly to the assimilation of nutrient energy, which means that they affect our intake of energy from external sources such as food.

The fact that externally created electromagnetic fields can affect the crystalline properties of bones might explain how a small electrical current can be used to help the bones heal themselves. Calcium lost in osteoporosis has been replaced through this technique. It is unknown how this process works, but Taoists suggested its use long before electrical impulses could be generated by anything other than the body.

These findings may someday help the West to accept Taoist ideas about the use of energy as a healing tool. Research has already confirmed the effects of electromagnetic energy on bone functions, and Taoist concepts seem to intrigue Western medicine as electrical current is now being used to heal bones. (Bone Breathing and Bone Compression exemplify how this process was originally employed.) It would appear that Taoist practices offer an approach to healing similar to electro medicine, but in fact these practices actually prevent bone problems and other disorders from ever occurring.

6. Taoist Practices strengthen the Immune System.

Western science is conducting studies to ascertain the effects of Taoist methods--and those of various other disciplines--on the immune system. Research is being conducted in the fields of psycho-neuroimmunology, behavioral medicine, and movement therapy. So far there is no evidence that would establish any single discipline as a comprehensive approach to strengthening the immune system. One may conclude, however, that self-induced healing, as advocated by Taoists, is creating a foundation for such a program. This ancient approach has illuminated the link between the immune system and the power of the mind. The “Inner Smile” meditation clearly exemplifies the benefits of this connection. (Fig. 1.5 (a) and (b))

7. Cultivation of Sexual Energy leads to Personal Power.

Nurturing Ching Chi through Bone Marrow Nei Kung and Healing Love practices eventually brings great personal power as sexual energy begins to radiate from the body. This energy has a magnetic quality that attracts people. It nourishes those who do not have the knowledge to store Chi for themselves, but it can also attract those who have other energies to share. In other words, you may attract the yin counterpart lo your yang energy or vice versa. When such

(b) The superficial and deep lymphatic drainage of the head, arms, and torso is increased by Hitting with Rattan Sticks.

Fig. 1.6 Spirit Body

a meeting occurs the abundance of sexual energy becomes even more important as it can be shared to create the foundation for a spiritual bonding. Two can share in this joy when the energies overflow from both participants.

8. Developing the Spirit Body with Internal Energy

During its journey through the Microcosmic Orbit, sexual energy transforms into life force energy, which ultimately transforms into spiritual energy. This final transformation yields the raw material for the creation of a "spirit body," which is used as a vehicle for the ethereal being within each of us. (Fig. 1.6) This metaphysical part of ourselves is vulnerable unless we use our energies to fortify it. By creating the spirit body, the spirit is strengthened and given a safe means of transportation to and from other realms. The cultivation of this vehicle leads to the ultimate experience of the Tao.

E. Summary

1. Bone Marrow Nei Kung was created to fulfill several functions leading to the rejuvenation of the bone marrow and the enhancement of the blood:

a. Breathing in energy from external sources.
b. Drawing in and circulating sexual energy throughout the body.
c. Vibrating the bones to open their pores for energy absorption.
d.Compressing the combined energies into the bones to eliminate fat.
e.Enhancing the nervous and lymphatic systems while detoxifying the skin.

2. These functions are served by the following practices:

a. Bone Breathing draws in external energy through the fingertips and the toes and circulates it throughout the body.
b. Bone Compression combines external and sexual energies while compressing them into the bones.
c. The Sexual Energy Massage releases Ching Chi upward into the body so that it can be used to regrow the bone marrow.
d. The first Hitting form creates vibrations which open the pores of the bones to absorb external and sexual energies as the body detoxifies.
e. The second Hitting form improves the nervous system and the external aspects of the body as the skin detoxifies.
f. Chi Weight Lifting releases the highest concentration of sexual energy and hormones as it strengthens the fasciae surrounding the organs.

3. Four practices must be used with Bone Marrow Nei Kung:

a. The Inner Smile and Microcosmic Orbit meditations energize the body and open channels for the circulation of energy to the organs and glands.

b. The Healing Love practice retains sexual energy for healing the internal organs and glands as the brain is stimulated.

c. The Iron Shirt I practice packs Chi into the layers of fasciae surrounding the organs and glands, thereby storing energy for their use.

d. The Six Healing Sounds decelerate the body after practice and release excessive heat from the internal system.

4. Energy known as “Chi” is important because:

a. Chi can regrow the bone marrow and energize the blood.

b. The mind can move Chi to assist the heart and heal the body.

c. Chi pressure creates strength and resilience within the body.

d. Chi can strengthen the immune system, increase one’s sexual and personal power, and enhance one’s spiritual perspectives.

Chapter II
Healthy Bones: Bone Breathing and Bone Compression

There are many health benefits to bone Breathing and Bone Compression. These techniques can be used independently of the other Bone Marrow Nei Kung exercises. They can be practiced anywhere, even while riding on a bus or waiting on line, as long as there are no serious distractions. They help to remove fat from the bone marrow and create space for the marrow to grow, thereby increasing one's ability to produce blood cells. They also relieve tension in the muscles, permitting Chi and blood to circulate freely.

The spinal cord benefits from the energy Bone Breathing draws into it. People with back problems can concentrate on Bone Breathing in and around the spinal cord to relieve discomfort in the area while strengthening the back. Back tension and pain are released from the body as the vertebrae are gently separated and cushioned by the Chi.

The overall results will be a healthier body with increased internal power.

Cosmic energy constantly comes to the earth in the form of extremely fine particles produced as stars evolve through their life cycles. All forms of life on earth, including humans, depend on this energy which is absorbed through breathing and assimilating food.

The use of external energy to fortify the bones is a meditative process which uses long, deep breathing cycles. Bone Breathing draws Chi in through the fingertips, the toes, and all of the protruding bones, spreading it throughout the skeletal structure. (Fig. 2.1) This energy is then compressed into the bones through muscular contractions, forcing Chi into the cavities of the body. Bone Compression thus completes the Bone Breathing process by retaining the accumulated energy.

Fig. 2.1 Energy is most effectively absorbed by the protruding bones of the body.

A. Benefits of Bone Breathing and Bone Compression

1. Healthy Bones and the Production of Blood

Red blood cells are produced by the long bones of the body such as those found in the shins, thighs and arms. They circulate oxygen and eliminate carbon dioxide. White blood cells are produced by the flat bones such as the pelvis, sternum, scapulae and skull. They are vital to the body's defense system. Both red and white blood cells are produced in the marrow of the bones; which type of cells are produced depends on the type of marrow that predominates.

Fig. 2.2 Bones of child are made up exclusively of red marrow with abundant blood vessels, while adult bones have red marrow at the extremities and a central area containing fat (yellow marrow).

Healthy bones contain more red marrow, which produces blood cells. Yellow bone marrow also exists, producing fat which accumulates as the body ages. When neglected through lack of exercise, this accumulation can decrease the proportion of red marrow crucial to the production of blood. Although yellow marrow can also produce blood cells, healthy blood production is contingent upon a higher proportion of red marrow in the bones and less fat. For this reason, Bone Marrow Nei Kung practitioners always seek to increase the growth of red marrow while eliminating fat. (Fig. 2.2)

2. Improving the Heart Function

In the advanced practice of Bone Breathing, the process of "Pulsing" can relieve the heart of excessive work while increasing circulation in other parts of the body. Pulsing uses the mind to amplify the pulse in the crown and perineum points. The pulse from these outer regions can then be used to move the Chi, and thereby move the blood. Through this process, the heart uses less force in its pumping action, and there is less need to tap its energy reserves.

You can also feel the pulse from the outer regions and mentally slow it down at the source. Hold either wrist between the thumb and forefinger of the opposite hand to determine the pulse. Then, by mentally decreasing the number of beats per second in the crown and perineum points, you can decrease the rate of the heart's pumping action. Both methods of reducing the heart's work can be applied simultaneously. Simply increase the strength of each beat from the crown and perineum as you slow down the heart rate.

B. Overview of Bone Breathing and Bone Compression

Bones are extremely porous, and they are always "breathing." (Fig. 2.3) The pores allow the passage of oxygen, blood, and nutrition through the bones in the same way a sponge absorbs and releases water. Bone Breathing draws external Chi in through the skin, muscles, and tendons to be combined with sexual energy and compressed into the marrow of the bones through the Bone

Compression practice. This process uses the combined energies to create the heat necessary to bum the fat out of the marrow. (Fig. 2.4)

Fig. 2.3 Bones are extremely porous and are always "breathing".

Fig. 2.4 Prolonged Bone Marrow Nei Kung practice helps to clear the fat from the bones, nurturing the regrowth of the red marrow.

Fig. 2.5 Skeletal Structure

1. Bone Breathing

Look closely at the skeletal structure illustrated in Fig. 2.5. Prepare to draw in external Chi through the tips of your fingers and toes as you breathe in and out through them. (Fig. 2.6) Energy can be drawn in through the hands and feet by fostering a sense of coolness in them. This imagined cold will actually attract warm external energies. When you inhale through the fingers, the feeling is usually cool. When you exhale, the feeling is warm. Once you have established the feeling of the energy in your fingers, use your mind to guide the Chi upward into the limbs and the body as you inhale.

Fig. 2.6 Bone Breathing

Each time you exhale and release the Chi, you can draw it back further into each limb with more force like a battering ram. This opens the channels of the arms and legs so that more energy can be drawn into the body. By the time the energy passes beyond your elbows and knees, however, you may not feel that you can expel the energy as your limbs may seem longer than your breath cycles. A physical feeling will indicate that the energy is being retained.

Note: These techniques should initially be practiced from a seated position until you are able to draw the energy while standing in the "Embracing the Tree" posture. (See Appendix 1.) If possible, try to keep your feet bare since shoes and socks impede the drawing of energy through the lower limbs.

Fig. 2.7 Stage One: Respiration through the Fingers

Fig. 2.8 Stage Two and Three: Respiration through the Toes and simultaneous practices.

a. Respiration through the Fingers: In the first stage of Bone Breathing, use lower abdominal breathing to draw energy in through the fingertips. Then gradually move the Chi up through the hands, arms, shoulders and scapulae, up to the skull, and then back down the spinal column to the middle back. (Fig. 2.7) Mentally create a cool feeling in the hands to attract the warm external Chi. Briefly hold each breath before releasing the Chi as you exhale. Draw the energy in further with each new breath as you continue to open the pathways for its travel.

b. Respiration through the Toes: When your feet feel cool, inhale through the toes, and then by degrees into the thigh bones, hips, and sacrum. Most people feel the breathing sensation very powerfully in their legs. Each time you inhale, hold your breath--but not so long that you experience discomfort. Then, exhale down and out through the legs and toes. You may feel the energy surge from the sacrum up the back and circulate throughout the nervous system as you breathe up the spine. (Fig. 2.8)

Fig. 2.9 In the Third Stage of Bone Breathing: Energy is breathed in through the fingertips and toes, gradually moving up and connecting at the spine.

c. Simultaneous practice: Eventually, practice both of the previous stages together. With experience, there will be no need to work the arms and the legs separately. Breathe up through the toes, the legs, and up the spine in one direction as you simultaneously breathe in through the fingers, into the arms, the shoulders and scapulae, up to the head, and return down the spine from the opposite direction. (Fig. 2.9)

d. The energy connects the upper and lower halves of the body near the middle of the spine. The combined energies then travel back up the spine to your skull. The Chi spirals through the facial bones and returns down the spine to the point at which the two sources connect.

e. After the Chi from both sources has returned to the upper spine, the energy will spread out through the rib cage and recombine at the sternum. The Chi travels from the back of the rib cage to the front. The sternum is filled with the spiraling Chi from all twelve ribs simultaneously.

2. Bone Compression

There are three steps to Bone Compression: The first is to inhale the Chi in a spiraling motion, drawing it in through the fingers and toes to surround the bones of the arms, legs, and body. The second step is to pack the Chi in between the muscles and bones. The third step squeezes the muscles, thereby compressing the Chi into the marrow through the pores of the bones. The sequence of steps is: inhale, spiral, pack, and squeeze Chi into each part of the limbs and body successively. (Fig. 2.10) (The first two steps are actually a single process.)

Note*: Unlike the early stages of Bone Breathing, Chi is not expelled upon exhalation during Bone Compression. As you spiral the energy inward, concentrate on those parts of the body that have received the inhaled Chi. It will remain at those points until you are ready to compress it into the skeletal structure.

a. In the first stage of Bone Compression, inhale Chi into each part of the skeletal system in a manner similar to Bone Breathing, but spiral the energy as you draw it in. Do not release it. As you use your mind to draw in the external Chi through your arms and legs, envision it travelling through each limb in a spiraling motion, circling clockwise through your right arm and leg, and counterclockwise through your left arm and leg. Spiraling helps to combine the external and sexual energies, while allowing the Chi to cover more internal space.

(1) Spiraling the energy.

(2) Packing around the bones.

(3) Squeezing the energy into the bones.

Fig. 2.10 Spiral, Pack, Squeeze

b. While spiraling helps to bring Chi into more internal areas, packing condenses it into less space. This step creates more room for the energy in every part of the limbs and body before it is compressed into the bones. Once the heart rate is audible to your "inner ear," you may amplify the pulse at the crown, the perineum, the hands, and the feet, maintaining it throughout each compression in order to decrease the work of the heart.

c. Squeeze the muscles of each hand and forearm individually after you have inhaled, spiralled, and packed Chi into them. (Fig. 2.11) When you are familiar with the way it feels, work both hands at the same time. Hold your breath for a comfortable period of time as you maintain each squeeze. This helps to compress Chi into the pores of the bones. Relax your muscles as you exhale.

Fig. 2.11 By inhaling through the fingertips, packing, spiraling, and squeezing energy into the bones, an electrical impulse is created.

The resting period is extremely important. You will feel the most profound sensation of Chi at this time. Absorption during rest periods is a continuation of the compression process, using mind control instead of muscular contraction. When you release your hold, use the mind to relax the muscles and to absorb more energy into the bone marrow. The muscles and tendons should feel like cotton wrapped around your bones.

Note: Eventually, Bone Compression can be practiced upon all of the body simultaneously.

C. Bone Breathing Process Step By Step

Note: The following is a detailed analysis intended for reference. Upon becoming familiar with Bone Marrow Nei Kung, students may use the summary at the end of each chapter as a practice guide.

1. Preparations

You should be certain that the Microcosmic Orbit is clear of any blockages before starting. Regulate your breathing, then circulate your energy through the Microcosmic Orbit for several cycles. (You may wish to do this from the Iron Shirt posture so that your body will feel like an integrated unit.)

Look at the illustration of the human skeleton. (Fig. 2.12) Notice the size, shape, and placement of the bones. Then, one arm at a time, trace your way up from the fingertips, through the bones of the hand and wrist, the radius and ulna of the forearm, the humerus of the upper arm, the collar bone (clavicle) in front, and the shoulder blade in back. Trace the legs in the same manner. This illustration should help as a guide for the energy flow in your practice.

Fig. 2.12 Observe the skeletal structure.

Initiate Bone Breathing with the fingers of one hand until you feel energy, moving in and out of that hand. Continue breathing up into each section of the arm. Begin your practice with the fingers of the right hand if you are right handed, or with the left hand if you are left handed. Practice using the fingers of the opposite hand, and then both hands together, moving up both arms, and so on. Similarly, practice on the right (or left) toes, and then the toes of the opposite foot, and then continue up the legs.

Fig. 2.13 Sink the elbows, face the palms down, and relax the fingers. Gently pull up the sexual organ and the anus.

Some people find it useful to extend the hand they intend to breathe into, palm down, pointing outward horizontally, at chest level. (Fig. 2.13) This aids in concentrating on the fingers of that hand. Between each step, rest for as long as you feel the need to do so. Place your hands on your legs, palms up, and close your eyes during each testing period.

2. Initiating Bone Breathing: Breathing through the Fingers

With your hand raised gently pull up the sexual organs and anus with each breath. Draw the energy in as you inhale; push the energy out as you exhale. As you inhale, sink the elbow down, and draw the energy in. Then exhale, extend your hand out slightly from the rising elbow and release the energy. As you watch with your mind's eye, see the fingers beginning to breathe. Breathe through your nose in long, deep, but gentle cycles.

a. Start with the Index Finger

The bones in the tips of the fingers are pointed and can draw in energy. Begin the Bone Breathing process from the index finger, which offers the most sensation of the energy entering and leaving. (Fig. 2.14) Bend and sink the elbow while holding the, lower arm up. Relax the wrist, hands, and fingers.

Fig. 2.14 Begin Bone Breathing through the index finger.

Note: If it helps you to become more aware of your index finger, press its tip with a fingernail from the other hand until you feel a sharp pain indicating the bone.

b. Draw warm energy into the cool fingertip.

Sense a cold feeling in the tip of your index finger. Sink your elbow, and slowly pull in the entire hand--finger extended--with a long, gentle breath. Be aware of the energy as it enters into the tip of that finger only.

c. Release the energy with the breath.

Exhale, permitting the elbow to rise slightly as you slowly extend the hand. Feel the sensation of the energy leaving the extended finger.

Fig. 2.15 Draw the energy simultaneously into all the fingers of both hands.

d. Breathe into the Fingers individually.

Next, breathe into the second, third, and fourth fingers, and finally the thumb. These need not be done individually every time you practice. This is intended only to help you to isolate the feeling of energy by concentrating on one small area at a time.

Eventually all fingers will be used to draw energy simultaneously into both hands. (Fig. 2.15) The finger bones do not have much fat; hence, there is little resistance to the energy. Once you bring the energy past the finger bones into the ulna and radius bones of the arm, you will encounter more fat; therefore, breathing into them may require more practice. Now compare the fingers of the hand that have experienced Bone Breathing with the fingers of the hand that you have not yet worked on. You should notice a difference.

Fig. 2.16 Breathe into the entire hand at once, and visualize all the bones.

3. Breathing into the Entire Hand

At this point you should be able to inhale through all of your fingertips, filling the knuckles with Chi. Pull up slightly on the sexual organs as you draw energy in through your fingers. Then inhale, and hold for a while, feeling the energy as an increasing fullness, or swelling, in all fingers. Exhale, and rest. Now breathe into your entire hand, visualizing all the bones you observed in the illustration of the skeleton. (Fig. 2.16) Then exhale, releasing the energy. From this point on you will always breathe into the whole hand when you begin the exercise.

Note: Use the Bone Breathing illustrations as reference guides Although your objective is to learn how to feel the shape and size of each bone, the beginning stages often require more visualization.

Fig. 2.17 Breathe into the ulna and radius bones of the forearm.

4. Forearm and the Ulna and Radius Bones

This time send the Chi up through your hand to the wrist, and into the many small bones there. Inhale as you pull the energy up from the fingertips through the hand all the way to the ulna and radius bones of the forearm. (Fig. 2.17) Hold each breath and feel the ulna and radius start to expand. Allow your eyes to close. Exhale, releasing the energy. Continue to breathe in and out of these bones several times in the same way. Exhale, and rest. Now practice breathing into the fingertips of the opposite hand, then the hand itself, and finally, into the forearm.

5. Breathing into the Upper Arm and the Humerus Bone

By now you have a good idea of the Bone Breathing process, and you should be able to expand it to the upper arm. Now you can breathe into the humerus bones of both arms simultaneously. Inhale, relax the fingers, draw energy into the bones, sink the shoulders and the humeri. Breathe through the fingers, hands and forearms into the humeri. (Fig. 2.18) Exhale and continue breathing into and out of the bones. Drop the elbows and shoulders and breathe in through the arms to the humeri again. Exhale, regulate the breath, and rest.

Fig. 2.18 Breathe into humerus bone of the upper arm.

6. Scapulae, C-7 Point of the Neck and the Head

Begin the exercise again. With eyes closed, breathe energy into the bones through the hands, arms, and humeri. Be certain to maintain dropped elbows and shoulders. Exhale, and then inhale again to draw energy up to both scapulae (shoulder blades) and to the C-7 point on the neck. Hold the energy there, continue breathing in and out, and then rest. Again draw the energy through the fingertips, hands, arms, humeri, scapulae, C-7, and continue to bring it all the way up into the head. Hold it there at the base of the skull. (Fig. 2.19) Exhale, regulate your breathing, and rest.

Fig. 2.19 Breathe into the scapulae and the base of the skull.

Note: If for some reason you should stop at this point, do not leave the energy in the head. Press the tongue up to the roof of the mouth, and bring the energy down to the navel. When you are ready to combine the procedures for the arms and legs, you will not draw the Chi directly to the skull from the arms. You will first combine the energy from the two sources at the center of the spine, and then move it upwards into the skull.

7. Breathing into the Toes

Breathe into the toes one at a time. Start with the big toe of either foot, then move to the second, third, fourth and fifth toes. Finally inhale as you draw energy into all five toes simultaneously, then exhale, allowing it to be released. (Fig. 2.20) Breathe in this manner for a minute or two, then inhale strongly, drawing the energy in more forcefully--like a battering ram--to open the channels of the foot.

Fig. 2.20 Inhale, and draw the energy through all the toes.

Note: Do not pull your feet up with the breath. Let them remain fiat on the floor. Remember that keeping your feet bare is the best way to absorb energy into your legs. Wearing synthetic materials on your feet will impede this process.

8. Breathing into the Feet

Inhale, and draw energy through all of the toes into the entire foot. (Fig. 2.21) Exhale, and release the energy Continue breathing energy in and out. Then begin breathing through the toes of the opposite foot, in the same manner described above, until you can breathe into that entire foot.

Fig. 2.21 Bones of the feet and ankles.

Concentrating on both feet, inhale, and bring the energy up into both feet simultaneously. Feel breath enter through all of the bones, hold it for a while, and then let the energy flow out. Inhale the energy again, close your eyes, and feel all of the bones of both feet, up to and including the small ankle bones, as they become more alive with each breath. Return to regulated breathing, ending with an exhalation, and then rest.

9. Tibia and Fibula Bones of the Lower Legs

With your eyes closed, draw energy into the tibia and fibula bones of both lower legs. (Fig. 2.22) Hold it for a while, then release your breath and the energy. Inhale, and pull the energy up through the lower legs with more force. Exhale, and release it. Continue to breathe in and out of these bones, drawing in more energy with each breath while preparing to travel further into the upper legs.

Fig. 2.22 Bones of the feet and ankles.

10. Thigh Bones, Hips, and Sacrum

Inhale from the tips of the toes all the way through the feet, ankles, tibia, and fibula bones of both legs, and draw energy up to each leg's femur or thigh bone. Hold your breath and the energy there, and then exhale. If you cannot feel the connection between the thigh bones and the hips, look at the illustration to avoid any confusion. Also note how the hip bones connect to the sacrum. Breathe up the entire length of both legs into the hip bones and into the sacrum. (Fig. 2.23) Exhale, and rest.

Fig. 2.23 Inhale, and draw the energy all the way into the sacrum.

11. Breathing into the Hands and Feet Together

In the next step of Bone Breathing, breathe into both hands and feet simultaneously. Inhale all the way up to the shoulders and scapulae through the arms, and up to the thigh and hip bones through the legs, Hold your breath, then exhale. With practice you will learn to divide your concentration between the absorption points of the feet and hands. Combine the energy at the middle of the spine. (Fig. 2.24)

Fig. 2.24 Breathe in through the hands and feet simultaneously, and combine the energy at the middle of the spine.

12. Breathing into the Sacrum and Spine

You may wish to stand during this step of the exercise. This will help energy travel up the spine. The “Embracing the Tree” posture of Iron Shirt I is useful here. The next point to breathe into from the legs is the plate-like structure at the base of the spine referred to as the sacrum. Feel the sacrum with your fingertips. As you breathe in again up through the legs and hip bones, draw the energy from the legs together at the sacrum point.

When energy reaches this point it may take off on its own, travelling the length of the spine. If the energy does not travel up the spine spontaneously, continue to breathe up the back until the spine receives energy from the sacrum. Then include the breathed-in Chi from the length of the arms. The two energies of the arms and legs should meet beneath the shoulder blades on the spine at T-11. Combine the two energies, sending them to the shoulders, to C-7, and into the head. (Fig. 2.25)

(b) Breathing into the Collarbone, Sternum, and Ribs

Fig. 2.26 Bone Breathing in the Chest

13. Breathing into the Collarbone, Sternum and Ribs

Locate the collarbone at the front of the body and the sternum, or breastbone, at the middle of the chest where the ribs are attached. (Fig. 2-26(a)) Feel the way the ribs arch away from the sternum in the front and connect to the spine in the back. These are difficult structures to breathe Chi into requiring your utmost concentration.

The combined Chi from the legs and the arms is first breathed into the cranial area before it is sent back down the spinal cord to the point at which the ribs extend. Spiral Chi throughout the head and facial bones. From there, bring it into the spine and collarbone, spreading energy throughout the ribs, finally reaching the sternum. (Fig. 2.26(b))

(1) Spiraling the energy.

(2) Packing around the bones.

(3) Squeezing the energy into the bones.

Fig. 2.27 Bone Breathing in the Arm

D. Bone Compression Process Step By Step

The sequence used in Bone Breathing is also used in Bone Compression. The circulation of the energy differs, however, in that it spirals around the bones while rising into each limb. Then, as it accumulates, the energy is packed tightly and compressed into the bones. Refer to Fig. 2.27(b) for an illustration of what spiraling might look like to your inner eye. Fig. 2.27(b) and (c) demonstrate the difference between packing and squeezing: One process pulls Chi between the muscles and bones: the other compresses it into the bones. As stated earlier, packing is a mental process, while squeezing is a physical process.

1. One Hand and Forearm

Practice with either hand alone first, inhaling into your fingers, wrist, and then the ulna and radius hones, holding the intake from each breath. Use your inner eye to spiral energy around these bones as Chi rises into each successive limb. Visualize a clockwise spiraling motion rising in the right arm, or a counterclockwise spiraling motion if you are using the left arm.

After spiraling, inhale again, and pack the energy, mentally condensing it as it accumulates. Pull up the sexual organs and the anus as you pack energy in between the muscles and bones. Continue this process until the hand and forearm begin to feel swollen. Then, using hard muscular contractions, squeeze Chi into the bones, feeling its heat in the marrow. Apply a little more tension to reach the deeper areas of your bone structure. Hold it, exhale, and release. It is not necessary to hold each breath to the point of discomfort.

2. Right and Left Hands together

When you become familiar with the way this compression feels, work with both hands at the same time. After packing, hold each muscular contraction along with your breath in a long squeeze, and then release it. When you release your hold, use your mind to absorb energy into the bones. The bones, muscles and tendons should begin to feel as though they are wrapped in cotton. Always concentrate on feeling energy penetrate into the bone.

Fig. 2.28 Spiral both hands and forearms together, and squeeze the muscles.

3. Both Arms Together

Now practice spiraling both hands and forearms together. Pull up the sexual organs and anus. Inhale, spiral, pack and squeeze the muscles of the lower arms repeatedly with each breath. (Fig. 2.28)

Exhale, and release. As you release the muscles, the Chi will not dissipate because its density is increased by packing until it can no longer escape through the skin. Next, inhale, spiral, pack and squeeze Chi into both humeri, continuing the process into the shoulders and scapulae. Exhale, and release.

Fig. 2.29 Bring the energy up both legs, spiraling into the sacrum.

4. Legs

Next inhale into both legs all the way up to the sacrum. (Fig. 2.29) Hold the energy in the bones. Continue to inhale, spiral, and pack. Then inhale again, squeeze, hold the tension, and release. It is important to be aware of your mind controlling your muscles. Inhale energy and squeeze your muscles to the bones again, proceeding from the lower to the upper parts of the legs. Exhale, and rest. Use your mind to relax the muscles. Finish by shaking your legs.

Fig. 2.30 Bring the energy through the arms to the shoulder blades, and down the spine to T-11.

5. Lumbar Region of the Spine

You may wish to use the "Embracing the Tree" posture to assist in drawing energy up into the sacrum, although it can also be done while seated erect. Again, inhale, spiral, pack and squeeze the energy successively from the legs to the lower region of the spine. As you pack and squeeze Chi into the sacrum, the Sacral Pump is activated, which helps the upward flow of energy to the higher centers.

Inhale, and spiral energy from the legs, through the sacrum, and up the spine to the first lumbar. Hold the energy. Inhale again, and pack from the lower part of the leg and up so that the entire lower region feels the compression. Pack into the sacrum and the spine, then squeeze the Chi into the bones by contracting the muscles of the legs, hips, buttocks and lower back. Hold the contraction with your breath, then release it as you exhale.

6. Spine through the Collarbone and Scapulae

Inhale, spiraling energy upward from your fingertips successively through the hands, ulnae, radii, humeri, shoulders, and into the scapulae and collarbone. Continue to pack from the scapulae into the spine down to T-11. (Fig. 2.30) Squeeze the muscles surrounding the hands, arms, scapulae and spine, thereby compressing Chi into the bones of the upper region. Exhale, and rest. It is approximately at T-11 on the spine that the energy from the upper region combines with that of the lower region.

7. Cranial Bones and the Cranial Pump

From the T-11 point inhale and spiral the combined energies further up the spine, through the cervical hones in the neck, and up into the head. (Fig. 2.31) When you reach the head, spiral throughout the entire cranial area, pressing your tongue to your palate. (Fig. 2.32(a)) Clench your teeth and squeeze Chi into the cranial bones. This increases the activity of the Cranial Pump, which is similar to the Sacral Pump. (Fig. 2.32(b)) Both of these pumps move tremendous amounts of energy into the spine.

8. Rib Cage and Sternum

Energizing the rib cage and sternum can be problematic since the rib cage is not directly in the path of energy drawn in from either hands or feet. Success here depends on how well you have thus far managed to spiral Chi throughout the spine. When you return the combined flow of Chi from the cranium down through the spine to where the lower ribs expand outward, spiral the Chi through all twelve ribs simultaneously from their connection at the spine to the sternum in front. (Fig. 2.33)

Fig. 2.31 Spiral the energy from the legs up the spine. At the same time, spiral from the hands to the upper spine and into the head.

(a) Press the tongue to the roof of the mouth with the combined power of all the einternal organs.

(b) Spiraling up to the head.

Fig. 2.32 Bone Breathing in the Spine

Fig. 2.33 Spiraling from the head down to the ribs and sternum.

The spiraling will not feel as it did in the limbs; however, the same results are achieved by mentally creating a circular motion with the energy as it travels through each rib. Packing will feel the same, although there may be less muscle available to squeeze Chi into the ribs and sternum. Compress energy into the sternum by sinking your chest slightly, and squeeze into it from the surrounding muscles of the chest.

Finally, exhale. Sit or stand quietly and feel how the energy moves within the structure of your bones. Use your mind to relax the muscles in your spine and ribs, and feel the heat as energy moves into your bones. Shake your hands, fingers, and legs, and flex your spine. Be sure that your chest is relaxed so the energy does not congest there.

E. Summary of Bone Breathing and Bone Compression

Although Bone Breathing and Bone Compression are most easily practiced from a seated position, advanced practitioners usually graduate to the Embracing the Tree posture as used in the practice of Iron Shirt I. This posture also suits the Hitting practices because Bone Breathing, Compression, and Hitting are later combined.

1. Bone Breathing in Practice

a. Create a sensation of coolness in the fingers of either hand. Inhale, and draw warm external energies into that hand through the fingers. Apply this to the opposite hand. Exhale, and release the energy.

b. Pull up your genitals slightly as you breathe Chi further up into the ulna and radius bones of the lower arm. Practice first on each arm, then on both together. Exhale, and release.

c. Apply the same procedure to the upper arms, drawing Chi to the humerus bones. Exhale, and release the energy. Remember to draw energy in with more force with each new inhalation, thereby accessing further points within each limb.

d. Draw Chi up through the scapulae and collarbone to reach the C-7 point and the cranium but do not leave it there. Either combine it with the energy drawn from the legs or store it in the navel.

e. Create a sensation of coolness in the toes of either foot. Inhale and draw the warm external energies into that foot through the toes. Apply this to the opposite foot. Exhale, and release the energy.

f. Pull up the genitals slightly as you breathe Chi further up into the tibia and fibula bones of the lower legs. If necessary, practice on each leg individually, and then draw Chi into both legs together. Exhale, and release.

g. Draw the Chi further up with each breath into the femur bones of the upper legs, into the hips, and then to the sacrum. Exhale, but retain the energy you have breathed into these areas.

h. If you choose to combine the procedures for the arms and legs, do not draw the energy to the skull from the arms directly, but instead recombine it at the center of the spine. First breathe into both hands and feet simultaneously. Inhale Chi all the way up to the shoulders and scapulae through the arms, and up to the thigh and hip bones through the legs. Recombine this energy at the middle of the spine after it has reached the sacrum and the scapulae from their respective sources. From the center of the spine, move the energy up to the head, and then back down the spine to where the ribs begin. Exhale as needed.

i. Breathe the energy outward through the twelve ribs, encompassing the rib cage from the front to the back, and recombine the Chi at the sternum. Breathe into the sternum. Exhale.

2. Bone Compression in Practice

a. Inhale, pulling up the undertrunk, then spiral the energy up from the fingers and toes throughout the arms and legs to meet at the center of the spine. Use the same steps as in Bone Breathing, but retain the Chi by spiraling it throughout the limbs.

b. Having recombined the external energy drawn from both sources at the center of the spine, expand the Chi outward through the twelve ribs, spiraling it into the sternum.

c. The body's capacity has been reached when you can no longer spiral new Chi into the arms. Begin to pack the Chi, condensing it into the same space as the energy which has been accumulated.

d. Squeeze the muscles of the hands and arms with each breath. Hold the breath with each contraction.

e. Exhale as you release the contraction. When you release your hold, use your mind to absorb the energy into the bones through the pores of the skin. During resting periods, the sensation of drawing in energy through the skin should be felt throughout the body. Bones, muscles and tendons should begin to feel as though they are wrapped in cotton.

f. As you maintain your stance, feel the pulsing of the heart, and bring that pulse to all of the major points--particularly the crown, perineum, hands and feet. As you decrease the force of the heart's pumping, you may also reduce the heart rate. If necessary, check either wrist to feel the pulse. After you have practiced for a while, feel the sensation inside your bones. If you have a lot of fat, the feeling will be very hot. This is the fat beginning to melt. It is a good idea to practice with the tongue on the palate because the energy will begin to move through the Microcosmic Orbit.

Chapter III
Sexual Energy Massage

Taoists regard sexual energy as having creative and rejuvenative powers. They acknowledge its role in the conception of human life, but when procreation is not intended, they advocate other applications for Ching Chi. In the Healing Love practice, this energy is used to heal the internal organs and glands, increase the brain's capacity and further open the channels of the Microcosmic Orbit. In the more advanced practice of the Sexual Energy Massage, it is also used to replenish and cultivate the blood-producing red marrow of the bones. Ching Chi is the term for sexual energy.

The Sexual Energy Massage is one of the most important practices in Bone Marrow Nei Kung. It is a beginner's equivalent to Chi Weight Lifting, which requires much more experience. The massage draws sexual energy and hormones into the body and promotes a healthy flow of blood and Chi within the sexual center. It also brings more internal energy into the genitals, and increases the production of Ching Chi. Using these techniques, men find that prostate problems can be greatly reduced, and women often alleviate the problems associated with menstruation.

The accumulation of external energy through Bone Breathing was discussed earlier as a meditative approach to harvesting Chi. For the most effective application of Bone Compression, however, sexual energy should also be harvested and subsequently compressed into the marrow along with the external Chi. This chapter explains how to disseminate sexual energy throughout the body so that it can be combined with external energy, for the "cleansing of the marrow," one of the main functions of Bone Marrow Nei Kung.

A. Three Taoist approaches to Sexual Energy.

This section is a brief explanation of the three methods used to draw sexual energy and hormones into the body. These methods provide men and women with the means of achieving great personal power through increased sexual energy. Although some of the techniques in this chapter may be similar to those found in other Universal Tao books, their application in Bone Marrow Nei Kung produces a different quality of Ching Chi. The massage techniques and exercises, such as the Power Lock, release unaroused Ching Chi into the body. This differentiates them from the Healing Love practices that require sexual stimulation.

Warning for Men and Women: Do not practice if you have any, venereal infections or skin rashes in the genital area. Methods used to draw sexual energy into the body can spread existing venereal diseases to the organs.

1. Healing Love

Healing Love is a cultivation practice that does not fulfill the requirements of Bone Marrow Nei Kung by itself; however, its practice is necessary to prevent the loss of Ching Chi during all sexual activities. Healing Love also helps to open the Microcosmic Orbit to its maximum capacity while rejuvenating the internal organs and glands with sexual energy. The techniques reverse the usual outward flow of sexual energy during the orgasmic phase of sex, and draw the Ching Chi upward into the body, thereby enhancing one's internal healing capabilities. Through this practice concentrated sexual energy, extracted through the advanced disciplines, is also drawn into the Microcosmic Orbit.

NOTE: The actual release of Ching Chi into the body through the Sexual Energy Massage or Chi Weight Lifting methods presupposes that it is already abundant within the sexual center. If one suffers from chronic impotence, weakened kidneys, or any internal dysfunctions, the Healing Love methods should be mastered to accumulate Ching Chi before Bone Marrow Chi Kung is attempted.

2. Sexual Energy Massage

For the purposes of Bone Marrow Nei Kung, the Sexual Energy Massage is the primary practice. It not only releases Ching Chi into the body, but also extracts a higher concentration of sexual hormones from the genitals to stimulate the hypothalamus, the pituitary and the pineal glands. Stimulation of the pituitary gland is believed to prevent the production of an aging hormone that ultimately brings death.

Healing Love prevents the loss of Ching Chi and rejuvenates the internal system. The Sexual Energy Massage releases higher concentrations of Ching Chi into the body for cultivating the bone marrow and stimulating the endocrine glands. When used together, the two practices constitute a safer method of disseminating sexual energy than Chi Weight Lifting.

3. Chi Weight Lifting

Chi Weight Lifting releases sexual energy and hormones to a much greater degree than the other practices. In addition, the technique exercises the fascial connections between the genitals and the internal system, thereby strengthening the organs and glands. Its practice provides the greatest abundance of Ching Chi for rejuvenating the bone marrow. It also releases maximum quantities of sexual hormones for the stimulation of the pituitary gland to prevent aging. Chi Weight lifting is the highest level of physical practice in Bone Marrow Nei Kung.

Chi Weight Lifting should not be attempted without the proper Training. After having received instruction, a student may proceed with caution to lift light weights using the genitals. At this level, the Sexual Energy Massage is used before and after Chi Weight Lifting: first to prepare the genitals, and afterwards to replenish the circulation in the sexual center, which helps to avoid blood clots. The Healing Love practices that require sexual arousal are no longer necessary because Chi Weight Lifting supplies the body with abundant Ching Chi. Healing Love must still be practiced during sex, however, unless the time is right for procreation.

4. Three Practices in Relation to Bone Marrow Nei Kung

The Sexual Energy Massage techniques offer a greater release of Ching Chi than the Healing Love methods alone, and they can be practiced with much more safety than Chi Weight Lifting. The

(a) Combine the three middle fingers.

(b) Where to apply pressure.

(c) Press the urethra just in front of the anus.

Fig. 3.1 The external blocking procedure involves pressing the urethra from a point at the back of the perineum, near the anus.

"Power Lock" and "Genital Compression" exercises are derived from the Healing Love practice and used as non-sexual techniques in Bone Marrow Nei Kung to channel unaroused sexual energy into the Microcosmic Orbit. The sexual application of the Power Lock is described in Appendix 1 because it is essential for maintaining Ching Chi in both men and women. Students should understand both versions before attempting Bone Marrow Nei Kung.

B. Power Lock Exercise for Men and Women

The detailed descriptions of these exercises which follow are for learning the practice and for reference. Study them carefully. Then use the chapter summary as a quick practice guide.

Fig. 3.2 Sacral Pump and Cranial Pump

1. Synopsis

The Power Lock exercise is used before and after the Sexual Energy Massage. Air is sipped in through the nose as the genitals, perineum and anus are contracted to draw Ching Chi up from the perineum into the higher centers. The three middle fingers of either hand are applied to a point located at the back of the perineum--in front of the anus--to lock the energy into the upward flow after each contraction. (Fig. 3.1) Clenching the teeth and the buttocks activates the Cranial Pump and the Sacral Pump, thereby helping the energy to reach its destination at the crown point. (Fig. 3.2)

Warning: Before you begin drawing Ching Chi up to the higher centers, remember that you should never leave hot sexual energy in the head for long periods of time. Always draw it down to the navel through the Functional Channel of the Microcosmic Orbit at the end of your practice. (See Chapter Six for details regarding the Microcosmic Orbit.) There is an old Chinese saying: “Don’t cook your brain.” When in doubt about the hot or cold status of your energy, store it in the navel.

a. Five Stations

There are five points used as stations for Ching Chi in the Power Lock exercise: the sacrum, T-11, C-7, the base of the skull, and the crown. Activate the respective pumps for these stations, starting with the Sacral Pump, until the Ching Chi rises to the crown. This is done in sets using nine muscular contractions of the undertrunk simultaneously with nine sips of air to draw the energy up to each point from the perineum. The exercise then starts again at the genitals after each station has been completed, although the energy is actually held at the previous station. (Fig. 3.2)

b. Where to apply external pressure?

Locate the Gate of Death and Life (the perineum, or Hui-Yin) between the sex organ and the anus. (Fig. 3.3) Use your fingers to find the slight depression directly in front of the anus, at the back of the perineum, and focus your attention there. Fingernails should be cut short and filed.

Fig. 3.3 Perineum and the depression in front of the anus.

c. How to apply external pressure with the fingers.

Using either hand, combine the three middle fingers into a triangle. Immediately after each inhalation, press the three fingertips on the point in front of the anus to lock the Ching Chi into its upward journey, preventing its return to the perineum. (Women may forego using the fingers if it causes discomfort.) Release the fingertips as you sip in more air and then re-apply them as each breath is held. Press the point only for as long as you hold each breath and muscular contraction, then release. Do not apply the fingers as you inhale because you will block the energy from rising. Remember that the fingers help to push the energy upward.

d. Contractions activate the Sacral and Cranial Pumps.

Each of the five stations has a “pump” to move energy, but the Sacral and Cranial Pumps require the most concentration to become activated. The muscles of the undertrunk help to draw the energy, into the sacral area. Tilt the sacrum slightly and clench the buttocks as you contract the anus and perineum to direct the energy up the spine. (Fig. 3.4(a)) As the Sacral Pump is activated, it creates a vacuum in the urogenital diaphragm which draws the Ching Chi from the sexual center.

The Cranial Pump is activated by first pressing the flat part of the tongue up to the roof of the mouth as the tip of the tongue presses the lower jaw behind the teeth. (Fig. 3.4 (b)) Slightly clench the teeth as you pull in the chin towards the back of the head. Take in ten percent of your lung capacity with each sip of air through your nose as you pull up the genitalia, apply pressure with the three fingers, and contract the individual sections of the undertrunk. Simultaneously, push up your tongue, pull in your eyes, and look up to your crown.

Note: Remember never to contract the chest muscles. This can cause energy to congest around the area of the heart.

Fig. 3.4 Activating the Cranial Pump

e. Sequence

Men draw sexual energy from the genitals into the perineum through Testicle Breathing. Women use Ovarian Breathing, slightly contracting the vagina to accumulate Ching Chi in the Ovarian Palace. (Refer to Chapter Six for information about these techniques.) Use a short inhalation to draw the energy through each successive point leading up to the first station. Remember to apply the fingers as you hold each sip of air. First inhale, and contract the perineum. Then inhale again as you contract the anus. With the next sip of air, pull up the back part of the anus as you draw the energy up to the sacrum. After covering these points, use several sets of nine contractions to push the energy into the sacrum. This entire sequence is repeated for each subsequent station, starting at the sexual center.

As Ching Chi expands in the sexual center, use one sip of air with each contraction to draw it up through the aforementioned points. At least one set of nine contractions should be used for each station that was previously opened. Then emphasize each new station with several sets of nine contractions. Although a week or two may be required to open each station completely, you can practice using all of the stations, concentrating more on the difficult points. Exhale after the ninth sip of air, and release the tension as you repeat the process.

f. Power Lock Practice Step By Step For Men and Women

(1) Station One--the Sacrum

(a) Be aware of the sexual organ.

(b) When you feel the Ching Chi expanding, inhale and contract the perineum, drawing sexual energy into the perineum. Use your fingers to press on the point each time you contract, releasing them briefly before each subsequent contraction.

(c) Inhale, contract the anus, and draw the energy up to the anus.

(d) Inhale, contract, and draw the energy up to the back part of the anus.

(e) Inhale, and tilt the sacrum as you clench the buttocks to activate the Sacral Pump. Draw the energy up to the sacrum.

(f) Use nine contractions with nine sips of air to draw Ching Chi from the sexual center to the sacrum. (Fig. 3.5)

(g) Hold the energy at the sacrum as you exhale and return your attention to the sexual organ.

Fig. 3.5 Collect the energy at the sexual center, then do nine contractions to draw the energy to the sacrum

(2) Station Two--the T-11 Point

(a) Repeat the previous steps, drawing the energy up through the sacrum until you reach the T-11 point.

(b) Use nine contractions with nine sips of air to draw the Ching Chi from the sexual center to T-11 on the spine. (Activate the T-11 pump by pushing the spine outward at that point.)

(c) Hold the energy there as you exhale and return your attention to the sexual organ.

(3) Station Three--the C-7 Point

(a) Repeat the previous steps, drawing the energy up through T-11 until you reach the C-7 point.

(b) Use nine contractions with nine sips of air to draw Ching Chi from the sexual center to the C-7 point. (Push the C-7 out, and pull back the chin slightly to help activate the C-7 pump.)

(c) Hold the energy there as you exhale and return your attention to the sexual organ.

(4) Station Four--the Base of the Skull

(a) Repeat the previous steps, drawing the energy up through C-7 until you reach the base of the skull.

(b) Use nine contractions with nine sips of air to draw Ching Chi from the sexual center to the base of the skull as you activate the cranial pump. (Pull the chin back once again.)

(c) Hold the energy there as you exhale and return your attention to the sexual organ.

Fig. 3.6 Power Lock guiding the energy up to the crown.

(5) Station Five--the Crown

(a) Repeat the previous steps, drawing the energy up through the base of the skull until you reach the crown point. (Fig. 3. 6)

(b) Use nine contractions with nine sips of air to draw Ching Chi from the sexual center to the crown. (Fig. 3.7)

(c) Exhale and rest as you spiral this energy nine times outward from the crown, and then nine times inward.

(d) Finally, bring the energy down and store it in the navel.

Fig. 3.7 Power Lock drawing the energy from thesexual center to the crown.

g. Completion of the Power Lock

Women: Cover your navel with both palms, right hand over left. Collect and mentally spiral the energy outwardly from the navel 36 times counterclockwise, and then inwardly 24 times clockwise. (Fig. 3.8(b))

Fig. 3.8 Collect the Energy.

h. Massage after the Power Lock

The final step helps to increase the blood and Chi flow in the sexual center. Apply a silk cloth in a circular motion to the perineum, coccyx, and sacrum. Starting at the perineum use the cloth to massage the area in a clockwise motion nine to eighteen times, then counterclockwise nine to eighteen times. (Fig. 3.9) Apply the cloth to the coccyx for the same number of repetitions, and finish at the sacrum.

Fig. 3.9 Massage the Perineum.

C. Genital Compression for Men and Women Step By Step

The Genital Compression Exercise dynamically builds sexual power by packing electromagnetically charged energy into the testicles or the ovaries. As an expanding sensation fills the genitals, sexual energy increases, eventually reaching into higher centers of the body through the Microcosmic Orbit, as it is needed. This practice is particularly important to use after the Sexual Energy Massage or Chi Weight Lifting to replenish the energy extracted from the genitals.

(1) Loosen your pants or take them off. Sit on the edge of a chair. Men should allow the testicles to hang loose over the edge.

(2) Inhale slowly but deeply through your nostrils into the lungs, expanding the solar plexus. Simultaneously contract the anus, and pull Chi into the upper abdomen.

(3) Feel the energy of each breath culminate at a point behind the solar plexus. Use your mind and some abdominal muscles to compress the energy into a sphere at the solar plexus point. Imagine this as a ball of Chi which you will roll down the front of your body by contracting the upper abdominal muscles.

(4) Let the “Chi Ball” fortify itself with each breath, and then roll it downward from the solar plexus, through the lower abdomen, to the sexual center near the pelvis. Keep your chest relaxed to prevent any congestion of energy there. Use your mind to guide the Chi flow to the sexual center and genitals. (Fig. 3.10)

Fig. 3.10 Genital Compression

(5) Men: Compress Chi into the scrotum for as long as you can. Squeeze the anus, and gently tighten the perineum to prevent energy loss. Eventually only the power of the mind will be necessary to contract these areas. The muscles of the lower abdomen should also be used as you force the scrotum to expand with energy.

(6) Women: Compress the energy into the lower abdomen and the pelvic region while contracting the perineum, the anus, and the vagina. Locate the ovaries as they are shown in Fig. 3.11. Direct the energy into both ovaries, and feel them expand with warmth.

Fig. 3.11 Locating the Ovaries and the Ovarian Palace

Note for Women: In the beginning it is helpful to locate the ovaries by placing both thumbs, tip facing tip, on the navel with the fingers extending downward, outlining a triangle over the lower abdomen. Where the index fingertips meet is the Ovarian Palace. Next, spread all of the fingers out from that point while maintaining the position of the index fingers. Where the tips of the pinky fingers fall on the abdomen is the approximate location of the ovaries.

(7) While still in the compression process, keep your tongue pressed against the roof of your mouth to maintain the flow of energy through the Microcosmic Orbit. Move it around to stimulate the saliva flow. Swallow deeply into the sexual center to enhance the compression. With practice, you should be able to hold the compression for as long as 30 seconds.

(8) Exhale. Take a few, quick, short breaths by pulling your lower abdomen in and pushing it out (Energizer Breathing) until you are able to breathe normally. Relax completely.

(9) Repeat the exercise from three to nine times until you feel the testicles or ovaries become warm.

Remember to keep the tongue against the palate, and breathe only through the nose. When you perform Genital Compressions, especially after having practiced Bone Marrow Nei Kung for about a month, you will feel more Chi being guided to the sexual organs. It is important to practice these compressions in the morning or afternoon, but not before you go to sleep.

D. Preliminary Cloth Massage for Men And Women

The preliminary Cloth Massage of the sexual center is an extremely important preparation for the Sexual Energy Massage techniques. It stimulates the energy and prepares the sexual organs for the role at hand. The perineum and sacrum are also massaged since they are powerful stimulators of life-force energy. First, the silk cloth is applied to activate Ching Chi. The Sexual Energy Massage then releases the Ching Chi to be assimilated into the body. While massaging with the cloth, men should feel their testicles fill with energy as they become firm. Women should feel the breasts enlarge slightly as the vagina becomes moist with secretions. Using the cloth should help you feel the Chi routes open as they are stimulated.

Note: After the Sexual Energy Massage or Chi Weight Lifting, the Cloth Massage of the sexual center, perineum, and sacrum should be repeated to replenish the circulation of blood and Chi in the sexual center.

1. Hold the cloth using the three middle fingers of either hand. Apply it to the sexual center in clockwise and counterclockwise motions for 36 rotations in each direction. (Fig. 3.12) Men should apply the cloth directly to the genitals. Women should cover the entire mons and labial area. Massage the vaginal muscles, pressing in on the sides of the groin.

2. Locate the perineum, and use the cloth to massage it clockwise 36 times, and then counterclockwise 36 times.

Fig. 3.12 Massage the perineum with the cloth 36 times clockwise, and 36 times counterclockwise.

3. Apply the cloth to the coccyx and massage its tip, gradually applying more pressure to activate the Sacral Pump. Massage clockwise and then counterclockwise 36 times. Move up to the sacrum and massage it clockwise, then counterclockwise 36 times. (Fig. 3.13)

Fig. 3.13 Sacrum Massage

E. Sexual Energy Massage

At this point, although the practices for men and women differ greatly, the purposes and results are the same. To avoid confusion, the remainder of this chapter is divided into separate sections for men and women. The Sexual Energy Massage helps both men and women clear blockages in the Chi flow while directing energy and blood into the sexual center and enhancing the production of Ching Chi. These techniques are the main focus of this book in preparation for the higher level practices, such as Chi Weight Lifting.

The Sexual Energy Massage often causes enough stimulation to require the Healing Love techniques to avoid sexual arousal. If arousal occurs, draw the activated sexual energy into the Microcosmic Orbit. Both men and women must use the Power Lock-without arousal before the Sexual Energy Massage to prepare for the procedures, and afterwards to draw Ching Chi up through the stations of the Microcosmic Orbit. At least two to three sets are recommended at both times.

Note for Women*: The second part of this section explains the techniques which are special to your needs. Study the Breast Massage described in "Procedures for Women." Section F details the "Internal Egg Exercise" as a preparation for women's Chi Weight Lifting

1. Sexual Energy Massage for Men Step by Step

Warning: If you know that you have a blood clot in the area of the scrotum, consult a physician before applying the Sexual Energy Massage or Chi Weight Lifting techniques. Although the massage techniques in this chapter help to prevent blood clots from forming, medical advice is necessary to determine their safety with existing blood clots. Refer to Precaution 15 in Chapter Five for further information.

Note: In all of the following exercises, you may wrap the testicles with the cloth as you massage them.

a. Finger Massage of the Testicles

(1) Inhale Chi into the testicles as in the Genital Compression exercise. Rub your hands to warm them, and use them to warm the testicles.

(2) Hold the right testicle with the right hand. Place the pinky, fourth, third, and second fingertips on the bottom of the testicle. Place the right thumb on the top of the testicle. Hold the left testicle with the left hand in the same manner. (Fig. 3.14)

Fig. 3.14 Finger Massage of the Testicles

(3) Use your thumbs to gently press on each testicle, with the other four fingers holding the bottom of each. Then use your thumbs to massage around the testicles 36 times clockwise, and then 36 times counterclockwise. (Fig. 3.15)

Fig. 3.15 Rub the testicles in each direction up to 36 times.

(4) Use your thumbs to hold the testicles in place while the other four fingers of each hand roll them to the left and right or back and Forth 36 times in both directions. Draw the energy upward. (Fig.

Fig. 3.16 Roll the testicles in each direction up to 36 times.

b. Palm Massage of the Testicles

(1) Inhale Chi into the testicles. Rub your hands together until they are hot, and warm the testicles with them.

(2) Move the penis toward the right with the right thumb and fore finger, covering the top of the testicles with the lower edge of the right hand.

(3) Place the left palm on the bottom cupping the testicles.

(4) Keeping the penis to the right, begin to lightly press the testicles with both hands, and then gently rub the testicles with the left palm 36 times, both clockwise and counterclockwise. (Fig. 3.17)

(5) Warm the hands again, and reverse the hand positions. Then gently rub the testicles with your right palm 36 times in both directions. Draw the energy upward.

Fig. 3.17 Massage the Testicles.

Fig. 3.18 Trace the ducts of the testicles.

c. Ducts Elongation Rubbing

(1) Rub your hands together to warm them, cup the testicles with them, and then trace the ducts extending upward from the rear of the testicles. (Fig. 3.18)

(2) Gently use your thumbs and index fingers to massage the ducts near the point at which they connect to the testicles. Rub towards the back of each duct with your index finger and use your thumb to rub towards the front. Gradually move along the ducts up toward the body. (Fig. 3.19) Be careful.

Fig. 3.19 Ducts Elongation Rubbing

(3) Reverse finger positions and return downward toward the testicles, now using the thumb to rub the back, and the index fingers to rub the front. Continue running 36 times. Each up and down movement counts as one time.) Draw the energy into the Microcosmic Orbit.

d. Stretching the Ducts Gently with Massage

(1) Use the thumbs and index fingers to hold the ducts, thumbs in front.

(2) Use the right thumb to rub toward the left, and use the right index finger to rub and gently pull the right testicle out, stretching the duct.

(3) Next use the left thumb to rub towards the right, and the left index finger to rub and gently, pull the Left testicle out, stretching the duct. (Fig. 3.20)

Rub the ducts between thumbs and index fingers, gently squeezing them upward.

Gently stretch the ducts downward.

Fig. 3.20 Stretching the ducts gently with massage.

(4) Gently palm massage both testicles, and repeat the stretching.

(5) Now you may simultaneously rub the testicles using the thumbs and index fingers of both hands up to 36 times. Draw the energy upward.

e. Stretching the Scrotum and Penis Tendons

(1) Pre-stretching Exercise

(a) Warm both hands by rubbing them together.

(b) Encircle the base of the penis with the thumb and forefinger as all of the fingers encircle the scrotum, surrounding the testicles.

(c) Gradually pull the entire groin down towards the tip of the penis as you pull the internal organs up, opposing the outward force with your hand. (Fig. 3.21) First, pull straight down with the hand, and then pull down to the left and right in equal counts. (Fig. 3.22) Simultaneously pull up the internal organs from the perineum. hold for a while, and then release.

(d) Pull downward in a circular motion nine to 36 times clockwise and then counterclockwise. Draw the energy upward.

Fig. 3.21 Gently pull down on the penis and testicles as you pull up from the internal organs.

(2) Massage the penis

(a) Rub the hands together until they are hot. Use the thumbs and index lingers of both hands to hold the base of the penis from the sides.

Fig. 3.22 Stretching the scrotum and penis tendons.

Fig. 3.23 Massage the penis along three lines from the base to the head.

(b) Massage the penis along three lines. Begin with the left line, using the left thumb and index finger to massage from the base of the penis to the tip and back. (Fig. 3.23) When use the right thumb and index finger to massage the right line in the same manner.

(c) Next place both thumbs and index fingers on the middle line at the base, and massage down to the glans and back. Massage all three lines, counting up and down as one time, up to 36 times.

f. Tapping the Testicles.

(1) Stand in a Horse Stance with the pants off.

(2) Inhale Chi directly, into the testicles, slightly pulling them up, and hold your breath. Clench the teeth, contract the perineum and anus, but only contract the testicles very slightly.

(3) Use the fingertips to lightly tap the right testicle. Tap in sets of six, seven, or nine. Exhale, rest, and draw the energy up the spine. Use the same procedures with the left testicle. (Fig. 3.24)

Fig. 3.24 Tap the testicles lightly.

g. Resting

Resting after massaging is very important. Use your mind to channel your breathing into long, smooth, soft breaths. Then draw the energy of these breaths to the point on which you are working.

h. Suggested Timetable

Practice the Sexual Energy Massage lightly for the first ten days. If you do not have time for all the techniques, try at least one of them daily. You can divide the exercises so that different sets are practiced on alternate days. Practice in sets of up to 36 repetitions, as long as you are comfortable with this regimen. Forego practice, or at least decrease it, whenever you do not feel comfortable. Once you are skilled, these exercises can be completed very quickly.

After ten days you may increase the force of each exercise as you decrease the number of repetitions per set. You may also use fewer sets per exercise. After 50 days, further increase the force as you decrease the repetitions and sets, spending more time on the palm and finger massages. After this, men who have taken instruction in Bone Marrow Nei Kung may feel ready to attach the weight hanging bar to the cloth, first by itself, and then with very light weights. (See Chapter 5)

2. Sexual Energy Massage for Women Step by Step

Note: Remember to apply the preliminary Cloth Massage of the sexual center, perineum, and sacrum as prescribed earlier in this chapter.

The Sexual Energy Massage for Women is followed by the Internal Egg Exercise, which is useful in all sexual activities and is a prerequisite for Chi Weight Lifting.

a. Breast Massage

Massaging the breasts activates the sexual energy of the ovaries, which subsequently activates the energy of the glands and the organs. It is also possible to prevent lumps from forming within the breasts, or to dissolve them, by using this practice. You should find that this practice greatly enhances your health and sexuality.

(1) Begin in a seated position, either naked or wearing loose pants. You should feel a firm pressure against the vagina. To achieve this, sit up against a hard object, or place a rolled up towel between your legs. If you are naked, use a sanitary cover for protection.

(2) Pull up the middle and back parts of the anus, drawing the Chi up through the spinal cold. (Fig. 3.25(a) and (b)) Then pull up the left and right sides of the anus, and bring Chi directly up to the left and right nipples.

Fig. 3.25 Pull up the middle and back parts of the anus.

(3) Warm the hands by rubbing them together as you inhale, and press the tongue against the roof of the mouth. Place the second joint of the middle finger of each hand directly on the nipple of its respective breast. Cup the outside of the breasts with your palms.

b. Massaging the glands with accumulated Chi.

Note: As you do the following exercise, combine the Chi stimulated in the breasts with the additional energy of each successive gland or organ, drawing it back up to the breasts as the energy of each is activated. Return to the breasts after each of the following steps. Think of the breasts as melting pots for the combined ingredients of Chi from the organs and glands.

Activate the endocrine glands by massaging the area around the nipples, using the three middle fingers of each hand.

Fig. 3.26 Activating the Endocrine Glands.

(1) Use the three middle fingers on each breast to circle outward from the nipples, and then inward again. Move your right hand clockwise, and your left hand counterclockwise, then reverse. Direct the Chi accumulated in the breasts to the glands. (Fig. 3.26)

(2) When the clitoris is energized, the sexual energy surges to the head and activates the pineal gland at the crown. Return your attention to the breasts.

(3) Continue massaging as you move your attention to the pituitary gland, behind the “third eye “ You may feel pressure in the head as the energy descends to the pituitary gland. Return your attention to the breasts.

Fig. 3.27 Chi of the Lungs and Large Intestines

(4) Draw the activated energy down to the thyroid and parathyroid glands, Feel the expansion of these two glands as they become activated. Return both your attention and the Chi to the breasts.

(5) Continue to gently massage the breasts, and settle your attention on the thymus gland in order to activate its energy. Return your attention to the breasts with the combined Chi.

(6) Let the Chi flow down to the pancreas to activate it. Return the combined Chi to the breasts.

(7) Activate the adrenal glands with the energy, and bring it up to the breasts to blend with all the energies of the other glands. This accumulation will help to activate the organs' Chi.
